

Digitized by the Internet Archive in 2022 with funding from University of Toronto

<https://archive.org/details/31761114683758>

20N
25
31

Government Publication

F-1

F-1

ISSN 1180-4386

Legislative Assembly of Ontario

Second session, 35th Parliament

Assemblée législative de l'Ontario

Deuxième session, 35^e législature

Official Report of Debates (Hansard)

Thursday 23 April 1992

Journal des débats (Hansard)

Le jeudi 23 avril 1992

Standing committee on finance and economic affairs

Organization

Comité permanent des finances
et des affaires économiques

Organisation

Chair: Ron Hansen
Clerk: Todd Decker

Président : Ron Hansen
Greffier : Todd Decker

Published by the Legislative Assembly of Ontario
Editor of Debates: Don Cameron

Publié par l'Assemblée législative de l'Ontario
Éditeur des débats : Don Cameron

Table of Contents

Table of Contents for proceedings reported in this issue appears on the outside back cover, together with a list of committee members and others taking part.

Reference to a cumulative index of previous issues may be obtained by calling the Hansard Reporting Service indexing staff at (416) 325-7400.

Languages in Hansard

Hansard reports all debates in English or French as spoken by the participants. It does not translate remarks made in either language. Headings and tables of contents reflect language use.

Subscriptions

Subscription information may be obtained from: Sessional Subscription Service, Publications Ontario, Ministry of Government Services, 5th Floor, 880 Bay Street, Toronto, Ontario, M7A 1N8. Phone (416) 326-5310, 326-5311 or toll-free 1 (800) 668-9938.

Table des matières

La table des matières des séances rapportées dans ce numéro se trouve sur la couverture à l'arrière de ce fascicule, ainsi qu'une liste des membres du comité et d'autres personnes ayant participé.

Il existe un index cumulatif des numéros précédents. Les renseignements qu'il contient sont à votre disposition par téléphone auprès des employés de l'index du Journal des débats au (416) 325-7400.

Langues paraissant dans le Journal des débats

Le Journal des débats rapporte en anglais ou en français les débats, selon la langue utilisée par les participants. Les remarques faites en l'une ou l'autre langue ne sont pas traduites. La langue des en-têtes et de la table des matières reflète la langue utilisée.

Abonnements

Pour les abonnements, veuillez prendre contact avec le Service d'abonnement parlementaire, Publications Ontario, ministère des Services gouvernementaux, 5^e étage, 880, rue Bay, Toronto (Ontario) M7A 1N8. Par téléphone : (416) 326-5310, 326-5311 ou, sans frais : 1 (800) 668-9938.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

STANDING COMMITTEE ON FINANCE AND ECONOMIC AFFAIRS

Thursday 23 April 1992

The committee met at 1536 in committee room 1.

ELECTION OF CHAIR

Clerk of the Committee (Mr Todd Decker): Honourable members, it is my duty to call upon you to elect one of your own as the Chair of the committee. Are there any nominations for the position?

Mr Kimble Sutherland (Oxford): I nominate Ron Hansen.

Clerk of the Committee: Are there any other nominations? If not, I declare nominations closed and Mr Hansen acclaimed as Chair of the committee.

ELECTION OF VICE-CHAIR

The Chair (Mr Ron Hansen): I guess the next order of business is the election of a Vice-Chair. Do I hear any nominations for Vice-Chair?

Mr Johnson: I nominate Kimble Sutherland as Vice-Chair.

The Chair: Everybody in agreement? Anybody opposed? Congratulations, Mr Sutherland.

BUSINESS SUBCOMMITTEE

The Chair: I guess the other order of business is the establishment of a subcommittee on committee business. Does anybody want to make the motion for the subcommittee representatives from the three parties?

Mr Norman W. Sterling (Carleton): Gary Carr will be our representative on the subcommittee.

The Chair: Okay. Thank you, Mr Sterling.

Mr Gerry Phillips (Scarborough-Agincourt): I'll nominate Ms Caplan.

The Chair: Okay, Ms Caplan from the Liberals and automatically, Mr Sutherland, you'll be the subcommittee chair.

ORGANIZATION

The Chair: The next item on the committee's agenda, item 4 on the list you have before you, Bill 150, An Act to provide for the Creation and Registration of Labour Sponsored Venture Capital Corporations to Invest in Eligible Ontario Businesses and to make certain other amendments, the honourable Shelley Wark-Martyn's bill. That will be coming before the committee, I believe, on May 7.

Mr Sterling: It is before the committee now, as I understand it. I have not had any communication from the minister at this point. Neither I nor any members of my caucus have any indication from the minister that she's ready to proceed at this time. It was sort of taken off the table unilaterally by the government. Therefore, it may be her desire to go ahead on May 7 but I think it would be proper courtesy for her to forward the changes she may have to the bill, to give us a little bit of warning before we schedule a time for her.

The Chair: Maybe the parliamentary assistant can wind up.

Mr Paul R. Johnson (Prince Edward-Lennox-South Hastings): I was just wondering if Mr Sterling and any members of the Liberal caucus had had an opportunity to be briefed on the changes—obviously not, or you wouldn't be suggesting what you are.

Mr Sterling: Who's the critic for Revenue? It used to be Yvonne O'Neill but that's changed. I'm sure we'll work it out.

Mr Phillips: There's a file here. We're fairly interchangeable; we all know.

The Chair: Have all members of the committee received a copy of Bill 150?

Mr Sterling: We don't seem to have received amendments. Historically, for those members who weren't on the committee before, we were going to go into this in February. On the Thursday before the Monday when we were to start the hearings the minister indicated that she didn't want to proceed and unilaterally withdrew and said, "We're not going to go ahead." That was done without consultation at that time and I voiced my objection at that time.

So I'm going to be very obstinate this time in terms of letting the minister run the committee. The committee should make the decision on the basis of information. We don't have any information in front of us now and therefore I suggest, Mr Chairman, we postpone this until we have some kind of communication from the minister as to what her amendments might be.

1540

Mr Johnson: I can say that at this time I would like to think that between now and May 7 you would have an opportunity to see the new package as it is, with those amendments. I think the reason it was withdrawn or taken out of the committee was because there were some concerns with the particular legislation as it was drafted. So there have been some changes and that is why it's being brought back now.

Mr Phillips: The member for Carleton recalled to the committee the facts as they are. Both himself and myself had some significant reservations when the bill was introduced. We raised them and we were told that they were unfounded and that the only way to proceed was the government's way.

As the member indicated, we were all set. On a Monday and Tuesday, I recall the hearings were set. Then, on the Thursday before the hearing, we were told that somehow they were being pulled. My problem is that without knowing what those amendments are and having a chance to discuss them with my caucus, there's a risk, as we head into that session—they may be substantive. They may be things that we want, that I have to take to my caucus to get some feedback on. So I would have appreciated having been—even before today's meeting—briefed to go over with our caucus.

The Chair: Mr Johnson, is it a possibility that the members of the opposition parties can be briefed on this?

Mr Johnson: I think that's most appropriate. I wonder, how much time in advance of bringing this before the committee would the members of the opposition like?

Mr Sterling: It's not only the members of the committee who have to be informed, but the reason that we ask for this to be sent out to committee is so that people who were interested in the bill might have an opportunity to make a presentation. As I understand it, these amendments have not been made public. There's been no statement. I would think that the minister might want to make a statement in the Legislature and say, "These are my proposed amendments." Let the people out in the public have a little bit of time with it—I'm not saying an extensive period of time, but that again depends on the extent of the amendments—so that groups who have expressed an interest will have the opportunity to come.

I think we were going to have public hearings in February. Perhaps the clerk can help us out here. Were there groups that were going to come in front of the committee in February, and how many were there?

Clerk of the Committee: I didn't bring with me the schedule that existed at that time, but there were a number of groups. There were the United Steelworkers of America, the Algoma salaried employees, three or four ministries of government—Labour, Revenue, Treasury and Economics—I'm not sure of the fourth. I believe there was a fourth.

Mr Sterling: I have received a communication from a workers' co-op in the Kitchener area which I am sure would want to appear as well. In order to give those people the proper opportunity, I think that there has to be some time between—

The Chair: Can I go to Mr Sutherland for a minute?

Mr Sutherland: I think the sense was that you would start that process on May 7, I believe, or whatever. We had two days of hearings scheduled with groups to come in. I think there would still be the sense that we'd continue on with two days of hearings of that. I'm wondering if maybe—

Mr Sterling: We don't want them in here complaining about a section that has already been changed by the minister.

Mr Sutherland: Right.

Mr Sterling: We may not have to spend two more days on it.

Mr Sutherland: Okay, but maybe what I'm suggesting is that the committee meet next Thursday morning for a few minutes to decide where things are at, as to whether those concerns you've raised so far have been addressed adequately enough that we could proceed on May 7.

Mr Sterling: Perhaps what we can do, in fairness to the groups that have already indicated an interest in this, is wait until they have an opportunity to see the amendments. Once the minister produces the amendments, they're mailed to these various groups, or they're communicated. Ask the groups how much time they need in order to prepare a response or to prepare their public presentation. If they can make it by May 7, we'll do it by May 7. If they can't, if the minister doesn't produce them in public until May 6, then we can't. We can't sit on May 7.

The Chair: So you're saying the amendments in with the package that goes out to these groups so they can see what the amendments are.

Mr Sterling: Yes. Then we have to have an opportunity, as Mr Phillips says, to discuss them.

Mr Phillips: One of the problems I think is that the reference from the Legislature gave us two days of hearings on this thing, if my memory is correct. What I want to avoid is being trapped with scheduling the two days of hearings before we've seen the content of the amendments, because I have a feeling that, if it broadens it to what we actually originally thought should be in there, there could be a series of employee groups that will want to come before the committee. I'm just saying that to reference this for two days, and May 7 is one, the opposition doesn't leave itself much leeway for—

Mr Sutherland: I think too a couple of groups that might have been originally on that list may not want to participate, just given that there are a couple of the Algoma groups that were on there. My understanding is that they didn't really use this procedure; they came up with a different procedure, so they may not still want to be here. That may open up some room for a couple of other groups.

The only problem with Norm's approach is that if you go and ask them, "How long do you need?" and you wait, they come back, it could be June before we decide to have the hearings. Then of course, if there are amendments, I assume there will have to be votes at the committee stage here on those amendments, or something of that nature.

While we want to make sure we get input from the groups participating and from the public and they can have some time to comment, I don't think we want to be having those presentations in June either. The sooner we can get on with this and move forward, the better, because I'm sure there'll be other issues the committee will probably want to deal with as well.

The Chair: Okay. Ms Caplan.

Mr Sterling: That's not our problem.

The Chair: Excuse me. Ms Caplan.

Mrs Caplan: I think I was going to follow along the line of thought Mr Sterling just interjected. This is a very significant piece of legislation. As the Revenue critic, one of the things I've just heard today is that there are a number of potentially significant changes in this bill, changes that could be significant enough to warrant really a lot more thought and discussion, or significant changes that may have satisfied a lot of concerns.

I think today's discussion is premature. I think there has to be an opportunity for all of us to be fully briefed, to have a chance to discuss it with our caucus and then determine when we are ready to come and have hearings at committee. It seems to me that until we've been briefed and seen what those changes are, it's unreasonable for the committee to expect us to make a determination as to timing.

The Chair: Maybe Mr Johnson can wind up with a little more clarification here.

Mr Johnson: I don't know if I can wind up with more clarification, but I'd like to think we could come to some agreement with regard to the time we can expect this to come before the committee, and I'd like to think—

Mr Sterling: You're not providing us with any information.

Mr Johnson: Absolutely, and I understand that. If it's possible to get an adequate briefing from the ministry staff and to have this widely circulated to the necessary parties before May 7, could May 7 not be a tentative date?

Mr Sterling: Why don't we discuss this after you've taken the correct steps? The minister has treated us, as members of the Legislature, really in a way she should not have. We didn't make a big stink about it at the time. We said, "Okay, do you want to meet on Monday?" She unilaterally closed down the schedule of this committee without even coming in front of the committee and explaining what it was all about. I received no communication from the minister as to what the amendments were or what were not. We are talking about this Never Never Land. Why don't we just postpone the discussion of this until the minister shows her hand?

1550

Mr Sutherland: I was just going to suggest again, as I suggested earlier, that maybe we can meet next week in the morning and hopefully be able to answer those questions. Maybe if the minister is prepared at that time to come forward with the amendments, that will give you time between then and the following week, which is May 7, to go to your caucuses and discuss the issue, based on what's there, and whether you feel more time is needed. If that's the case, I guess that would be worked out between the House leaders as to whether there would be more time, but you could still get prepared to try at least to move forward with the dates of having hearings. If you felt there was more there, then that would be fine.

I understand there were concerns expressed about our not dealing with it when we originally had it scheduled, but I think the minister has attempted to respond to some concerns and is coming forward with some amendments, which I believe both of the opposition parties were calling for in the first place. I don't think we can be too upset about the fact that it was pulled and wasn't discussed there pending the fact that amendments were coming forward.

Mrs Caplan: I think you missed the point, and I'd like to be helpful. The point is you obviously have information that we don't have. In order for us to determine how we are going to proceed, we would really like to be fully briefed by the minister. What might be helpful is if you could agree and we could agree to perhaps have that briefing and set a time for the briefing now if we could. Maybe it could be next Thursday morning at the normal committee meeting when the minister would come in and brief all the committee members, and we would all have the information. We could take that back and discuss it with our caucuses and then come back and decide when we're prepared to proceed with the bill. I think that's a reasonable approach.

Mr Sutherland: I don't think there's a problem with the minister coming before this committee and letting it know the intent of what the amendments are going for. I think she has the full intent of doing that at some point. It's a question of when you want to schedule that and then there is the question of, when she comes forward and does the briefing, your going back to your caucus and then deciding whether we are going to proceed or not. That does delay the process. If you want more time, that can be worked out.

Mrs Caplan: With due respect, you're missing the point. We can't, in advance, tell you how we're going to feel about it until we have the information. You're asking the questions in the wrong order. First you have to give the information. Then we have to have a chance to discuss it. Then we can decide how we're going to proceed. It's unreasonable for you to say, "Tell us now how you want to proceed and then we'll give you the information." It just doesn't work that way.

Mr Sterling: I don't know if there is some tie-up with the budget in this. She may not want to come in front of the committee before the budget is laid out next Thursday afternoon. I don't know that.

If that's not the case, I think what Mrs Caplan has suggested is probably a good and logical thing. Next week we could not only have the minister come and talk about the amendments, but have some of her officials here so that members of the committee can ask them not only about the amendments but about the other parts of the bill. I had a briefing on this bill some time ago, before second reading, and the predecessor to Mrs Caplan as the Revenue critic had a briefing on the bill. However, members of the committee have not had that same advantage in terms of dealing with the thing. If you're really anxious to get it going, we're open to the idea that the minister come here next week with her officials, maybe before we start into it two or three weeks later; we won't have to be bothered doing that in the morning and we can get right into the public hearings.

Mr Johnson: Maybe there's been a misunderstanding here. I was under the impression that the minister was going to come on May 7 with a package so that all of us on this committee could have a package, and she was going to give a brief statement. We were all going to have the packages made available to us.

At this point in time I believe there's still some information that even I'm not familiar with, that has yet to come to me or to any of the other members of the committee. If it's not appropriate that the minister come in on May 7, give everyone a package, make a presentation and then we take it from there, if that's not appropriate use of committee time, then we'll have to do something else, I guess.

Mr Sterling: It's quite appropriate that the minister come and explain the bill to the committee. The problem is that we have the impression that the amendments are not small amendments, that there are some significant changes, because if they were only small amendments we would have gone ahead with the hearings in February. We're of the impression that there's been some rethinking. Quite frankly, I congratulate the minister on her rethinking and going ahead and, "Let's try to work this thing out." But if that's the case, then the proper pacing of legislation, in order to get the best piece of legislation, is to allow the people who are then going to comment to have it up front.

If you want to wait until May 7 to have the minister and the amendments here, that's fine and dandy, but I can tell you, if they are substantial, then you're going to have trouble with us in going ahead with public hearings for a period of time thereafter. All we're trying to do is help you and advance the process.

Mr Johnson: It's much appreciated. Recognize that some of these amendments are the result of some of the concerns raised by members opposite in the Legislature. I think that is certainly a step—I agree with Mr Sterling—in the right direction. We've made some amendments prior to bringing this before the committee.

Mr David Christopherson (Hamilton Centre): I think the opposition members are trying to be helpful. I think we're all just trying to get the horse in front of the cart. That's my sense. I'm not seeing any kind of games or any such thing. The PA is indicating at this point that he's prepared to commit the minister to coming on May 7. I'm hearing some opposition members say, "If that's the first we see of the amendments, and they're significant, we may not be prepared to start right into public hearings that afternoon or commit to when we will start them." I can appreciate that. I think if I were sitting over there, I'd ask for the same kind of consideration.

Could I suggest, assuming that the PA and our whip are comfortable with it, that we acknowledge right now that May 7 will be scheduled for the minister to appear and make whatever presentation she's prepared to make? If during the interim she's comfortable sending out a package of information and providing staff to give briefings to the caucuses before then, to try to facilitate a time frame, so be it. If we come here and meet next Thursday and there's new information about how we might facilitate opposition members' needs for information, so be it. But for today, if we agree that we'll have the minister come in on May 7, that request will go out and we'll take it from there. You have our assurance that we understand the concerns you're raising. I think they're very valid, as I think all my colleagues believe they are. We'll try to accommodate them in as timely a fashion as possible to allow all of us to get on with this.

The Chair: I guess the biggest thing I can see here is that all people agree that the day the minister comes is not one day of the hearings, that there are still two days left. That was the main area I could see.

Mr Christopherson: May 7 is not necessarily the day.

Mr Sterling: You raised another issue, Mr Chairman, and that was that originally two days were set out for hearings on this bill, which had nothing to do with the content of the bill and nothing to do with the interest in the content of the bill. It had nothing to do with anything save and except that the House leaders were negotiating before the Christmas break how many days committees could sit. The limitation that was put on this committee at that time, as I understand it from our House leader, was two days, based on the fact that we were sitting on other matters. So the two days are not carved in stone, as far as my House leader or we are concerned. If 30 parties come up and say they want to speak on Bill 150, we may need 10 days of hearings. As far as we're concerned, so be it.

Mrs Caplan: I think we've gotten to a point where there can be some agreement. I think I heard that there's agreement that if the minister is available on the 7th, we will convene then, have the briefing and then make a determination after that as to when we're prepared to have the hearings and also, at that point in time, how extensive the hearings will have to be. I think Mr Sterling makes a good point, that the length of time for the hearings was based on previous information and may have to be reconsidered.

The other point is that if the minister is prepared to come to the committee before that, I think members of the opposition would be more than willing to accommodate that—next week, if that's possible. So certainly if the parliamentary assistant could let the Chair know and if it's possible to arrange a meeting where we can have the information and be fully briefed by the minister, we can get on with making the decisions that will put this bill to public hearings and also give our caucuses the opportunity to have the kind of information they will need to be able to see this bill move forward.

1600

The Chair: The clerk just noted to me Mr Morin is ready to move on his bill, Bill 154, so there can be that buffer zone and that period in between of looking at the amendments and so on. So we can wind up dealing with his bill in between. It's a suggestion from the clerk.

Mr Johnson: I will certainly convey to the minister the information Mrs Caplan has mentioned. If it's within her means to meet earlier, I'll notify the Chair, who can notify the clerk, who can see if we can arrange some meeting prior to May 7. Otherwise, I think the minister is prepared at this point in time to come before the committee on May 7.

Mr Brad Ward (Brantford): Just a point of clarification: I thought I heard the opposition members not so much request that the minister come to two meetings, but that the information be made available prior to May 7 if possible. I don't think the minister has to come and brief us. It could be ministry staff, with the assistance of the PA, and then on May 7 the minister could give the formal briefing or the formal presentation.

The Chair: Is that acceptable, information ahead of time and ministry staff and then the minister?

Interjection: That would be great.

Mr Christopherson: What it does is it underscores what Mrs Caplan was saying, that we will schedule to meet here next Thursday, which is a regular sitting day of this committee—

Mr Sutherland: In the morning only.

Mr Christopherson: In the morning only, yes, if we've got something scheduled, and we'll cancel it if there's nothing there to fill. If there's anything we can do to move this thing along, we'll slot it in and do it.

Mr Sterling: No, I think that leads to a bit of a problem in dealing with Bill 154. I think we should just say that on May 7, the minister comes. The more information she provides before that time, the sooner we can get on with things in terms of dealing with them in committee.

If we want to give Mr Morin an opportunity to have our committee deal with his bill, I think we should, with respect to his rights, deal with that bill next Thursday morning and give him his opportunity. I don't think we can allow the minister to knock him off the schedule at her leisure. I think we have to make that decision now. The minister hasn't provided us with the information we need. I think we have to deal with Mr Morin now that we have made that decision.

The Chair: I was just talking to the clerk. There are groups that want to appear before the committee on Bill 154 that possibly would not be prepared to appear Thursday either. There's that possibility there. Mr Morin would be able to wind up making his presentation before the committee and then the other people who want to make presentations could make them after that.

Mr Sutherland: What are the other groups that want to present on Mr Morin's bill?

Mr Sterling: I think there are the people who represent the people who cash the cheques.

Mr Sutherland: I was aware of them. Who are the other organizations?

The Chair: Bankers' association and cheque cashers.

Clerk of the Committee: There are cheque-cashing businesses, the Canadian Bankers Association, and I think the Consumers' Association of Canada, or of Ontario.

Mr Sterling: Why don't we try to at least have some of those, and then ask Mr Morin as well if he wants some time during next Thursday morning?

The Chair: So we got (a) and (b) done. I think the other part, (c), will follow after we get through, not having to put a schedule on there—"Unresolved issues concerning budget secrecy, the budget-making process and the pre-budget consultation process"—unless members of the committee need some research done ahead of time so we don't have any lag time. Again, has anybody any suggestions on this or should we just let it follow?

Mr Christopherson: I don't have a complete package to offer and I'm open to anything. I suggest the Treasurer would probably be interested in coming. He's the one who initiated this and I've said all along, and I think it has been shown, he's very serious about changing the process and he really wants the input of this group. We've done as much as we can. I don't know that we've provided earth-shattering suggestions, but we've been there. I think Floyd would probably want an opportunity to come back after the budget is released and his schedule permits, to come in and talk about what has happened this time, how it was different from the time before and initiate some discussion about how we might make further changes for next time. Maybe that's a good starting point for us.

Mr Sutherland: We'd like him to respond to what the committee—we've had some brief discussions, came up with a few ideas and we sent him Hansard copies of what we had discussed. So if he's prepared to make any comments—there were a few suggestions that have come forward as well.

Mr Sterling: I think we should schedule the minimum number, if possible. That's fine and dandy with me. We have two other pieces of business as far as I can see which would take priority, but as soon as we get an opportunity let's ask him in.

The Chair: I just wondered, on item (c), whether there was anybody on the committee who had some ideas and would like to have some research done before the—

Mr Sterling: The only question I have is whether this research has already been done. Have any other jurisdictions changed their process with regard to budget secrecy?

The Chair: This is why I was throwing the question out whether anybody had any suggestions in this particular area, so we don't come to a meeting like this one today and say, "Okay, now we have to take a look at the research that takes another two weeks before we get this information back."

Mr Sterling: I don't know of any other jurisdiction that has dealt with this issue and changed the rules, and how it has changed those rules, if anyone has.

The Chair: You're talking about the other provinces that have changed some of their budget process?

Mr Sterling: There are other parliamentary institutions. I assume that it's—

Mr Sutherland: Is there any update from the report we got from research? We were given a report from research.

The Chair: I wasn't Chair at that time, so I'm going to let the researcher here wind up.

Ms Elaine Campbell (Research Officer): We had a presentation in February from Irene Ip from the C. D. Howe Institute and she spoke about several provinces. The committee expressed interest in what was happening in Nova Scotia so I have obtained some information from the Department of Finance in Nova Scotia. We'll have a paper ready for next week on what changes have occurred there within the last two years.

The Chair: Thank you. Is there any other business of this committee?

Mr Sterling: Mr Chairman, I move that we do not get special pins for this committee.

Mr Christopherson: I just want you to know that's in conflict with what Margaret wants.

The Chair: I see a lot of people wearing blue ribbons. They're acceptable at these committee hearings with a safety pin. This committee is adjourned for the day.

The committee adjourned at 1609.

CONTENTS

Thursday 23 April 1992

Election of Chair	F-1
Election of Vice-Chair	F-1
Business subcommittee	F-1
Organization	F-1

STANDING COMMITTEE ON FINANCE AND ECONOMIC AFFAIRS

Chair / Président: Hansen, Ron (Lincoln ND)

Vice-Chair / Vice-Président: Sutherland, Kimble (Oxford ND)

Caplan, Elinor (Oriole L)

Carr, Gary (Oakville South/-Sud PC)

Christopherson, David (Hamilton Centre ND)

Jamison, Norm (Norfolk ND)

Kwinter, Monte (Wilson Heights L)

Phillips, Gerry (Scarborough-Agincourt L)

Sterling, Norman W. (Carleton PC)

Ward, Brad (Brantford ND)

Ward, Margery (Don Mills ND)

Wiseman, Jim (Durham West/-Ouest ND)

Substitutions / Membres remplaçants:

Harrington, Margaret H. (Niagara Falls ND) for Mr Wiseman

Miclash, Frank (Kenora L) for Mr Kwinter

Clerk / Greffier: Decker, Todd

Staff / Personnel: Campbell, Elaine, research officer, Legislative Research Service

F-2

F-2

ISSN 1180-4386

Legislative Assembly of Ontario

Second session, 35th Parliament

Official Report of Debates (Hansard)

Thursday 30 April 1992

Standing committee on finance and economic affairs

Government Cheque Cashing Act,
1992

Assemblée législative de l'Ontario

Deuxième session, 35^e législature

Journal des débats (Hansard)

Le jeudi 30 avril 1992

Comité permanent des finances et des affaires économiques

Loi de 1992 sur l'encaissement de chèques du gouvernement

Chair: Ron Hansen
Clerk: Todd Decker

Président : Ron Hansen
Greffier : Todd Decker

Published by the Legislative Assembly of Ontario
Editor of Debates: Don Cameron

Publié par l'Assemblée législative de l'Ontario
Éditeur des débats : Don Cameron

Table of Contents

Table of Contents for proceedings reported in this issue appears on the outside back cover, together with a list of committee members and others taking part.

Index inquiries

Reference to a cumulative index of previous issues may be obtained by calling the Hansard Reporting Service indexing staff at (416) 325-7410 or 325-7411.

Numbering of committee reports

Effective with the opening of the Second Session of the 35th Parliament, committee reports and pages are numbered according to session, rather than calendar year as before.

Subscriptions

Subscription information may be obtained from: Sessional Subscription Service, Publications Ontario, Ministry of Government Services, 5th Floor, 880 Bay Street, Toronto, Ontario, M7A 1N8. Phone (416) 326-5310, 326-5311 or toll-free 1 (800) 668-9938.

Table des matières

La table des matières des séances rapportées dans ce numéro se trouve sur la couverture à l'arrière de ce fascicule, ainsi qu'une liste des membres du comité et d'autres personnes ayant participé.

Renseignements sur l'index

Il existe un index cumulatif des numéros précédents. Les renseignements qu'il contient sont à votre disposition par téléphone auprès des employés de l'index du Journal des débats au (416) 325-7410 or 325-7411.

Numérotation des rapports de comités

A partir du début de la deuxième session de la 35^e législature, les pages et les numéros des rapports de comités sont numérotés par session et non plus par l'année civile.

Abonnements

Pour les abonnements, veuillez prendre contact avec le Service d'abonnement parlementaire, Publications Ontario, ministère des Services gouvernementaux, 5^e étage, 880, rue Bay, Toronto (Ontario) M7A 1N8. Par téléphone : (416) 326-5310, 326-5311 ou, sans frais : 1 (800) 668-9938.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

STANDING COMMITTEE ON FINANCE AND ECONOMIC AFFAIRS

Thursday 30 April 1992

The committee met at 1013 in committee room 1.

GOVERNMENT CHEQUE CASHING ACT, 1992 LOI DE 1992 SUR L'ENCAISSEMENT DE CHÈQUES DU GOUVERNEMENT

Consideration of Bill 154, An Act to prohibit the Charging of Fees for the Cashing of Government Cheques / Loi interdisant de demander des droits pour l'encaissement de chèques du gouvernement.

The Chair (Mr Ron Hansen): We'll open hearings this morning in the standing committee on finance and economic affairs on Bill 154, An Act to prohibit the Charging of Fees for the Cashing of Government Cheques, which is a private member's bill. Mr Morin, please begin.

Mr Gilles E. Morin (Carleton East): Thank you very much, Mr Chairman. I want to let you know that I will be speaking for approximately 22 minutes.

We're here to study Bill 154, the Government Cheque Cashing Act, which prohibits charging fees for cashing a government cheque. I am pleased to have this opportunity to explain why this bill is important. I would like to demonstrate why it is essential that we seek a solution to a problem that has been identified, documented and debated by those involved with recipients of social assistance, yet this problem has never been addressed in a satisfactory manner. This is why it persists. I sincerely hope these hearings will yield positive, concrete results.

The cheque-cashing issue has been of great interest to me for a number of years. I have long been aware of the difficult circumstances that accompany poverty: restricted opportunities, hunger, limited access to goods and services that guarantee a better head start in life, discrimination, dependency, lack of autonomy and loss of dignity. These are some of the signs of poverty.

Being poor is not an advantage in our society. It confers a stigma upon persons who do not have the financial means to keep up with the rest of society. I suppose one can argue over the meaning of poverty and, to a certain degree, it may be considered relative to a given society. However, let's not be mistaken. Real poverty, as defined by the lack of basic necessities, is very present in our society.

I am not referring to a person's incapacity to keep up with current trends or to maintain the social standards of North American society. Poor Canadians suffer from want. In the midst of affluence they want for the basic necessities of life, such as regular and nutritious meals, proper clothing, safe housing and freedom from constant insecurity. These are not only minimal Canadian standards of living; they are dictated by what should be considered common standards of decency.

Poverty has a devastating impact not only on an individual but also on society. It drains society's resources and wastes its human potential. As poverty becomes an even greater burden, society is less capable of managing the present and preparing the future. This is not a problem for the uncaring society which values ends over means, but I believe Canadian society is a caring one.

The evolution of the welfare state in Canada illustrates well the belief that the community is partially responsible for the wellbeing of its less fortunate members. Accordingly, this belief was translated into social assistance programs. Programs were designed to bring relief—not the life of luxury, but simply relief to the needy—in the hope that eventually recipients of social assistance would be able to pull away from their difficulties.

This is where the notion of the poverty line comes into play. The poverty line helps to establish a certain level of subsistence below which a person should not fall. The financial aid a person receives should maintain that person at the poverty line. Programs such as family benefits and a general welfare assistance plan should ensure that basic necessities are provided to every person. The sad reality is that they do not always accomplish this.

This leads us back to a statement I made a few moments ago. I was referring to the difficult circumstances that accompany poverty. Bill 154 addresses one of the difficulties faced by the poor. It aims at reducing to the greatest extent possible the discrimination encountered by the poor in the course of their financial transactions. It wishes to alleviate, if not eradicate, the hardships caused by this discrimination.

Financial transactions are an almost natural part of our existence. We cannot avoid them. In order to get on with our lives we must on a regular basis deal with financial institutions. The poor may not have much money, but what little they do possess usually entails some dealings with financial institutions.

I have said before that cashing a cheque was not a difficult task for people like ourselves. Establishing our identity never becomes an issue. We possess an array of identity cards and sufficient income to ensure our access to a variety of financial services. If we dread at all having to deal with a financial institution, it is not for reasons of intimidation.

Recipients of social assistance, on the other hand, are not so fortunate. They encounter discrimination right from the start, based upon the fact that they are poor. They must face prejudices or preconceived notions, such as, "The poor cannot be trusted," or "The poor have a greater tendency to commit fraud." Some people assume, "If this person is poor, it's because he or she is lazy, doesn't want to work." When that hurdle is passed and communication is established, the recipient must provide ID. This is a reasonable request. However, a low-income person does not always possess two or three adequate forms of identification, and when you're poor, regulations tend to be applied in a more stringent manner. Individuals who are not branch customers are simply turned away.

Many financial institutions are reluctant to handle government cheques because of the potential loss due to fraud. Yet how much more fraud is committed by credit card holders or simply by common thieves? Is it not discriminatory to infer that recipients of social assistance are more fraudulent than other members of society? Is it not discriminatory to single out a group of persons and say, "We will refuse them services because they are not reliable customers"?

1020

Some have said that Bill 154 itself discriminates against recipients of social assistance by singling out their source of income. My reply, and I have said this before, is that the source of a person's income is important, as it is one of the main causes of discrimination by established financial institutions.

The recipients of social assistance are stigmatized because of their financial situation. It restricts their access to regular financial services. This is why they turn to alternative means to cash their cheques.

This bill addresses and hopes to alleviate this type of discrimination faced by the poor. So to state that Bill 154 is discriminatory by invoking specious arguments simply evades the issue. Nor is this bill any more paternalistic than any other piece of social legislation. Social policy, as such, is paternalistic. There is no way of getting around this. Either we leave individuals to fend for themselves regardless of the consequences, or we take certain measures in order to help people meet basic needs.

The object of our social legislation is to try to increase the degree of independence of the needy and hopefully to see them become fully independent. This bill aims to ensure that low-income persons benefit from mainstream traditional financial services and are not, because of discrimination, forced to resort to cheque-cashing outlets or any other business that charges fees for cashing government cheques.

As for the argument that this bill would restrict much-needed competition for the banking industry, it would take more than that to effectively begin to challenge the monopoly enjoyed by financial institutions in Canada. Banks are not threatened at all by cheque-cashing businesses who have, as a matter of fact, taken on a clientele they prefer not to serve. The simple fact is that for many low-income persons a visit to a local bank can be a daunting event, to be avoided if possible, even if it means paying fees to cash a government cheque. This is why recipients turn to alternative sources for cheque-cashing purposes.

Yes, cheque-cashing outlets have filled a need unmet by banks, but no, they do not offer the best alternative to recipients of social assistance. As a matter of fact, cheque-cashing businesses have become associated pejoratively with the clientele they serve. This, in essence, singles out low-income persons more cruelly than anything else, because it implies that a low-income person whose main source of income is a government cheque is not good enough or worthy of proper service in a regular financial institution. It implies the segregation of people and services in our society based upon the source of an individual's income. This is condoning, in effect, one type of financial service for the well-off and another for the needy. Can it be more discriminatory? This bothers me. I do not believe that we, as a society, should be comfortable with such inequity.

I think this is an important point. The arguments brought forth in opposition to Bill 154 invoke such notions as consumer freedom, the right to choice and equality with other consumers. In practical terms they would serve only to maintain the status quo, and the status quo is the reality described above. Ontario would continue to sanction discrimination based upon one's source of income or lack of income.

I would like to examine more closely some of these concepts, especially the notion of equality. Equality of rights is an attractive slogan. The mere mention of equality can be enough to gather support for one's cause. Of course, people will say, everyone should enjoy equality of rights. It's a basic assumption in our society.

We live in a democratic society and democracy implies equality of rights and treatment. What is easily forgotten in the midst of these appeals to equality is the indisputable fact that, as consumers, the poor and the well-off are not equals. They do not enjoy the same purchasing power, the same privileges, nor the same degree of influence as a consumer group. As a consequence, their freedom as consumers is greatly affected. I will explain this.

Freedom of choice has been linked to the concept of equality. If every person is considered equal, then of course they are all entitled, equally, to choose freely. The poor, like the wealthy, should enjoy the right to choose freely the type of financial services they wish to receive. This is the gist of the argument. But there's just one drawback to this assertion. The right to choose implies the capacity to carry out that choice.

This means that if a low-income person chooses to deal with a financial institution instead of an alternative party for cheque-cashing purposes, then he or she should be able to carry out that choice. He should be able to walk into a bank and receive service. In reality, lack of access to regular financial institutions automatically guarantees that the low-income person's right to choose is impeded, because he may choose to deal with a bank and still be refused service.

It is misleading, therefore, to invoke the right to choose as some sacred principle, based upon an inaccurate view of equality, without any regard to the actual exercise of that right. To assert the existence of a right without ensuring its exercise is, in effect, to deny that right. It's like acquiring money that has lost all of its value and can't be spent. So this bill is not depriving low-income persons of any right to choose. They will remain free to seek service in a cheque-cashing business if they wish to do so. The only difference is that they will no longer be charged a fee for cashing their cheques. If an agreement is reached between representatives of financial institutions and the provincial government, low-income persons will finally enjoy access to better financial services like the rest of society does. They will no longer be marginalized because of their source of income.

I imagine it's now evident that this bill has a number of objectives. The first, clearly, is to prohibit charging fees for cashing government cheques. This is a morally and socially unacceptable practice. We cannot allow low-income recipients of government cheques to lose a percentage of their income, especially when it represents a vital minimum.

The government of Quebec took the initiative in 1981 and prohibited charging fees for cashing government cheques. Money Mart challenged article 251 of the Consumer Protection Act, which prohibits charging fees, and lost its case. Two appeals of that decision were rejected. The Supreme Court upheld the constitutionality of article 251, as well as the validity of its aim, which is the protection of low-income consumers. I will return to this question of consumer protection in a moment.

Now obviously, the prohibition of fees only resolves part of the cheque-cashing problem. The bill's second objective addresses the greater issue of the poor's lack of accessibility to regular financial services. This lack of access causes them to turn to alternative means of cheque-cashing. It is based on the financial institution's mistrust of low-income recipients of government cheques and on the fear of fraud involving government cheques. Not that this fear is groundless, but as I have indicated earlier, there is no greater prevalence of fraud among low-income persons than among the rest of the population.

1030

I believe that an agreement can be reached between the government of Ontario and the Canadian Bankers Association, along with the credit unions and the caisses populaires, which would facilitate cheque-cashing. Such an agreement should specify acceptable types of identification cards, as well as set out the conditions for reimbursement of fraudulent cheques by the government. It could also contain provisions regarding the opening of an account. The question of accessibility to better financial services can only be resolved if financial institutions and the government cooperate. This bill wants to encourage the government and financial institutions to face their social and moral obligations towards the poor.

This leads us to a third objective which will help meet the second: improving our social assistance programs, making them more responsive to the needs of recipients, streamlining the system of distribution of social assistance. This too will require cooperation between ministries and financial institutions. If, for example, the electronic transfer of funds were instituted, or the direct deposit program expanded, the cheque-cashing problem would cease to exist. Low-income persons would be dealing with financial institutions like you and I do. They would possess a withdrawal card that would enable them to withdraw money from an automatic teller without having to go through the hassle of establishing their identity.

I would add that reorganizing the system of social assistance should make it more efficient in terms of administration and costs. Simply reducing incidences of fraud will prove less costly to the system while ensuring that dollars intended for the needy get into their hands. The reduction of fraud is another objective which can be met through an improvement in the way social programs function and funds are delivered. This objective, again, requires the co-operation of financial institutions.

I would like to return now to the issue of consumer protection, because in my view this issue concerns the protection of low-income consumers. It concerns the protection of their limited income. This is why I referred my bill to the Ministry of Consumer and Commercial Relations, because I feel that the solution starts there. First, we must ensure that those cheques which provide a basic minimum are not subjected to any fees. The Ministry of Consumer and Commercial Relations must take that initiative.

We are not just talking about welfare cheques. There is a whole range of cheques issued by the federal, provincial and municipal governments that supplement already meagre incomes, such as the old age pension or disability pensions. These are not, generally speaking, considered welfare cheques; however, they do represent low incomes, incomes that barely keep those recipients above the poverty line. These incomes require as much protection as a family benefits cheque or a general welfare cheque. As consumers, low-income persons are entitled to protection from certain commercial practices. It is the responsibility and within the jurisdiction of the Ministry of Consumer and Commercial Affairs to protect consumers.

Second, in order to meet the objectives set out earlier, other ministries must become involved in this issue and they already are. Meetings have been held involving the Ministry of Community and Social Services, the Ministry of Treasury and Economics and the Ministry of Financial Institutions.

The Ministry of Community and Social Services has met with representatives of groups which lobby on behalf of the poor. All of this is important, but what I wish to stress is that at some point we must stop talking and start doing something. Decisions must be made. There have been many consultations, many reports. We are now familiar with the issue. We know what the solutions are. All that is needed is the will to decide, to say: "This is what must be done. This is how we intend to resolve the problem." There is no reason to delay.

I have a list of witnesses and I hope you will hear them. You should also meet with the Canadian Bankers Association; I met with them. I met with the credit unions and I met with the caisses populaires of Ontario. These are all witnesses. I felt, through my conversation with them, that they are willing to cooperate, so I hope this committee will act as a trait d'union, as a link, bring them together and come to a decision. It has been going on for too long.

Are there any questions?

The Chair: Are we going to have questions of Mr Morin at the very end?

Mr David Christopherson (Hamilton Centre): Yes. Let's hear some of the other submissions.

Mr Morin: Later on, then. Fine. Perfect. Sure.

ONTARIO COALITION AGAINST POVERTY

The Chair: The next group is the Ontario Coalition Against Poverty. Mr John Clarke, come forward please. Welcome to the standing committee on finance and economic affairs. You may proceed. We need some time at the end to ask questions on behalf of the group you're representing.

Mr John Clarke: Certainly. I'll be fairly brief.

I would like to begin by making the point, particularly to the government members, that this issue of cheque-cashing outlets and dealing with the problem is something that frankly should be a housekeeping issue for the NDP government. I believe it's something that should be dealt with immediately. It's so much a part of the mandate of dealing with problems of poverty that your government sought in opposition, when it was campaigning for office, that I think there's a real responsibility to move on this and to specifically throw some weight behind Bill 154.

In our opinion, there is no question that a very major problem with regard to cheque cashing exists in Ontario. The Daily Bread Food Bank will be appearing shortly, but I would just like to point out one of the observations that it makes in the work it has been doing around this issue; that is, a survey of people using food banks indicates that 26% or 27% of people have gone to a cheque-cashing outlet during the course of the last year. That's an enormous problem. That's an enormous amount of money that people desperately need and are not able to utilize, and I think in your deliberations you need to keep that in mind.

When you look at operations like Money Mart and other such operations and you see large lineups of obviously needy people going in there to hand over an unacceptable portion of their incomes, when you see people having to give their thumbprints for purposes of identification in places like that, I think an understandable feeling of outrage begins to emerge.

At the same time, I think it also needs to be pointed out that the numbers of people going to cheque-cashing outlets constitute in many ways only the tip of the iceberg in terms of this problem.

When I was involved with the London Union of Unemployed Workers, I well remember that we endeavoured to challenge the opening of Money Mart in our community. We gave out leaflets to people going in there. I remember a conversation I had with a young man who pointed out to me that while he agreed it was unacceptable to have to hand over this portion of his cheque to Money Mart, he had in fact, for some three or four years, been handing over a larger portion of his cheque to his landlord to provide exactly the same kind of service. So there is, behind the cheque-cashing outlets, an even greater problem and that's something that I think you need to keep in mind.

1040

When it comes to people having to turn to cheque-cashing facilities, it seems to us that there are three major factors that are at play. One is the fact that people live on desperately inadequate incomes. Again borrowing from Daily Bread, they point out that among people using the food banks, after rent has been paid and an amount of money spent that Agriculture Canada says is necessary to provide a nutritious food basket for the month, the average user of a food bank would have $1.52 left over to spend on everything else. It's hardly surprising then that people desperately need to cash cheques and desperately need to find a means to cut through whatever barriers are put in their way and get money, even at the cost of turning over a portion to people like Money Mart. There is for the poor absolutely no room to manoeuvre when the cheque arrives.

The other glaring problem that has come to our attention in the work we've done is the phenomenon of the post-dating of cheques, by which I mean that the cheque is mailed a few days before the end of the month and received a few days before the end of the month but is dated for the first of the month. That's true of family benefits cheques and it's true of a great number of municipal welfare cheques. My understanding is that where municipalities have removed the post-dating of cheques the business of operations like Money Mart has been cut into very severely.

But the even greater problem that causes the situation, as Mr Morin has pointed out, is the question of banks and their practices with regard to low-income people, with regard to the problems people have with identification and other such problems.

I think it is noteworthy that cheque-cashing outlets have been notoriously unsuccessful in the Maritimes, and that's probably for a very good reason. It is that in that part of the country there has been chronic poverty and very widespread poverty for very much longer than in other places, and the resistance of banks and other such institutions to cashing cheques is not there in the same way it is in Ontario. Opening up something like Money Mart in Halifax would prove to be extremely unsuccessful precisely for that reason. Therefore it reveals very clearly that if the will is there on the part of banking institutions, the need for cheque-cashing services is wiped out at a stroke.

I think it is necessary for the government to move in the direction of ensuring that banks deal fairly with people, that banks cease to discriminate against people and that acceptable means of identification—acceptable to the banks and acceptable to recipients of social assistance—are provided.

One idea that has been floated is the idea of the Ministry of Transportation and Communications issuing an identification comparable to a driver's licence which does not require the taking of a driving test so people could very readily provide that as an acceptable means of identification.

I think, however, while it is necessary to look at those measures, the concrete thrust of Bill 154, the outlawing of the practice of cashing cheques for financial gain, is something that has to be supported and has to be enacted if we are going to be successful, if we are going to clean up this very serious social problem, this very serious attack on the rights of poor people.

I also note that 154 provides a grace period so you don't just simply immediately come down and stop the practice without providing a period of time in which problems around identification and the receptiveness of financial institutions to dealing with social assistance cheques can be worked out reasonably. I believe if the will is there on the part of the Ontario Legislature, arrangements with financial institutions that are suitable are quite possible to arrange.

In terms of opposition to the proposals around the elimination of cheque-cashing outlets, I have heard a number of arguments advanced, but perhaps the most glaring and ridiculous of all is the notion that to enact such a measure would remove freedom of choice for poor people. I don't think we are dealing here with any legitimate consideration of freedom of choice for poor people. What I think in fact we are dealing with is a situation where hungry and desperate people are being held over a barrel and are being taken advantage of. I think if in any comparable way rich people were being pressured to hand over a portion of their income, there would be an outcry and the matter would be dealt with very expeditiously by the Ontario Legislature.

I think, therefore, that I want to conclude by making an appeal to all of you on this committee to ensure that Bill 154 is dealt with and dealt with very seriously. While I'm not an accomplished parliamentarian, I know that private member's bills are notoriously susceptible to dying before they make it through to become legislation. I think this bill needs to be an exception to that rule. I think it is absolutely necessary for this committee to throw its weight behind it, to recognize that it is a vital measure. It is a measure that's very simple, very straightforward and needs to be taken. Bill 154 needs desperately to become law in the province of Ontario.

The Chair: Okay, I think Mr Sutherland had a question.

Mr Kimble Sutherland (Oxford): I know that Ontario family benefits has started direct deposit, but I believe right now it's still an optional thing as to whether those who are receiving want to have direct deposit. That certainly seems, at least on the surface, to be a more effective way and one way of getting around the system of having to go to the Money Mart and having fees charged. I was wondering what your organization and you feel about that right now when it is optional, if it were to be that all cheques would just be mandatory direct deposit.

Mr Clarke: Certainly I would support the notion of the encouraging of a direct-deposit system that is voluntary. I think it is a valuable part of an approach to the question of dealing with this problem. I can't support, and our coalition can't support, the notion that cheques should be automatically directly deposited without any freedom of choice on the part of recipients of social assistance. People have a number of concerns around that, one of which is that bank accounts are generally garnisheeable but government cheques or social assistance cheques are not. People have concerns about the ability of creditors to get at them. I think beyond that it is simply a question that people should have the right to make those arrangements that seem best for them. Compulsory direct deposit, no, but certainly the working out of a system that is as attractive as possible and that as many people as possible would want to turn to is something, I think, to be supportive of.

Mr Sutherland: So you're saying there's a dignity issue with it and an empowerment issue with it.

Mr Clarke: I think that would be true.

Mr Jim Wiseman (Durham West): I have just a couple of questions, and this stems from what I don't know enough about: the number of people who actually are using the service to cash government cheques. I would like to know that number because I think it's an important thing to take a look at.

But basically what we're talking about here is the absence of equality for the disadvantaged who are receiving cheques, and the whole system of access to the monetary system as it exists. So we have to ask ourselves why that happened and what the solutions are to the problem. It seems to me there's a whole demand system put into place that the Money Marts seem to be fulfilling, given the absence or the withdrawal of the banks and other institutions, and my concern is about potentially creating a problem.

I have to tell you, I'm totally sympathetic with everything M. Morin said and everything you have said. I am totally sympathetic. But I'm wondering, if we passed this, whether we might not be creating even more hardship by making it impossible for individuals to cash a cheque anywhere. I think that's an issue I need to have dealt with. There was an editorial in the paper about the difficulty that recipients of welfare in Montreal are having because the cheque-cashing places will not cash them. Let's face it: they're in the business for a profit. They need to make a profit to pay their workers, to pay whatever interest rates they're paying on capital they are borrowing.

1050

I'm just a little worried because you described earlier about the landlord who used to have control and power over the recipients because they couldn't cash the cheque. This is a well-known percentage and people have used it. It is regulated to the extent that the books have to be audited and people have to be accountable. There are systems in place so that fraud cannot take place within the cheque-cashing institution. If they decide they're not going to cash the cheques and we haven't dealt with all of the other problems we've heard listed here this morning, then where do they go?

Do they wander around for weeks with cheques in their hands that they can't cash? Do they go to the landlord or the local loan shark or something and sign over? Then they're at their mercy and those people can charge you an even higher fee. While I'm totally sympathetic to what you're saying and while I don't like these cheques to have service fees paid on them because I know how much people need the money, can you give some kind of assurance that voting for this bill will not create the kind of scenario I just described?

Mr Clarke: You asked first of all about the numbers. I confess I don't have the numbers. I suspect Daily Bread coming after me is going to have a little more information on that than I do. I know, however, that enormous numbers of people are using cheque-cashing institutions. In municipalities where the postdating of cheques practice has not been ended, on GWA cheque day you get the sense that it would be necessary to use a crowbar to get people in or out of the local Money Mart. That was certainly the experience when I was working in the London situation, which really leads me into the second aspect of the question.

I think what we are dealing with here is effectively a levy on the poor. We're dealing with a situation where people are losing a portion of desperately needed income in a way, and I think this is really the consideration this committee needs to make. It is totally and utterly unacceptable. You're quite correct: In an ironic sense Money Mart, it could be said, is fulfilling a need. The problem arises because of the failure of financial institutions, especially banks, to provide what should be an obligatory service—the provision of cheque-cashing to persons with welfare cheques.

The problems arise in a number of ways, but I believe that in many situations, perhaps at the local level in banks, there is a feeling that the cashing of welfare cheques is at best an unpleasant chore and banks have shied away from doing it. I think the approach a government needs to take is not to say that giving away money to cheque-cashing operations is an unfortunate ill, but we have to reconcile ourselves to it. I think the approach the government would have to take is to say that we are going to ensure banking and other institutions start living up to what should be a responsibility.

The passage of Bill 154, I think, should facilitate and increase the process by which the government makes clear to banking institutions that (a) it is ready to work on the problem of providing acceptable means of identification, such as the MOT identification proposal, and (b) that it is going to work seriously to negotiate with banks to ensure people are not left hanging. My understanding of the experience in Quebec is that there were some problems around not providing acceptable alternatives, of passing the law first and then worrying about the problems. I don't think that needs to be the situation with regard to Bill 154.

Mr Norman W. Sterling (Carleton): On the identification issue, the state should always be concerned about how much identification a person is required to carry around with him etc. Are there acceptable proposals to you to improve the identification of people who are using this kind of service?

Mr Clarke: I certainly think the abovementioned notion of an issue of an identification through the Ministry of Transportation that people could access if they wished to seems to me to be an equitable and reasonable arrangement. If the provincial government at the same time made clear that as far as it was concerned it was a valid piece of identification and the cheques that were cashed using that piece of identification would be honoured, then surely the worries of financial institutions would be very readily removed.

Mr Sterling: Mr Wiseman makes a good point in terms of leaving these people in the lurch, so to speak, if in fact we pass this bill, and that's a concern. However, the big problem is that successive governments have dragged their feet in terms of doing anything really positive on this. I suspect our government didn't do anything back in the early 1980s and I know the Liberal government was talking about doing something, and you know that talk goes on and on. I guess what Mr Morin's bill would do is provide some impetus for the government to really take action because it would be faced with a critical problem if action wasn't taken.

If we did pass this bill I would insist on a much later date. I've talked to Mr Morin privately about the July 1st deadline and that's probably not practical in terms of putting something else in place and that kind of thing. How much communication is there with various organizations, with these people who use this service so that they would be able to get ready for the judgement day, so to speak?

Mr Clarke: In large measure, organizations like ours consist precisely of people who use Money Mart. When we met this last week with representatives of the Ministry of Community and Social Services, several people around the table who were representing anti-poverty organizations were able to pull out their Money Mart cards and lay them on the table. I don't think there's a problem there. I would also like to say, however, that I'd like to stretch the point you made about the need to actually put some pressure on the negotiation process in terms of passing the bill and then working during the grace period. I think many of us around this table have been involved in negotiations of one kind or another and we have an appreciation for the fact that it's sometimes necessary to start the clock if you're going to do a good job of negotiating.

Mr Sterling: I don't find it totally reprehensible that you charge a customer something for the service. I just find 2.9%, 2.7% or whatever it is extremely excessive for the service they're providing. That's what I consider the problem. In terms of the people who have bought these franchises in good faith, under our laws in Ontario we do not have any franchise legislation which requires the master franchiser to provide any information to the franchisee as to what the dangers are, if there's no prospectus required. Some of these people presumably have put out a fair buck in terms of setting up. They might be into leases which could be for a long term. I guess the easy thing for anybody to say is that the government should give compensation to the franchisee. Have you got any comments on that?

Mr Clarke: On the first part of what you said, I think it does need to be said that the kind of money being taken by cheque-cashing institutions crosses the line between any concept of a legitimate fee and the taking of a cut. However, with regard to your second point, the franchise holders, I have to confess that I'm not an expert in the area and it's not my particular matter of concern. I don't wish to appear inordinately insensitive to people's plights. All I would have to say is that if franchise holders feel they've been wronged, they're going to have to argue their case. I'm certainly not here to argue it for them.

Mr Morin: It's not a question I want to ask, but just comments that were made by Mr Wiseman and Mr Sterling. The first one is on Quebec having passed the law and having difficulties, because there is a certain element of truth that they're having difficulties cashing their cheques. I understand that Quebec at the moment is in negotiation with the Canadian Bankers Association to arrive at a solution.

This is the key of the whole thing. It's to bring financial institutions together to come to a solution and solve that concern you have. I know it can be done. For instance, we checked in Holland and other parts of Europe and this is not a problem over there. It doesn't exist, so we must assure ourselves that we know we can find a solution.

1100

The second thing is about franchise. There are questions, of course, that I ask myself about franchise. First, let's look at the number of outlets of Money Mart that existed in 1985. I'm told in my research there were only 42 at that time across Canada. There are 93 now in Ontario alone. It seems to be a sort of gauge for the economy; if the economy is bad, you see the number of Money Marts increasing. Of course, there are more people on welfare.

I ask myself a question. A trial was taking place in Quebec, Money Mart was appearing in court. They appeared, they lost; they appealed, they lost. They went to the supreme court of Quebec; they lost. All through that time, they were selling franchises in Ontario.

I was in the investment business for 17 years dealing in stocks, bonds, debentures, mutual funds and portfolio analysis. I dealt with banks, financial institutions and insurance companies, and I had a fairly large list of clients. Some were gamblers and others weren't. Of course, it varied with age; the older you get, the more security investment you want to have. The first questions they always asked me were: "What are the risks? Is the company healthy? Is the capitalization of the company good? What is the earnings ratio? If I put in $1,000, what kind of return will I have?"

When it came time for Money Mart to sell franchises in Ontario, were these questions asked by the person buying the franchise? "What are my risks? Is the government involved?" The issue wasn't new. This is not a surprise, it's been going on. In 1981 the province of Quebec passed a law, and Money Mart operated illegally and was brought to the authorities. They challenged the law and they lost.

All through that time, they were selling franchises. In 1989 I introduced a resolution in the House. I started working with the project in 1986 after having dealt with other taxation businesses. H and R Block is another system, I think, that took advantage of people who simply didn't know. Profits went as high as 90%. We managed to convince the federal government to change, and it did. So this is the question I ask.

It was a risk; it was not a new issue. We were not taking anyone by surprise. Why were there so many people getting involved in that business? Surely if they asked the right questions—"How much money can I make? What kind of risk do I have? Is it a calculated risk?"—it's a calculated risk because Ontario hasn't passed the legislation yet. Quebec, the second-largest province in Ontario, has passed the legislation; surely Ontario is going to do the same. Ontario is going to look at that. Ontario doesn't treat its poor people differently from any other people. These are perhaps questions Mr Clarke could answer. You should ask him these questions. Those are my comments.

Mr Michael A. Brown (Algoma-Manitoulin): This won't come as a surprise to you, because I'm a northerner in a largely rural riding. I was just wondering if you had some information about what kind of a problem exists for rural people in cashing those cheques. Just so you understand, there are many from my community who are 40 miles from the nearest bank. Therefore, I don't know, but I suspect they would tend to go to the local general merchant or whatever to provide that service.

Perhaps in some ways my constituents would relate to the Maritimes situation you described, at least in terms of the fact that identification isn't a problem. Everybody knows everybody, so you don't get into the who's who problem you have in Toronto. But are you getting from the people you represent problems in rural ridings such as mine?

Mr Clarke: I think, generally speaking, there is the Maritimes familiarity sort of situation in rural areas. In some ways the situation tends to be easier. I also think, in talking to people from organizations within our coalition who come from rural areas, it is many times the phenomenon that people go to the local store. Sometimes the deal is that a certain amount of purchase has to be made at that store for the cashing of cheques. There are many ways in which the rural poor have an additional set of burdens, and perhaps that's one example of them.

The Chair: I'd like to thank you, Mr Clarke, for appearing before this committee with your views on Bill 154.

DAILY BREAD FOOD BANK

The Chair: The next group to come forward is from the Daily Bread Food Bank. Ms Sue Cox, would you come forward, please. I'd like to welcome you here to the committee.

Ms Sue Cox: Thank you very much. I'm delighted to be here.

The Chair: I don't know whether I see the sun shining out there yet or not. Maybe you brought the sunshine out there.

Ms Cox: I hope I can add something to this discussion. There is a document travelling around which perhaps can help you.

Let me, first of all, declare for you our particular interest in this issue. It obviously has to do with our commitment to taking whatever measures are possible to reduce the need for food banks in the Toronto area. It's frequently argued that in a recession this can't be done, that food bank use must increase and that the conditions of people must continue to decrease or that hardships should continue. Yet it appears to us that this is one of a whole bunch of measures that can be taken, perhaps even at very little cost to the taxpayer, that can have a real impact on people who use food banks.

That's where we're coming from and that's why, for the first time this year in our survey of food bank users, we looked at the issue of the use of cheque-cashing companies and what impact it would have. Of course, as often happens when you do a survey, you ask a lot of questions that you think are good questions, and when the answers come back they beg a lot more questions. So we don't have all the answers, but we have at least got some insights about how often and who uses these kinds of facilities based on our sampling.

Our sampling, incidentally, is of a thousand food bank households, that is, households that use a food bank. They're randomly interviewed in food banks throughout the greater Toronto area over about a three-week period, using trained interviewers. It's a very extensive document. It tells us a lot of background about their income, housing and health. Almost anything probably that you know or have ever read about who uses a food bank comes out of that survey. We do it with the assistance of the city of Toronto's health department and York University. It's a very statistically significant sampling of people.

In our survey this year—and I must say, incidentally, that we haven't run all the data yet; I was up until the wee, small hours this morning pulling some of this together—one of the things that shocks us right now is the condition of people who are using food banks. I'd like to use that as the context for what I have to say about cheque-cashing facilities. On the first page of the document that came around, I want you to take a look at the data which show how much people actually have left after they've paid their rent and if they have bought enough food according to Agriculture Canada's standard of what it costs to buy food in Toronto.

On the graph on the first page, the baseline represents what Agriculture Canada says: You need to purchase food for your family, which is a monthly report that comes out, plus the rent and utilities paid by food bank users who are in market rental housing. You'll see from this that you do have about $1.50 left if you're in a one- or two-person household. That's $1.50 a month. It wouldn't get you on the TTC if in fact you bought what Agriculture Canada says you need to buy to stay healthy.

In any family larger than that in fact you have less than what your family needs to buy food and pay the rent. Of course that impact therefore is greater on families with children, because they tend to be the larger family. A family with six ends up with basically half of what it needs to buy food, so the use of food banks is not surprising. Indeed, food banks which supply a meagre three-day supply of food once a month are hardly filling the gap for these people.

1110

Second, in an attempt to gauge the extent of cheque-cashing company use, we asked a simple question about where people cash their cheques. While 27% of people had used one in the last year, at the time of the interview between 13% and 14% of people were currently using a cheque-cashing company to cash their cheques, and the graph shows that. I'd also like to note that people use other places that also take a cut, a fee: informal cheque-cashing arrangements with corner stores, with landlords, with business people they know. That's of equal concern. The use is very high among food bank users. It literally means food off the table.

Welfare recipients report paying 4.9% on their welfare cheques to the cheque-cashing company. The average food bank household has $1,000 a month. We're talking about $49 a month, we're talking about real food, we're talking real meals in those kinds of terms. The hardship is unquestionable. We also found that a lot of our assumptions, and there were indeed assumptions that in some sense went into the survey, turned out not to be true. We'd assumed, for instance, that use was highest among people who are recently in Toronto. It's not true. The highest users are the people who have been in Toronto a long time.

The highest type of use was by FBA recipients. The working poor used them less than anybody else, even though for paycheques the cheque-cashing fee tends to be 2.7%, 2.9% or something of that kind. Long-term residents, Canadian citizens, FBA recipients, tend to look like the typical people who use cheque-cashing facilities. There are actually very little variables across the various types of people except that single people have a tendency to use it more.

The next tables that you see are the ones that show the length of time people have lived in the Toronto area. In percentages, it shows all of the users of food banks, and second, the cheque-cashing facility users. There's a much higher percentage of cheque-cashing users who are long-time residents, if I'm making that clear. Second, we found that refugees virtually never use cheque-cashing facilities. The only instances where they do are where refugees come to the area without any identification, having destroyed their identification when they came.

Other refugees and immigrants appear to have much better identification because they just have; I'm an immigrant myself and I know about those papers. They have good documentation, which is not necessarily true of the Canadian citizens who are using them. We hypothesize and cannot prove that issues of identification are significant ones and account for the longer time you've been in Toronto, if you're a food bank user, the more likely you are to cash your cheques at a cheque-cashing facility.

I think there are a number of other things we found out that interested us, particularly perhaps those dealing with the direct deposit option which we've always supported as an option for very poor people and welfare recipients. We were struck by some of the discrepancies between the number of people who used direct deposit and the number of people who thought it was a good idea. Over half the people thought it was a good idea for them to use direct deposit, yet only 16% were actually getting their cheques in that way. We also found that there was a fair amount of ignorance about this as an option. The conclusion that we draw from that, and again it's hypothetical, is that there are some real problems in access and in information and just knowing how to go about it, for whatever reason; I can't tell you why.

However, it's also in question because the direct deposit is not an option for everyone we talked to. Particularly those—I'd say almost exclusively those—who have debts or fear they may acquire debts will not use this as an option because of fear of the money being garnisheed. Of course welfare income is protected, but once it's in the bank it's not any more.

The solutions, I think, to this problem are not particularly complex, but there isn't one single magic bullet to fix it. We certainly would see this bill as an important measure alongside some other things. For one thing, to make it illegal to cash government cheques just makes plain sense to us, given the hardship on those people who receive these government cheques. Second, we've really got to push the idea of direct deposit. It appears to be the best option for most people, although it isn't the only option and it isn't the option for everyone.

I think we have to actively solicit the cooperation of the banking institution and banks in a variety of measures that make it easier for people to go in. That might include ID, which could conceivably, I suppose, be issued by banks as well as by the government. I don't know what's the best way to do that. But a lot of the onus really does seem to be on financial institutions, from our perspective.

For instance, a lot of food bank recipients tell us that they use savings accounts in order to reduce bank charges. Then they have to go in and pay $3.50 to get a money order to pay their rent—I mean, $3.50 is a significant amount of money for the people we're talking about—or any other bill. Perhaps it's naïveté, but I would think that the banking institutions would be fairly willing to talk about some of the issues if they realized the hardship that was imposed on people.

Other surveys we do take a look at food donors and who they see as being responsible for fixing the problem of food bank need, and 80% of them see the government as being responsible. It seems to us that this is fairly easy, relative to doing a lot of things like perhaps across the board welfare increases, which actually we would fight for but perhaps are not possible now.

I think the cooperation of banking institutions could be solicited, and to some good public relations effect, if people realized that their tax dollars were in fact going to where they want them to go. We have fairly good indications, at least among people supporting food banks; they that they would even in many instances pay more taxes to ensure that people are fed if they could be sure that in fact the money went into people's pockets, and that's always the caveat when they answer that question.

I just want to mention before I wrap up that the issue of receiving cheques which are post-dated for welfare recipients is a significant one, and significantly, obviously adds to the use of the Money Marts. I really don't understand why it isn't a fairly simple matter just to insist that the cheques be dated on the day of issue. We know perfectly well that people would rather actually lose the money at a Money Mart than suffer the embarrassment of going to a food bank. Most people are embarrassed about using food banks. They see it as begging. Our phones run hot doing referrals until the day the cheques are issued, and even though the cheques are post-dated, they stop ringing on the day the cheques are issued, because people, if they've got a cheque, will go to the Money Mart rather than go to a food bank. People do not use food banks unless they're desperate, and that's the bottom line.

I'd be happy to answer any questions about all that complex stuff.

1120

The Chair: I have two on my list so far.

Mr Derek Fletcher (Guelph): Thank you for your presentation. I was just wondering. Is this bill standing alone going to solve the problem that's going on right now?

Ms Cox: Not on its own, no. I think working with banking institutions is important. I think it's also important to look at direct deposit options for a lot of people. It certainly is one of the very important first steps.

Mr Fletcher: You think it's one of the first steps.

Ms Cox: Yes I do. It obviously has to be done in conjunction with the discussions with financial institutions. Frankly, what I know about financial institutions you could write—I remember my personal identification number and that's about the extent of my knowledge.

Mr Fletcher: You're ahead of me.

Ms Cox: I can't pretend any expertise. Obviously it has to happen in conjunction with some kind of action there and I believe that action can be voluntary. I can't believe banking institutions would resist that totally heartily. I think some of the difficulties are always, though—the issue of branch offices having different practices. You can go to a bank and have one set of rules and regulations for cashing welfare cheques and walk around the corner into the same bank, another branch, and have a different set of rules. I don't know how banks deal with their bank managers. Maybe you guys do.

Mr Fletcher: No, I think the banks have to be brought into line. I think it's about time.

Mr Norm Jamison (Norfolk): Listening to you speak, you seem to be very positive on the direct deposit approach—

Ms Cox: Yes, I feel very strongly about it.

Mr Jamison: —although your concerns, if I understand you clearly, are that the information on the availability of this to the recipients is really not well known out there at this point.

Ms Cox: I'm hypothesizing. Why is there a huge discrepancy?

Mr Jamison: Coupled with this legislation—I know there have been some difficulties in the province of Quebec but I think Mr Morin has really indicated that solutions can be found there. I find it at least disturbing to understand that in some cases as high as 4.9% of a cheque is required to cash that particular cheque. That, in my mind, destroys to a great degree the effectiveness of our social system. It can be questioned whether there's a legitimate infringement on the poor there. As much as 4.9% in some cases is far in excess of what the increase in social assistance payments can be, year over year, so I agree with you. I see a very clear problem here.

I don't understand at this point why, if this bill is important—what other measures would you see that would be important in conjunction with this bill?

Ms Cox: Issuing good identification for people, direct deposit and this bill, plus negotiation with financial institutions, I think, is the picture I see, roughly.

Mr Tony Ruprecht (Parkdale): First, I have some great news for you.

Ms Cox: Oh yeah?

Mr Ruprecht: Yes, there will not be any need for food banks in the future.

Ms Cox: Oh yeah?

Mr Ruprecht: The Premier made a recommendation, a decision, two years ago that we will not have a need for them, so I expect that within a year or two that won't be necessary.

Mr Jamison: This is not the place—
Interjections.

Mr Ruprecht: Second, Mr Chairman, I was at a meeting—

Ms Cox: I think I've heard this discussion before.

Mr Ruprecht: I was at a meeting with a local credit union and the priest stood up—this was at an anniversary ceremony—and said to them, "Why would the local credit union—

The Chair: Mr Ruprecht, could you speak into the mike a little closer?

Mr Ruprecht: I thought I was doing quite loudly.

The Chair: We just missed everything that you said.

Mr Brad Ward (Brantford): We didn't miss much.

Mr Ruprecht: The local priest had indicated to the credit union that he had personal knowledge of the problems of the poor in cashing cheques and he suggested that the local credit union would be in a position to cash cheques. Do you have any knowledge of why other institutions would be unable to do that, other than banks?

Ms Cox: No, I don't. I'm afraid I really can't add anything to it. Sorry. Maybe our next survey.

Mr Morin: Could I answer that question? The main reason banks haven't studied the issue is because they never got together. I think if this committee can bring the Canadian Bankers Association and the credit unions, the caisses populaires, together with the government they'll be able to come to a solution. All it takes is time and involvement. A system, I am assured after the discussions I've already had with the Canadian Bankers Association, can be found. It's just a question of sitting together and finding it.

There are all kinds of ideas out there, but it should not be done by imposing it. When you impose it, you create problems. It's through consultation with others, because our goal is to make sure that people receive the full amount, done in a way that dignity is maintained and in a way that people can be treated equally, like anybody else. It is a financial transaction. It's a government cheque. A government cheque, to me, is as good as gold. It's you who's paying for it. We're all paying for it. Why should we tax a certain segment of the society, especially with government cheques?

Please keep in mind that the purpose of my bill is not to close Money Marts; it's to make sure they don't charge a fee when it comes time to cash a government cheque, be it federal, provincial or municipal. It's as simple as that.

So if we can bring the bankers' association, the institutions, here and say to the Minister of Consumer and Commercial Relations, "Sit down with the banking association and come to a conclusion"—of course, my bill says it should be implemented by July 1992. I had to put that date on. If it's got to be delayed let's delay it, but let's make sure we find a solution. I don't believe in using a big hammer to solve such an easy issue and I cannot understand that we've waited so long.

The Vice-Chair (Mr Kimble Sutherland): Mr Carr, did you have a question?

Mr Gary Carr (Oakville South): I just have a quick comment. I want to thank you for a very fine presentation. It was very thorough and I appreciate it.

Ms Cox: At 4 o'clock this morning—

Mr Carr: It didn't appear like it was that rushed. You did a good job.

The Vice-Chair: Thank you very much, Ms Cox, for coming before us and making your presentation on this issue.

Ms Cox: Hurry it along.

CHEQUE CASHERS ASSOCIATION OF CANADA

The Vice-Chair: I would now like to call upon Mr Steve Clark, who is president of the Cheque Cashers Association of Canada, the next group up. I believe you have a video you want to show.

Mr Clark: I will get to that in a moment. In the information kits that are handed out—

The Vice-Chair: Could you just please take the chair? Otherwise the mikes have trouble picking you up. Just before you begin, I don't know the other person; just for the purposes of Hansard, if you both could introduce yourselves that would be great.

Mr Clark: My name is Stephen Clark, president of the Cheque Cashers Association of Canada, and this is Leslie Baril, owner of several cheque-cashing outlets in the Metro Toronto area.

If you look at the information kits that were handed out, if you pull the last brief out on the right-hand side, that's what I will be presenting right now, if you care to follow along. It has this appearance. The rest of the information certainly can be looked at at your leisure.

The CCAC was incorporated in November 1990 and represents 170 of the 200 cheque-cashing convenience outlets, 100 of which are in Ontario.

The industry today is dramatically different than it was 10 years ago. The first stores served predominantly those who were not being served by the banks. We had a very narrow customer base, and over the years we carefully listened to the desires of the consumers who came to us and we worked very hard at identifying and delivering their needs.

1130

The result today is that consumers appreciate the personalized convenience and they know we will go out of our way to provide a level of service that's superior to that obtained elsewhere. Today's stores are bright, clean and modern. They offer a safe, casual and comfortable environment.

The industry has grown substantially over the last 10 years and today there are 4,100 cheque-cashing outlets in North America.

Today's consumers want fast service and convenience. Most outlets are open until 9 pm, and several are open even later. The majority of the business is done outside banking hours. The locations are designed for easy access and neighbourhood convenience.

In addition to cheque-cashing, most outlets provide Western Union service, mailbox service, currency exchange, utility bill payments, photo identification, bus passes and American Express money orders.

Money orders are very popular and are provided at less than one third the cost charged by financial institutions. Many outlets provide money orders free to customers when they pay to get their cheques cashed, and this of course is considered added value by the consumers.

On average, the fee charged for most cheques cashed today is 3.5%. Generally the range is from a low of 2.9% to a high of 4.9%. The fee amount is reflective of the cost of providing the service, the ID presented and the risk involved in performing the task.

Over the years this has become a very competitive industry, which continues to influence not only the fees charged but the level of customer service provided. Fees have constantly been reduced, while the level of service has increased.

Ultimately the services provided and the fees charged within the industry have to compete with the level of service and the charges of financial institutions and automated teller machines. For example, it can cost $1 to $2 to get $40 from the "fast cash," most frequent amount button on ATM machines. This represents a fee in the range of 2.5% to 5%.

We're a convenience business, much like neighbourhood convenience stores. People don't buy everything they need from a 7 Eleven, and just the same, people do not cash every cheque they get at a cheque-cashing outlet. The average use is 4.5 times a year for a cheque-cashing customer of our industry.

The industry today is dramatically different than 10 years ago. Not only is it a much broader base of customers but the reasons today's customer uses us have changed. Their lifestyle is different; their appetite for fast service and convenience is tremendous. There have also been significant technological changes, enhanced social awareness and significant government and banking policy changes as a result.

Bill 154 does not reflect today's situation. We have watched the debate regarding Bill 154 and we're concerned that there are some very serious misconceptions about the cheque-cashing industry and the financial institutions.

Legislation should not be passed without a sound factual base and a rational understanding of the issues. Although well intended, Bill 154 will not ensure access to financial services by low-income Ontarians. Further, a review of Bill 154 shows nothing that will require the banking industry in the province to work with the government. These misconceptions that are inherent with Bill 154 are primarily due to the lack of understanding of today's facts. Of course this is a communication issue.

The facts today are that people can and do cash cheques at financial institutions. Over 99% of the approximately 3.8 million government cheques are negotiated every month at credit unions, banks and trust companies. Although most people do, they are not required to have a bank account to obtain cheque-cashing services if they choose not.

Anyone who holds a cheque made payable to themselves can present the item to the bank it's drawn on and get it cashed. Today's trends are such that in many ways it's easier to cash a government cheque than most payroll cheques.

As I've said, things have changed, and over the last 10 years governments and the banks have shown awareness, sincerity and actions regarding the issue of access to financial services by low-income Ontarians. For example, in March of 1985 the Canadian Bankers Association "adopted a common policy under which known account holders, cashing government cheques at their own branch, will receive their funds immediately. In some circumstances in the past, these funds were placed on 'hold' while cheques cleared."

The problem at hand, of course, was that people wanted their cash immediately, and this is a fundamental service provided by the cheque-cashing outlet.

As well, in May of 1986 the banks went even further and an agreement was made with the federal government whereby the federal government would guarantee cheques up to $750 for non-bank customers.

Other similar agreements exist in the provinces of BC, Alberta and Quebec. In May of 1984, for example—this is relevant to today's issue, gentlemen and ladies—the following excerpt from a prepared statement by the Canadian Bankers Association regarding British Columbia's agreement was provided. See if this sounds familiar:

"With respect to provincial MHR cheques, the government recognized that with the dramatic increase in the number of persons being assisted under social service programs, action had to be taken to ensure recipients were able to cash their cheques. A program was established to ensure that on being presented with approved pieces of identification or a special letter of identification from the government, banks would be able to cash Ministry of Human Resource cheques.

"The provincial government agreed to indemnify the banks for any losses due to fraud or forgery if the cheques were negotiated within their stipulated guidelines."

The brief went on to say, "Frankly, we can see no reason why recipients of BC government cheques would wish to pay a fee to use the service of Money Marts, other than for convenience."

The question today is, if Bill 154 was to become law, what would be the result? Bill 154 would require those from the cheque-cashing convenience industry to refuse service to many Ontarians based solely on their social and economic condition—because they receive benefits from the government—while at the same time provide service to those who receive their income from the private sector.

Discrimination such as this offends the fundamental principles of society. Constituents, consumers and advocates of the poor will not accept legislation which dictates how recipients receive and spend their benefits.

I have brought with me today—the boxes are here; there are four there and there are four there—60,000 signatures protesting Bill 154. These signatures came from constituents and consumers who are furious about any legislation that singles out and stigmatizes recipients of unemployment and welfare benefits and, in doing so, harms their feelings of self-worth by implying they don't have the ability or the intellect to make a rational choice. They are angry because this bill will cause a decrease in needed competition to the banks, it will effectively decrease access to financial services and literally force people to use financial institutions as their sole choice, even if they desire not to.

Further evidence of the public's view is provided by the enclosed Decima Research survey in your kits. In that survey, 75% of those asked felt, "People who receive government benefit payments should not be required to cash those cheques at banks only, but should have the same right to choose as everyone else."

The right for recipients to determine how to spend their benefits has also been publicly advocated by the Ontario government's Community and Social Services minister, Marion Boyd. In a recent article dated March 14, 1992, in the Hamilton Spectator, Ms Boyd agreed with the principle that the government has no right to dictate how recipients spend their benefits.

Referring to comments made on CHML's John Hardy Today talk show, Ms Boyd defended the government's refusal to make welfare recipients accountable for how they spend their benefits. She told one caller that suggestions that welfare recipients are not entitled to take cabs or buy a case of beer represents a "punitive attitude." She further stated, "Welfare payments allow the poor an opportunity to learn how to handle money, and the state shouldn't intervene to ensure it's not spent on beer or bingo."

1140

Bill 154 directly refutes the principle of individual freedom of choice. Government has the responsibility to deliver benefits to those who are in need. Once delivered, these benefits belong to the recipient, and it should remain that individual's decision as to what type of financial services he chooses. To do otherwise is to assume a paternalistic attitude, the principle of which is not supported by the government of Ontario.

These principles have also been articulated in Ontario reports such as Transitions, which states:

"Individual responsibility is greatly enhanced by treating people with respect and providing them with choices rather than imposing solutions. Self-determination is not promoted when people become accustomed to having decisions made for them by others."

It goes on to say, "Concerted and innovative alternatives should replace legislation that reduces self-esteem and profoundly limits choices."

Regarding the issue of identification, one needs to look again at the proposed bill. We find nothing in any of the sections that addresses the issue of lack of identification required for encashment of government cheques. It's difficult to see how Bill 154 will do anything to enhance the situation of those who are temporarily without valid identification. Bill 154 would require the industry to refuse service to those people. Regardless of your income, birth certificates, social insurance cards, passports and OHIP cards are available. Furthermore, the government also issues photo identification. It costs $10, it's readily available.

Social service recipients can now obtain a letter of identification from their social worker. This is important. This letter is acceptable by the banks, and cheques are currently being cashed for those without identification on this basis. The government is acting on this issue.

It is clear that Bill 154 does not reflect today's trends, the desires of the consumers or what would be in the best interests of the people of the province. The stated aim of Bill 154 is to ensure that recipients of government assistance enjoy access to financial institutions and not be penalized for their socioeconomic situation. Bill 154 will not ensure that banks cash government cheques.

Once again, looking at all sections of the bill, we fail to find anything that indicates to us it will ensure access to financial institutions. It's not there.

A reading of the bill indicates to us that it will reduce access to financial services. Over 100 Ontario locations currently providing a convenient neighbourhood service, even after the banks have long closed for the day, will have to refuse service, because the simple fact is that this service cannot be performed for free. Regardless of whether the service is performed by financial institutions, a merchant or a cheque-cashing outlet, there is a very real overhead cost. There's a substantial capital requirement and a very real risk of significant loss. In Metropolitan Toronto, 1,300 stop payments are placed on benefit cheques every single month.

Bill 154 does not reflect today's situation any more than section 251, a similar legislation of the Quebec Consumer Protection Act. Was there a problem to address in Quebec back in 1976 when it was first proposed, and in 1978 when it was first enacted? Probably so. There were probably problems then. It certainly was not addressed to our industry. This industry did not exist in Quebec or anywhere in Canada until 1982. Once section 251 was enacted in Quebec, did it ensure access to banks by low-income Quebecers? No, it didn't. Nothing changed and the problem of the day continued.

No policy changes were made by banks in Quebec until 1985, seven years later. It is important to note that there is no power within either legislation that will force the banks to cash government cheques. It's not there. If you look at the legislation, either one, it's not there.

In a recent conversation with Lise Corbeil, the executive director of the National Anti-Poverty Organization, she informed me that low-income individuals' access to financial service is not an issue for them and has not been an issue for several years.

Further, in a letter from the Metro Toronto community services department, Ray Lazanik informed Mr Morin's office—this is important—that:

"At Metro we have changed the cashable dates of cheques so they are immediately cashable and have just released a request for proposals to the chartered banks for a comprehensive service and direct deposit system. Apparently, these for-profit companies are filling a need for some of our customers presently unmet by banks, some of which seem to not want to deal with our customers under any circumstances. Forbidding the existence of for-profit services can drive them underground or to the corner store. This would not solve the problem, but only bury it."

This in fact was exactly the result in Quebec when section 251 was enacted. There are stories of 20% and 30% fees being charged in the late 1970s and the early 1980s in Quebec.

It's been clearly demonstrated that the banks are very willing to dialogue with the Ontario government, just as they have with other governments. It's our understanding that positive initiatives such as direct deposit alternatives and agreements similar to those I have already mentioned are under way. Our industry supports the efforts of Metro Toronto and we support the efforts of the government's ongoing negotiations for agreements with banks, and specifically we support the alternative of direct deposit.

The Ontario government is already acting on today's circumstances and in the best interests of the public. In a recent response to a letter we sent to all members of the Legislature on November 25, 1991, Treasurer Floyd Laughren indicated that, "Bill 154...did not reflect current government policy." He went on to note that while he supported the concept of social assistance recipients requiring 100% of their payments for daily needs, he stated that:

"Prior to the end of the legislative session, Bill 156 was passed, which substantially amended the Financial Administration Act. In preparing these amendments we decided not to proceed at this time with any restrictions on fees for cashing the cheques of the government of Ontario. At present, the government of Ontario prefers to develop alternative ways to manage the payments process with no cost to the recipient. This would appear to be the most desirable goal, rather than, as you correctly observe, restricting individual freedom of choice in dealing with their funds. Measures under consideration include encouragement of direct deposits to individual bank accounts, reducing timing differences between cheque issuing and payment dates and raising the awareness of the banks to provide cheque-cashing services to welfare recipients."

This is an important comment that he includes in his letter. "We also have an arrangement with one of the major banks involving encashment of government cheques for those recipients who do not have bank accounts or sufficient identification." They're currently being served and the choice is there for them.

It should be noted that the policy decision arrived at by the officials of the Ministry of Treasury and Economics was a result of input received from all other relevant ministries, including the Ministry of Community and Social Services, which, as you know, is the issuer of government welfare benefits.

The Cheque Cashers Association of Canada strongly opposes Bill 154. Although it's well intended, it does not reflect a knowledge of today's situation. Clearly things are not what they were 10 years ago, and they certainly are not what is implied by Bill 154.

While we agree the delivery system, the financial institutions and the cheque-cashing industry are not perfect, Bill 154 is not an improvement to that imperfection. This bill is not only out of step with current issues, it is not a means to enhance access to financial services. The passage of 154 would lead to a serious violation of the principles of organized society by robbing individuals of their right to make their own decisions about where and on what services to spend their own money.

Our industry should not be forced to refuse service to someone simply because his or her income comes from the government. This legislation will decrease access to financial services, it will cause a dramatic loss of hundreds of jobs by those employed within the industry and ultimately threaten the existence of a well-liked and well-supported financial service. With continued and improved access, there is no need for discriminatory legislation such as Bill 154.

Our industry is more than willing to share our knowledge. We've worked with these people for 10 years. We have some knowledge here that we are gladly willing to share. We will work with the Ontario government in order to determine the nature and the scope of any existing or future problems as well as aiding in the development of solutions to such problems.

Thank you very much for your time and patience. Briefly, we anticipate that many people here have not had an opportunity to really be in a cheque-cashing store, so we've got a four-minute video—that's all it takes—just to let you have a look at what this is about.

[Video presentation]

1155

Mr Clark: I'd be happy to answer any questions as long as time permits. As well, if need be, since time was short and we started late, I certainly can return to any future meetings.

The Chair: No questions? I'd like to thank you for coming before this committee.

Mr Clark: Thank you. I appreciate your time and patience.

Mr Sutherland: Mr Chair, we've had presentations, and there might be one or two organizations that maybe we should have heard from, but I think we've heard a variety of groups. I'd be willing to put the issue to a vote right now, if that's agreeable.

The Chair: Is it the pleasure of the committee? Should we have a 10-minute recess?

Mr Sutherland: There are also private members' bills going on and there could be votes on them. If we take the 10 minutes, we might not be able to get back here for the votes, so perhaps the committee is willing just to take the vote right now.

Mr Ruprecht: It's a good idea.

The Chair: Okay, fine.

Sections 1 to 4, inclusive, agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill ordered to be reported.

The committee adjourned at 1158.

CONTENTS

Thursday 30 April 1992

Government Cheque Cashing Act, 1992, Bill 154	F-7
Ontario Coalition Against Poverty	F-9
John Clarke, provincial organizer
Daily Bread Food Bank	F-13
Sue Cox, assistant executive director
Cheque Cashers Association of Canada	F-16
Stephen A. Clark, president
Leslie Baril, member

STANDING COMMITTEE ON FINANCE AND ECONOMIC AFFAIRS

Chair / Président: Hansen, Ron (Lincoln ND)
Vice-Chair / Vice-Président: Sutherland, Kimble (Oxford ND)
Caplan, Elinor (Oriole L)
Carr, Gary (Oakville South/-Sud PC)
Christopherson, David (Hamilton Centre ND)
Jamison, Norm (Norfolk ND)
Kwinter, Monte (Wilson Heights L)
Phillips, Gerry (Scarborough-Agincourt L)
Sterling, Norman W. (Carleton PC)
Ward, Brad (Brantford ND)
Ward, Margery (Don Mills ND)
Wiseman, Jim (Durham West/-Ouest ND)

Substitutions / Membres remplaçants:

Brown, Michael A. (Algoma-Manitoulin L) for Mr Kwinter
Fletcher, Derek (Guelph ND) for Ms Ward
Ruprecht, Tony (Parkdale L) for Mr Phillips

Also taking part / Autres participants et participantes:

Kormos, Peter (Welland-Thorold ND)
Morin, Gilles E. (Carleton East/-Est L)

Clerk pro tem / Greffière par intérim: Mellor, Lynn

Staff / Personnel: Campbell, Elaine, research officer, Legislative Research Service

ISSN 1180-4386

F-3

F-3

Legislative Assembly of Ontario

Second session, 35th Parliament

Official Report of Debates (Hansard)

Thursday 7 May 1992

Standing committee on finance and economic affairs

Labour Sponsored Venture
Capital Corporations Act, 1992

Assemblée législative de l'Ontario

Deuxième session, 35^e législature

Journal des débats (Hansard)

Jeudi 7 mai 1992

Comité permanent des finances
et des affaires économiques

Loi de 1992 sur les corporations
à capital de risque de travailleurs

Chair: Ron Hansen
Clerk: Todd Decker

Président : Ron Hansen
Greffier : Todd Decker

Published by the Legislative Assembly of Ontario
Editor of Debates: Don Cameron

Publié par l'Assemblée législative de l'Ontario
Éditeur des débats : Don Cameron

Table of Contents

Table of Contents for proceedings reported in this issue appears on the outside back cover, together with a list of committee members and others taking part.

Index inquiries

Reference to a cumulative index of previous issues may be obtained by calling the Hansard Reporting Service indexing staff at (416) 325-7410 or 325-7411.

Numbering of committee reports

Effective with the opening of the Second Session of the 35th Parliament, committee reports and pages are numbered according to session, rather than calendar year as before.

Subscriptions

Subscription information may be obtained from: Sessional Subscription Service, Publications Ontario, Ministry of Government Services, 5th Floor, 880 Bay Street, Toronto, Ontario, M7A 1N8. Phone (416) 326-5310, 326-5311 or toll-free 1 (800) 668-9938.

Table des matières

La table des matières des séances rapportées dans ce numéro se trouve sur la couverture à l'arrière de ce fascicule, ainsi qu'une liste des membres du comité et d'autres personnes ayant participé.

Renseignements sur l'index

Il existe un index cumulatif des numéros précédents. Les renseignements qu'il contient sont à votre disposition par téléphone auprès des employés de l'index du Journal des débats au (416) 325-7410 ou 325-7411.

Numérotation des rapports de comités

A partir du début de la deuxième session de la 35^e législature, les pages et les numéros des rapports de comités sont numérotés par session et non plus par l'année civile.

Abonnements

Pour les abonnements, veuillez prendre contact avec le Service d'abonnement parlementaire, Publications Ontario, ministère des Services gouvernementaux, 5^e étage, 880, rue Bay, Toronto (Ontario) M7A 1N8. Par téléphone : (416) 326-5310, 326-5311 ou, sans frais : 1 (800) 668-9938.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

STANDING COMMITTEE ON FINANCE AND ECONOMIC AFFAIRS

Thursday 7 May 1992

The committee met at 1016 in committee room 1.

LABOUR SPONSORED VENTURE CAPITAL CORPORATIONS ACT, 1992

LOI DE 1992 SUR LES CORPORATIONS À CAPITAL DE RISQUE DE TRAVAILLEURS

Consideration of Bill 150, An Act to provide for the Creation and Registration of Labour Sponsored Venture Capital Corporations to Invest in Eligible Ontario Businesses and to make certain other amendments / Loi prévoyant la création et l'inscription de corporations à capital de risque de travailleurs aux fins d'investissement dans des entreprises ontariennes admissibles et apportant des modifications corrélatives.

The Chair (Mr Ron Hansen): Good morning. We'll start the standing committee on finance and economic affairs. On the agenda today, May 7, is Bill 150, An Act to provide for the Creation and Registration of Labour Sponsored Venture Capital Corporations to Invest in Eligible Ontario Businesses and to make certain other amendments.

MINISTRY OF REVENUE

The Chair: We'll start off with the Honourable Shelley Wark-Martyn, MPP, Minister of Revenue.

Hon Shelley Wark-Martyn (Minister of Revenue): Good morning. We are pleased to be given this opportunity to appear today before the standing committee on finance and economic affairs.

The economy of Ontario is undergoing enormous change. A major priority of this government is to help the people of Ontario to successfully respond to those changes, and to respond in a way that involves all the players in the economy. We believe that a concerted and cooperative approach on the part of business, labour, government and other members of the community is needed to meet the economic challenges facing Ontario today.

In response to the economic problems facing business and labour, the Treasurer announced a new two-part Ontario investment and worker ownership program in the Legislature on June 20, 1991.

This was the government's first initiative designed to deal with two important issues raised in the 1991 Ontario budget: the need to promote investment in industries to help them to compete and grow in the Ontario market and the need to provide opportunities for workers to get involved in and initiate economic change.

A discussion paper including draft legislation was released to the public on August 15, 1991. The present bill, An Act to provide for the Creation and Registration of Labour Sponsored Venture Capital Corporations to Invest in Eligible Ontario Businesses and to make certain other amendments, was introduced after consultation with business, labour and other investment groups.

The consultation process gave us some excellent ideas on program policy and administrative design, which resulted in improvements and changes to the original proposal. This approach is part of the government's commitment to a process which not only listens to the people of Ontario but also responds to their needs and concerns.

As I mentioned earlier, the present bill represents two programs in one. The first will provide a tax credit to encourage anyone in Ontario to invest in a portfolio of small and medium-sized businesses through a labour-sponsored investment fund. Under the bill before us today, Ontario residents who invest in the fund will get an Ontario tax credit of 20% on the first $3,500 invested annually and a matching 20% federal tax credit.

The second part of the program will provide enhanced tax credits to encourage employee ownership through an employee ownership labour-sponsored venture capital corporation. Employee ownership will be limited to investments in the employer's business. Workers investing in their employer's business will be entitled to receive an Ontario tax credit of 20% on the first $3,500 and 30% on the next $11,500 invested annually in an employee ownership corporation. An employee's total tax credits are limited to a lifetime investment of $150,000.

The federal government has agreed to deliver the Ontario tax credits for both parts of the program in keeping with the Canada-Ontario tax collection agreement.

The Minister of Revenue will be responsible for administering the legislation. In addition, there are also functions to be undertaken by the Ministry of Industry, Trade and Technology's Employee Ownership Advisory Board, the Ontario Labour Relations Board and the Ontario Securities Commission. The Employee Ownership Advisory Board will review, evaluate and make recommendations on the commercial viability of the employees' proposed investment. The Ontario Labour Relations Board will conduct the employee votes and ensure that only those who are eligible vote. The Ontario Securities Commission will administer certain investor protection provisions of the program.

This program is expected to provide new sources of equity capital, increase productivity and competitiveness, create and maintain jobs and build better relationships between business, labour and government, all of which should help contribute to stabilizing Ontario's economy.

Since the introduction of this bill in November and following second reading debate in December, Spruce Falls has been pre-registered as an employee ownership labour-sponsored venture capital corporation, and Working Ventures has been pre-registered as a labour-sponsored investment fund. Investors in both of these corporations have now received their 1991 tax credit certificates. Employees of Spruce Falls have invested $9.7 million and received $2.55 million dollars in tax credits. Approximately 10,000

Ontario residents have invested $28.3 million into Working Ventures and received $5.67 million in tax credit.

Working with these corporations has given the government experience in the application of the bill, experience which is not normally available until after a bill is passed. Based on these observations, the government is tabling policy amendments to ensure more appropriate approaches to investor protection for employee ownership labour-sponsored venture capital corporations and to reinforce democratic voting processes. There are also a number of additional amendments that support these issues and otherwise improve the administration of the program.

With respect to labour-sponsored investment funds, investor protection will be under the jurisdiction of the Ontario Securities Act. However, in recognition of special investor requirements, the employee ownership investor protection provisions will be administered under this bill.

Bill 150 is an example of this government's commitment to achieving the objective of sustainable prosperity.

I have asked my officials, supported by our colleagues from Treasury, Industry, Trade and Technology, Labour and Financial Institutions, to make a presentation of the legislative framework of Bill 150, to provide a context for the following presentations.

The Chair: Could I call on Mr John Whitehead, the manager of personal income and payroll taxes in the Ministry of Treasury and Economics. That's quite a title.

Mr John Whitehead: I'd like to follow on the minister's comments, if I may, beginning with budget paper E of the 1991 budget document, in which the government noted that the paper was devoted to a discussion of equitable structural change in the economy.

In that document the Treasurer noted that "public policies and private sector practices to provide workers with the security and influence necessary to enable them to accept and initiate change" would be necessary, as well as the need for "greater investment in infrastructure, technology and innovation" and "exploration of better ways to channel the capital resources of Ontario to finance restructuring and promote regional development."

Following shortly on the heels of this budget, as the minister noted, the Treasurer issued public statements on the government's interest in introducing a program to encourage investment and worker ownership.

When the consultation paper and draft legislation were released in August, Treasury, along with colleagues from MITT, Labour, Financial Institutions and Revenue, met with a number of groups and individuals representing business, labour and investment groups.

The consultations, which were held mostly throughout September 1991, resulted in a number of modifications and improvements being made to the original draft legislation. We also benefited from the experiences and legislation available in other provinces in Canada.

The amendments that are being brought forward today I would characterize as being mostly technical items dealing with non-policy-related issues. Some are the result of experience gained through the first few months of the program, as the minister noted, and some reflect concerns that were raised at second reading of the bill.

Again, as the minister noted, the worker ownership program is actually composed of two components. Their primary common feature is that they both encourage investment in Ontario businesses by Ontario residents. The labour-sponsored investment fund corporation component encourages investment indirectly by allowing Ontario residents to invest in labour-sponsored investment fund corporations, which in turn invest in small and medium-sized businesses in the province. The program also encourages direct investment in firms where employee groups wish to become owners of the firm.

Each component of the program has its own objectives. For the labour-sponsored investment funds, it is to provide small and medium-sized companies with a new source of capital which they can use to modernize, for growth and for restructuring of their operations. For the employee ownership component, it is to facilitate worker ownership in order to increase productivity through participation in the workplace. It will help maintain jobs by supporting viable companies that may otherwise close and should go to improving management and labour relations by improving the awareness on both sides of the challenges facing each.

Individuals will obtain their tax credits by filing annual personal income tax returns. The 1991 income tax return contains this program now. Individuals make their investments with after-tax dollars. The tax credits will serve to reduce Ontario income tax, but they are not refundable, and unclaimed tax credits can be carried forward for up to five years to reduce future Ontario taxes if the individual did not have sufficient tax in the year to offset the credit amount. Altogether, the program will probably come in at about $8 million for this fiscal year, and at maturity could cost the province up to about $250 million, depending on the take-up.

The labour-sponsored investment fund corporation component is consistent in virtually all respects with the federal labour-sponsored venture capital corporation program. Prior to the budget, annual investment limits of up to $3,500 for tax credits at a rate of 20% were available. The Treasurer announced in the 1992 budget that Ontario would parallel recent federal changes to their program. As a result, Ontario residents will be able to invest in a labour-sponsored investment fund corporation up to $5,000 a year for tax credits of up to $1,000 a year. The investments made under Ontario's LSIF program are matched by federal credits.

1030

The key differences between our program and the federal program are the carry forward of unclaimed tax credits, reduced recapture where market value has declined, the length of holding of shares until tax credits are not recaptured. With respect to the labour-sponsored investment fund component, I would note that a number of other provinces have similar programs, including Quebec, Saskatchewan, BC and Manitoba.

With respect to the employee ownership component, control of the business must change in order to qualify for the tax credits. The employees can acquire the business on their own or together with a significant partner, as was the case, I would note, in the Kapuskasing deal. Control can be acquired immediately or over the term of a business investment plan filed by the applicant.

The difference in funding requirements between the general investment and mutual fund vehicle in purchase of a specific business is recognized with higher investment limits. On the labour-sponsored investment fund corporation's side of it, an individual is allowed to invest $5,000 in a year. Under the employee ownership component, a tax credit of 20% on the first $3,500 invested is provided and a tax credit of 30% on the next $11,500 of investment is also to be provided. The higher credit amount for the second level of investments that an individual might undertake in his own firm reflects the greater risk to the employee of the higher level of personal investment.

As the minister has noted in her speech, this process involves a number of different ministries, and indeed the creation of the programs certainly involved a number of ministries. The administration of the program will also involve a number of ministries, but together the provisions of this program should go to encouraging otherwise viable businesses to be run by their employees, and will assist the employees in making those decisions.

I think that concludes my remarks.

MINISTRY OF INDUSTRY, TRADE AND TECHNOLOGY

The Chair: The next presenter is from the Ministry of Industry, Trade and Technology; Mr Bob Marrs, manager, employee ownership section. Welcome to the committee.

Mr Bob Marrs: Good morning. I'm just passing out some slides that will help you follow through the involvement of the Ministry of Industry, Trade and Technology in this new program.

Broadly speaking, the ministry has two roles in this. One will be to act as the economic development agent to encourage, where appropriate, employee buyouts of their firms, whether it be the divestiture of a division of a large corporation, a retiring owner or a variety of scenarios. The other is mandated in the act and includes two roles. It includes the role of the advisory board in evaluating proposals, and the role of the independent investment adviser to advise employees about the merits of their investment.

To walk you through that process, I would ask you to turn to the chart which is three pages in. MITT intends to have an evaluation program that will provide financial assistance to employee groups that want to look at whether this option is feasible. It'll be broken down in two stages. The first will be a cost-shared study with the ministry and the employee group. Up to $25,000 will enable them to hire a consultant to go out and evaluate that proposal.

The second would be to assist them in structuring the deal and putting the business plan together and making application to the board. The advisory board will receive the applications, review them in terms of reasonable commercial viability and the equitableness or the fairness to the employees, and then that will be measured in terms of price and the broadness of the participation by the employee group, the kind of structure that would be put in place and the human resources plan and just a general review of the prospects for success.

At that point an investment adviser will be retained by the employees. We will have a roster or some other similar basis on which employee groups will select an independent adviser who will, at the time they receive a disclosure document from the Ontario Securities Commission, sit down with the employees in town hall sessions or in face-to-face meetings and discuss the merits of those proposals. At that point, then the employees will make an informed investment in terms of the project.

The evaluation program I guess is going to focus on three things. In our research we've seen in the United States, they indicate that, broadly speaking, there's three factors you need to flush out fairly early: (1) Is there a committed employee group and is there broad participation? (2) Is the firm viable? (3) Is the current owner amenable and cooperative so there can be a smooth transition? The feasibility study upfront will of course address the viability, and the employees will be putting up half the funds for the study, so that will be some indication of the support.

The concept of having the two stages: When you look at the decision the employees will be taking, in some cases the option will be a plant closure, and what I think we want to accomplish is that employees look at this as one among a number of employment options that will face them and they will be able to make a quick determination about the merits of pursuing this course or going on and finding alternative employment.

The advisory board, as indicated, is made up of members of business, labour and government sectors. We'll likely have six members, two from each sector to start, and they will be evaluating based on the mandate indicated in section 42.

As I said earlier, MITT sees this as a potential for a situation where there are retiring owners or businesses that have divisions that are profitable that are not being effectively exploited in their current configuration. It might make sense in the hands of the employees. We see them being poor potential where there's excess capacity, they're consolidating plants and the decision to close has been made and you're trying to look at it retrospectively.

In terms of the US experience, their program is not exactly comparable, but they've had about 10,000 ESOPs over the life of their program and about 4% of those relate to employee buyouts. I guess that briefly outlines where MITT is.

1040

MINISTRY OF FINANCIAL INSTITUTIONS

The Chair: The next speaker is from the Ministry of Financial Institutions, Julie-Luce Farrell. I thought all the presenters would be sitting at one time and there were going to be questions. Just keep your papers for later on, if you can.

Ms Julie-Luce B. Farrell: Good morning. My remarks on behalf of MFI will be limited to disclosure, investor protection regimes and the role of the OSC.

As you are aware, there are separate regulatory regimes established for employee ownerships and the investment funds. These regimes will operate independently and reflect the distinct nature of both EOs and the investment funds. They will achieve the same objectives, to enable potential investors to make informed decisions about the investments made available to them under Bill 150.

First, we'll discuss the regulation of employee ownership, which I'll refer to as EOs. The securities regulatory regime will prescribe a disclosure document to be given to all employees in connection with any distribution of shares of an EO.

The disclosure document will comply with the requirements of the act and the regulations. The disclosure document will contain a summary of information relevant to the EO and the eligible business in which the EO proposes to invest, including a summary of the business, investment and human resources plan for the eligible business after the EO buyout, disclosure of other material facts relevant to an investment decision, and prescribed health warning language relating to the illiquid and speculative nature of the investment.

The board of directors of the EO will be required to certify as to the accuracy and full disclosure of the information in the disclosure document. If the disclosure document contains any misrepresentations, including material errors and/or omissions, civil liability will be imposed under Bill 150 on the EO, its directors, promoters and others, and investors will have rescission rights.

The disclosure document and business plan or, if any portions of the business plan are to be kept confidential, those portions of the business plan in respect of which confidentiality is not asserted, will be filed with the OSC. The staff of the OSC will review the disclosure document to ensure that it complies with the technical requirements of Bill 150 and the regulations.

No employee vote can take place, the EO cannot be registered under the act, and no shares can be sold to the employees until a final receipt for the disclosure document is issued by the commission. Staff of the OSC will not issue a final receipt if it appears that the disclosure document does not fairly reflect the business plan or fails to comply with the formal requirement of the code. A clearly stated objective is that the disclosure document will be in plain language and adequately disclose the risk involved.

Arrangements relating to the regulation of flow of investment funds will be prescribed under the regulations to ensure that funds provided by employees are actually received by the EOs and used to invest in the eligible businesses. The OSC will monitor these arrangements.

Continuous disclosure: EOs will be subject to a number of ongoing disclosure obligations intended to ensure that employees are constantly aware of the changes in the EO's business that may affect the value of their investment, including disclosure of material changes, circulation of unaudited quarterly and audited financial statements, and valuations audited and quarterly unaudited will be filed with the OSC and placed in the public file which the OSC maintains.

On other matters, the regulation will also cover takeover bid regulation, proxy solicitation and insider reporting obligations, which will be regulated by the OSC and will mirror the requirements of the Ontario Securities Act.

On other issues, given the role of the board, of the independent adviser and of the OSC, given the regulation of flow of funds and also given the nature of the economic decision that employees are expected to make, there will be requirements under Bill 150 that registration be required to sell the shares of the EOs.

Now, for the regulation of the funds: For most purposes, the funds will be treated as mutual funds, subject to the same requirements under the act as those applicable to mutual funds. However, certain modifications will be required.

The disclosure normally contained in a prospectus of a mutual fund will be supplemented by additional requirements to reflect the distinct nature of the funds as an investment instrument. "Health warning" language will be required relating to the speculative and illiquid nature of these investments.

The investment criteria and objectives of the funds are distinct from the current investment criteria for mutual funds under the Ontario Securities Act. Those specific business investments and other restrictions on mutual funds which differ from those of Bill 150 will be modified to accommodate the investment criteria of Bill 150.

That disclosure document will be reviewed by the staff of the commission, and a receipt will be required before any distribution of funds securities will be permitted. The receipting of those prospectuses under the OSA will be based on compliance with Bill 150 requirements.

It is proposed that securities of the funds be distributed by securities dealers and also by mutual fund dealers registered with the OSC, who, however, will meet certain prescribed additional proficiency requirements which will be developed by the OSC in consultation with the Investment Funds Institute of Canada.

As for continuous disclosure, documents with respect to the funds will be filed with the OSC and also placed in the public file maintained by the commission.

The code will also provide for regulation of ancillary mutual fund matters such as advertising rules.

In the general application, secondary market transactions will also be addressed in the code, including the appropriateness of Ontario Securities Act rules relating to such matters.

Enforcement matters relating to the code will be dealt with by the OSC.

That concludes my remarks.

The Chair: Thank you.

MINISTRY OF REVENUE

The Chair: The next presenter is Mr Jim Evans, executive director, revenue services and operations division, from the Ministry of Revenue.

Mr Jim Evans: Good morning. If I may, I'd like to stand and use the overhead.

The Chair: Can you sit there so the mike will pick up your voice? I think you can operate the slide projector also.

Mr Evans: I'll do my best.

The Chair: Do you need someone to put the slides on for you?

Mr Evans: I will attempt to put them on myself and if that proves difficult we'll move to the alternative.

As the minister has described, the Ministry of Revenue has overall responsibility for the act, and my colleagues who have spoken before me have addressed the roles of the other ministries that are principally involved: Treasury from the perspective of policy, MITT in relation to the advisory board, and MIF and the OSC in relation to investor protection.

The presentation I am going to provide now is a description of the overall background and responsibility of the act as administered by the minister and the Ministry of Revenue.

Bill 150, as has been described, provides for the creation and registration of labour-sponsored venture capital corporations to invest in eligible Ontario businesses and for Ontario tax credits to eligible investors who have purchased shares.

The legislation is intended to advance the government's economic renewal agenda principally through the expansion of the capital markets to provide business with access to new sources of capital, to help them grow and adapt to new technologies and increase globalization of the market.

It is intended to initiate partnerships committed to the development of innovative programs to help Ontario meet the economic challenge of the 1990s; encourage individuals to invest in Ontario businesses and facilitate employee ownership; provide labour with greater opportunities for participation in the decision-making process, and develop new partnerships between business, labour and government to help Ontario increase productivity, improve labour-management relations and set the groundwork for sustained prosperity.

1050

As the minister has described, the Treasurer announced in the Legislature on June 20, 1991, the government's intentions to introduce this new program and thereby to provide workers with the opportunity to invest in their own and other companies and to provide business with access to equity capital to modernize and restructure operations.

Further details were announced on July 31, 1991, and on August 15, 1991. Draft legislation and a discussion paper entitled Ontario Investment and Worker Ownership Program: A Proposal for Discussion were released. During August and September, the government consulted with the public. As a result of the consultation process, improvements and modifications were made to the program, and Bill 150 received first reading on November 6, 1991, and second reading on December 18, 1991.

The program design of the bill does provide for two different types of labour-sponsored venture capital corporations: the employee ownership labour-sponsored venture capital corporations, which we describe as the EOs or employee ownerships for short, and the labour-sponsored investment funds, the LSIFs, sometimes referred to by us merely as "the funds."

The program is administered by the Ministry of Revenue, as you have heard this morning, with the exceptions of the employee ownership function, the Ontario Labour Relations Board in relation to the administration of voting and the Ontario Securities Commission in relation to certain aspects of investor protection.

There is also an intergovernmental relationship within this program and that describes the role of the Revenue Canada—Taxation working with the Ministry of Revenue for the administration of tax credits through the income tax process. Interministerially, the Ministry of Industry, Trade and Technology is responsible for the Employee Ownership Advisory Board, the Ministry of Labour for the Ontario Labour Relations Board, and the Ministry of Financial Institutions and the Ontario Securities Commission in relation to investor protection.

Within the Ministry of Revenue, there are two organizations involved, the business investment plans section and the guaranteed income and tax credit branch in relation to the certificates.

The basic sequence of steps as it relates to the investment funds has the investment funds being established by a provincially recognized trade union. It has MFI and the OSC providing aspects of investor protection. The Ministry of Revenue will provide ongoing program administration to ensure compliance with the act, and the federal government will deliver the tax credits. In the case of the funds, it will match those credits.

In relation to the administration of the employee ownership labour-sponsored venture capital corporations, the Employee Ownership Advisory Board will, as we have heard in the presentation, review, evaluate and make recommendations on the commercial viability of the proposed investments. The Ontario Securities Commission will administer certain aspects of the investor protection and review the disclosure documents, as we have also heard this morning.

There is an independent adviser in the process to provide a third-party review for the employees considering forming such a group. The Ontario Labour Relations Board will conduct the vote and ensure that only eligible employees vote. At that point, if the approval and support are provided by all of those participants, the labour-sponsored venture capital corporation can set itself up as an eligible investor and apply to the Ministry of Revenue for registration. The Ministry of Revenue will then provide ongoing program administration and the federal government will deliver the tax credits against tax certificates that have been issued by the Ministry of Revenue. In this case there is no matching participation by the federal government.

A brief schematic of how the labour-sponsored investment fund cycle will work is that the recognized labour organization will establish the fund and it will seek to sell class A shares to shareholders, for which it will receive investment. It will then onward provide that investment to the small and medium-sized corporations in exchange for minority positions in those corporations. Under the fund, the labour-sponsored investment fund does not ordinarily take controlling positions in any of the small businesses in which it is investing.

At the present time, as provided by the bill before us, the eligible investors receive 20% Ontario tax credits on the first $3,500 invested annually and there is a matching 20% federal government credit. The maximum credit therefore is $1,400, $700 provincially and $700 federally. As John has otherwise described, the federal budget and now the Treasurer have introduced proposals for increasing both the limit and the amount of the tax credit, the limit going to $5,000 and the maximum credit going to $1,000 each provincially and federally. The design of the labour-sponsored investment fund part of the legislation has been based on the federal legislation and therefore conforms to it in order to qualify for the matching federal tax credits.

In terms of registration, an employee organization may form a corporation for registration as a labour-sponsored investment fund by the Ministry of Revenue. That employee organization must be a trade union or association or a federation of trade unions that is recognized provincially. Federally registered labour-sponsored venture capital corporations will also qualify for registration as LSIFs by the Ministry of Revenue provided they adhere to the eligibility requirements of this act.

Eligible investors may be any Ontario resident who purchases newly issued class A shares of the investment fund registered under this act. A class A share entitles the holder to attend and vote at all shareholders' meetings, receive dividends at the discretion of the board of directors and receive an apportioned share of the investment fund's funds upon dissolution.

Tax incentives: Eligible investors will receive the combined personal income tax credit of 40%, 20% provincial and 20% federal, as previously described, on investments under the bill as it presently stands to $3,500 annually, but as proposed, to $5,000. The unused portions of any tax credits are not refundable on the investment fund side and therefore cannot be carried forward for application in any other taxation year. Generally, an investor in a fund will be making an investment as a matter of choice and will manage his investments accordingly.

Eligible businesses must be taxable Canadian corporations or Canadian partnerships that are active in any industry in Ontario. There are no bars as to the type of industry or business that can be eligible under this act. The business's total assets cannot exceed $35 million under the bill as it presently stands—it will be $50 million under the modified budget proposal—and there can be no more than 500 employees. That has not been changed by the budget proposal. At least 50% or more of its full-time employees must be employed in a business activity carried on in Ontario and the business must pay 50% of its wages and salaries to employees whose place of work is ordinarily at a permanent establishment in Ontario.

1100

An investment by a fund in an eligible business will be considered eligible if the investment is the purchase of newly issued shares of the eligible business, the purchase of a partnership interest in the eligible business, an unsecured loan or a secured loan. A fund may also participate as an equity partner with employee ownership labour-sponsored venture capital corporations as a significant investor and an investment fund may invest up to one third of its assets in replacement debt and equity under those circumstances.

The primary purpose, as we have described and as otherwise heard under this bill, is the injection or infusion of new capital. So that's why those limits are in place.

Eligibility requirements: A fund is restricted to investing no more than the lesser of $10 million or 10% of its equity capital in any one eligible business. At least 70% of the fund's issued capital must be invested in eligible businesses within 24 months following the fiscal year in which the class A shares of the fund were issued. This level must then be continuously maintained to remain in compliance with the act. The fund is restricted to a minority position in any eligible business, except that a fund is permitted to take control of the eligible business for a period of no more than one year, where by doing so it would assist in preventing the insolvency of the eligible business or might assist in the restoration of the eligible business to solvency or transfer control of the eligible business to another person. By doing so, the fund is then protecting its investment in the business.

Share valuation: The shares of the fund must be valued annually by an independent qualified person and by quarterly updates of the management of the fund. It is the intention of the fund that it is making long-term investments in business. Therefore, the shares must be held for at least five years to avoid tax credit recapture provisions.

Redemption within five years will result in the recapture of the tax credit, unless the original shareholder dies, becomes permanently disabled or suffers long-term illness, reaches the age of 65 or retires and has otherwise held the shares for a minimum of two years.

Transfer of shares within that period therefore results in recapture, unless those previously mentioned circumstances prevail or the funds are being transferred into an RRSP by the original purchaser. The recapture will be based on the lesser of fair market value of the shares at the time of redemption or transfer or the original tax credit where the shares have appreciated in value. In relation to the sizing of the funds, there is a minimum of $25,000 capitalization proposal, but there is no upper limit.

In summary, the features of the fund provide for the Ontario tax credit of 20% on the first $3,500 of eligible investments, moving to $5,000 on eligible investments based on the budget proposal. An eligible investor may be any individual resident of Ontario. The eligible business must be active in any industry in Ontario and there will be federal matching and delivery of the tax credits. The business's total assets cannot exceed $35 million, and there can be no more than 500 employees. At least 50% or more of the business's full-time employees must be employed in business activity carried on in Ontario, and the business must pay at least 50% of its salaries and wages to people who are ordinarily employed at a permanent establishment in Ontario.

The employee ownership labour-sponsored venture capital corporation investment cycle: Typically, a corporation will be formed by eligible employees and these employees can be any employee group. It is not limited to a recognized trade union or organization of trade unions. The intention is that they create the employee ownership labour-sponsored venture capital corporation and issue class A shares, which are voting shares, to shareholders in exchange for share capital. Those moneys are then used to gain control of the employer corporation, and that can be through an investment that is 50% of the voting shares of the corporation or in conjunction with another significant investor. It can be 40%, but control must change hands.

The federal government will not match tax credits for an investment in shares of the employee ownership labour-sponsored venture capital corporation. This is a function of the eligibility to form a function of the size. There is no upper limit in the provincial legislation—the bill now before you.

Employee vote: Employees vote on whether to purchase their employer's firm once the Employee Ownership Advisory Board has formally reviewed the proposal, as we heard this morning from Bob Marrs. The employees have been provided with the disclosure document and with advice relating to the proposed investment by an independent investor, as we've heard from Julie-Luce Farrell. The Ontario Labour Relations Board will conduct the vote and ensure that only eligible employees vote.

The vote is conducted to answer the following questions: Do you support the application for registration of the corporation as an employee ownership labour-sponsored venture capital corporation under the Labour Sponsored Venture Capital Corporations Act? Do you support the proposed investment in the corporation for the purpose of reinvestment in your employer as outlined in the business, human resource and investment plans to be filed under the Labour Sponsored Venture Capital Corporations Act? If a majority of employees' votes are cast in support of these questions, the corporation formed by the employees can apply for registration as an employee ownership labour-sponsored venture capital corporation with the Ministry of Revenue.

The approval process requires that a corporation formed by the employees of their employer's firm will be registered by Revenue as an employee ownership labour-sponsored venture capital corporation once the Employee Ownership Advisory Board has evaluated the proposals; the independent adviser has provided the employees with advice relating to the proposed investment; employees are in receipt of a disclosure document; once the Ontario Securities Commission has issued its final receipt of that document; the corporation has received approval through the order in council by the Lieutenant Governor in Council; the employees have voted in favour of purchasing the employer's firm and have met any other registration requirements as provided for in the bill with the Ministry of Revenue.

The board will have equal representation from business, labour and government, as has previously been described, and the board's recommendations are submitted to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Technology prior to referral to cabinet for approval by an order in council by the Lieutenant Governor in Council. An interim board is in operation until such time as the permanent board is established.

Eligible investors, as have been described, are Ontario residents who are eligible employees of the employer firm. An eligible employee is described as any individual who has been employed by his or her employer firm on a continuous basis for an average of at least 15 hours each week, either on a year-round or regular seasonal basis.

The tax incentives are: Ontario will provide a 20% tax credit on the first $3,500 invested and 30% on the next $11,500 invested annually to provide for a total of $15,000 in any year. There is a lifetime maximum limit for tax credits issued to an eligible employee of $150,000. These amendments are not modified by budget proposals. The unused portion of the tax credit is not refundable but, in the case of the employee, ownership components can be carried forward for tax credit purposes for the next five succeeding years.

1110

The business must be a taxable Canadian corporation or Canadian partnership that is active in any industry in Ontario and the business must pay at least 25% of its wages and salaries to employees whose ordinary place of employment is a permanent establishment in Ontario.

An employee ownership labour-sponsored venture capital corporation is permitted to invest in only one eligible business and that eligible business is the employee's place of employment. An employee ownership labour-sponsored venture capital corporation may invest in newly issued or existing shares of a corporation or new or existing ownership interest in a partnership.

At least 80% of the employee ownership labour-sponsored venture capital corporation's equity capital must be invested in an eligible business within one year after the fiscal year in which the class A shares were issued to the shareholders of the employee ownership corporation, and this level must then be continuously maintained.

Where there is no outside investor, the employee ownership corporation must acquire over 50% of the issued and outstanding shares or ownership interest of an eligible business. Control must also be acquired within the time period specified in the approved employee ownership labour-sponsored venture capital corporation business plan.

If the purchase of the eligible business involves investment by both outside investors and the employee ownership corporation, then the employee ownership labour-sponsored venture capital corporation must acquire at least 40% ownership. The key point here is that, on all occasions, control of the eligible business must change hands. Shares of the employee ownership corporation must be valued annually by an independent, qualified person, with quarterly updates by management.

Any investor who holds shares for less than five years will be subject to recapture, unless the redemption within the five-year holding period is as a result of death, the shareholder becoming permanently disabled or suffering long-term illness, has reached the age of 65 or retires and has held the shares under those circumstances for a minimum of two years or has been involuntarily laid off from the corporation.

Transfers within the five-year holding period result in recapture of the credits unless those conditions previously described exist or unless the shares are being transferred, to be held in a registered retirement savings plan. The recapture will be based on the lesser of the fair market value of the shares at the time of redemption or transfer or the original tax credit.

The capitalization limits of the employee ownership labour-sponsored venture capital corporations are a minimum of $25,000, with the upper limit being determined and described by the business plan as approved through the order in council by the Lieutenant Governor in Council. If any additional capital is to be raised by way of secondary subscription, approval must be obtained from the Lieutenant Governor in Council before that action is taken.

The key summary features of the employee ownership labour-sponsored venture capital corporations are:

An Ontario tax credit of 20% on the first $3,500 and 30% on the next $11,500 of investment invested annually, with a lifetime limit of $150,000.

An eligible investor is an employee of the employer corporation.

An eligible business must be active in any industry in Ontario that is paying at least 25% of its wages and salaries to workers who are ordinarily employed at permanent establishments in Ontario and, with the employee ownership labour-sponsored venture capital corporation, there is no matching tax credit.

That concludes my presentation.

The Chair: Thank you, Mr Evans. Maybe you can stay there, because there will be questions coming up very shortly, but we have one more presenter, actually, Mr Gerry Sholtack. He's the director of legal services for the Ministry of Revenue, and he's going to give us a short explanation on the amendments to the bill.

Mr Gerry Sholtack: Good morning, ladies and gentlemen. You all have a package of the amendments that are being tabled by the government. The first two pages constitute an index of those amendments. They are indexed by number. However, they can be categorized under general headings which have been touched on today. The bulk of the amendments deal with the implementation of the investor protection code.

If I might go through them, the investor protection codes amend subsection 1(1) to provide definitions; that's item 2 on the index. Section 1 provides that shares of a specified employee ownership corporation are not subject to the Securities Act, and when the corporation will cease to be a specified employee ownership corporation. The purpose of this amendment is to take the EOs out of the operation of the Securities Act and, as we'll see later, provide for the making of an investor code regulation under the act itself, under Bill 150.

There are provisions to delete, as I said, the reference to the Securities Act; that's item 6 on your index.

Item 35 is an amendment to section 32. The minister is authorized to make inquiries to ensure compliance with the act and may designate the Ontario Securities Commission or the director to make such inquiries, and on that designation they have the same powers as provided under parts III and VI of the Securities Act.

Section 34, which is 36 on your index, provides for higher fines for false and misleading statements in disclosure documents.

Item 37 on your index provides a number of amendments: additions to the act authorizing the minister to apply for a court order to ensure compliance with the act; permitting the minister to issue cease-trading orders on the recommendation of the director; or if the minister is entitled to revoke registration this permits the securities commission or the director to prevent the further sale of shares should there be problems with a particular EO.

Other changes authorize the minister to designate the securities commission or director to exercise her powers under 34.1 or 34.2, which are the changes I just alluded to. There are provisions for an appeal from the order of the director or the securities commission. Also, 34.5 will require the provisions of a disclosure document to be given to purchasers of shares. Section 34.6 provides for civil remedies to investors who suffer loss due to misrepresentations contained in disclosure documents.

Section 35.1 extends the immunity provisions in the act to the OSC and the director and other designated persons performing regulatory functions. In section 35.2 no person will be liable to another for complying with the act or directions, decisions, orders or rulings under the act.

The amendment to section 37, which is 39 in your index, authorizes the making of regulations to implement the investor protection regime applicable to EO. It's an extensive amendment, and that will allow all the various authority necessary to allow the cabinet, on the advice of the Minister of Financial Institutions, to implement the provisions of the investor protection regime.

1120

Section 48 is the equivalent provision for the LSIFs. That in fact is an amendment to the Securities Act and will permit the cabinet, on the recommendation of the Minister of Financial Institutions, to provide for regulations to implement the investor protection code for the LSIFs.

The second main area covered by the amendments deals with the voting procedures to be followed by the EO before it is registered under the act. The main provision is section 4, which provides specifically for the questions to be asked of the employees, whether they approve the registration of an EO and the proposed investment in the employer corporation.

The vote will be conducted by the Ontario Labour Relations Board based on its own procedural rules. There are requirements to be met before the vote will be ordered, basically that the employees receive the disclosure document, that the independent adviser has given his or her advice and that the proposed investment has been reviewed by the employee ownership advisory board. Those three conditions have to be satisfied before the vote can be held.

The Ontario Labour Relations Board will also be able to determine who is an eligible employee in the case of a dispute. As well, the concept of "employee group" is deleted as being unnecessary, and there are a number of changes consequent to that contained in the package whose purpose is to strike out the words "employee group."

Finally, subsection 5(1), which is number 4 in your index, provides for the registration of the EO if at least 50% of the votes are cast in favour of the application and the proposed investment.

There are a number of other areas of amendment. Three amendments relate to the change in case of decline of share value. The amendments provide that where the fair market value of the shares of an EO declines below its issue price any recapture that becomes necessary will be reduced proportionally, and that applies both to the EO and the LSIF shares.

Another area involves amendment with respect to permitted share transfers within the five-year holding period. There are two amendments there. Essentially, class A shares can be transferred within the holding period if the recapture has been paid. That's another option that's added, that if an individual wishes to transfer the shares within that five-year period, he must pay the recapture. Then he can transfer it.

There are also two amendments to clarify the role of the employee ownership advisory board. Clause 26(1)(c) provides that any change of control by an EO within the five years of a share issue must be approved by the board and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Technology. Also, under clause 42(1)(a) the board will review the entire proposal made by the EO to determine whether it's equitable and commercially viable over the contemplated time periods.

As well, a number of amendments relate to the removal of restrictions on investments by a labour-sponsored investment fund. They broaden the ability of the labour-sponsored investment fund to invest in non-voting as well as voting shares. They also permit investment in secured investments that are secured by a floating-charge debenture.

As well, the labour-sponsored investment fund would be entitled to majority ownership interest in an eligible business so long as it does not control the eligible business. With shareholding and non-voting shares, it's possible for a labour-sponsored investment fund to have majority ownership. As long as it does not have control, that keeps it on side the act.

Finally, there's a list of miscellaneous amendments. Clause 6(1)(h) is the removal of the requirement that employee ownership be in the name of the corporation. There is removal of any reference to a federal tax credit for EOs, as there is no matching credit.

Subsection 13(1) will require the LSIF to have a permanent establishment in Ontario. Subsection 27(4) clarifies that a reduction in stated capital of LSIFs is not to include share redemptions and that any recapture of tax credits on such redemption does not include any federal tax credits.

Section 28 eliminates interest on refundable penalty imposed on LSIFs which fail to meet minimum required level of eligible investments. Section 29 clarifies that no interest is payable on recaptured tax credits, and for amounts deemed to be taxed under the Corporations Tax Act, it only authorizes the minister to use the legal remedies available under that act to enforce collection and debt.

Finally, there's clarification that ensures that under the Income Tax Act, 1991 is the first year for which credits are eligible for investments in LSIFs.

The Chair: You might as well just keep a seat there; Mr Evans, perhaps you can come up to the front. The minister's been called away on another issue. Would Mr Whitehead and Mr Marrs take a seat up here. Please put your names up there so we can start rotation on questions and we don't have to keep coming back and forth to the mike and lose time.

We'll start off with the third party. It looks like we've got a total of about half an hour, so we'll divide it up. Let's call it 10 minutes each. If you don't take the full 10 minutes, we'll save the time until the end.

Mr Gary Carr (Oakville South): First of all, thanks to everyone for coming to the presentation and also to those of you who participated earlier in the week in our informal one. I appreciate it very much. I guess I'll throw my questions out to whomever; I'll start and just throw them out.

The cost of the program is going to be $250 million; that is what I think John said at one point. That's based on how many companies, John, and what figures did you base that on? Did you start with the $250 million the Treasurer gave you or did you work back and say these are the number of companies you want to help?

Mr Whitehead: In a new program, it's always difficult to estimate precisely what the costs are. I believe what I said, or I hope what I said, was up to $250 million. It really depends on the takeup of the program. At this stage it would be hard for us to pin down a precise number. Unfortunately, there's not a lot of experience rating even within the country on programs similar to this. A number of provinces have the equivalent of our labour-sponsored investment fund component, but the employee ownership component, which is likely to be the biggest part of the program, has virtually no experience rating in the country that we can rely on at this stage.

We've done our best to estimate what we think will be a reasonable number. We're saying up to $250 million at this point. I'd argue that the ebb and flow of the economy and other external factors will also have a strong influence on that number. It's hard to be really precise about it. We've tried to give a dimension to the program.

Mr Carr: That's only the Ontario portion, too. The feds would kick in an equal amount as well.

Mr Whitehead: Yes. The federal government's share is over and above the costs that we've noted.

Mr Carr: In this committee we're used to not having exact figures, because in the economics and finance pre-budget, people are saying it depends. Even our economists obviously are just giving generalities. But again, how many companies do you anticipate would be looking at the program? I can throw that up to anybody. I don't know whether MITT would be better for that.

1130

Mr Marrs: On the EOs as a planning number, as I said earlier, we looked at the States and when you look at the buyouts they are 4% of the number of ESOPs that have been done. We've looked at British Columbia and they've done about 17, two of which are really employee buyouts. Saskatchewan's done a small number. Most of those have been contracting-out-type situations that wouldn't apply in Ontario.

I guess, as a base, we'd look at perhaps a couple of dozen or 30 companies that would come in, at least go through stage one of the study program, and perhaps half a dozen a year that would come out of that. Depending on who you talk to, that number is either dramatically lower or about right, but I guess it's hard to judge the impact on the taxpayer on this.

Mr Carr: We'll go where it will be judged at the end when we have the definite numbers. Of course, from the taxpayer's standpoint, they'll be looking at the total amount of employees for all the programs through MITT. They judge it on a per-job basis. If it's $100,000, $250,000 or $10,000, they will judge and say it's worth it.

Again, I just want to get an idea of where we are, knowing full well that a lot of our predictions are off. On that, Bob, you mentioned $25,000 worth of studies. I take it that is not included in the $250 million maximum we're talking about?

Mr Marrs: No.

Mr Carr: This is from existing funds or new funds that MITT will allocate, and again, that's the—

Mr Marrs: We're in the process of finalizing the allocation and I'm not sure whether that comes—

Mr Carr: But the way it's coming now, it's probably within the existing programs. That money will come from somewhere else within MITT, I take it, right?

Mr Marrs: I'm not sure whether we'll be getting some new funding or whether we'll get part of it in-house or how we'll—

Mr Carr: So you'll be doing about 30 companies, approximately up to $25,000. Multiply that. That will be additional money on top of the $250 million. In terms of MITT's time and cost, how much time and allocation—do you have resources of people set aside for this particular function?

Mr Marrs: Again, we haven't finalized the numbers. We're still looking, I hope, to have a couple of people on staff. That will get us started and then we'll gauge from there. I think you're looking at a relatively small staff.

Mr Carr: With all the figures, I gather we're still very preliminary here with everything, with this whole bill.

Mr Marrs: At MITT we intend to have a small staff and then we'll respond as the demand comes in.

Mr Carr: I'm interested in the criteria. Looking at it from the outside, the biggest criteria we're looking at—just off the top, what will be the most important ones? I may have missed it; you touched that portion. But when you're looking at the company, what will be the biggest factor towards getting money through MITT's standpoint? What will they say? Boy, if they meet these criteria, what will be the—

Mr Marrs: In terms of the initial study?

Mr Carr: Yes, meeting the initial study criteria.

Mr Marrs: Basically, there were three areas. One, do you have a committed employee group? Two, is the firm viable? I guess we'll be able to judge that in a superficial way initially and the study will go some way to addressing the issue there. Do you have a willing seller? Is there a time available to structure an appropriate deal that ensures employees have a good chance of making this a success?

Mr Carr: The whole program is based on the financial aspect of it. I know you've put a plan together for human resources, but the reason most of these people would get money is from the financial standpoint, because I know they're going to reach human resources' criteria. On that, you mentioned—again, I'm not sure who talked about the human resources plan. I'm thinking from the employee's standpoint. It does touch on labour and I know there are not too many people here from labour, but I guess through some of the regulations, maybe you could help us with this.

As an employee, I will be told that this is the situation we're looking at. This is the human resources side. I take it by human resources the plan will mean we're going to have to reduce to 20 employees or four or so on. That would be one of the big criteria, so that people will be voting on something, knowing full well we have 50 employees now; the business plan is 20. Everybody, all 50, would be voting on that. I see the heads nodding. That's true? Okay, good.

What relates to that, I take it right now—again, it's through the labour board. Is it a secret vote? You mentioned it will be the equal ones. Secret vote? Heads nodding, way in the back.

The Chair: Could you please answer, because Hansard has a hard time picking up nods. Mr Evans has some answers to the question, if you'd give him a chance to answer also.

Mr Evans: You made a comment earlier about the early nature of the program. The minister, in her opening statement, did indicate that we had issued tax certificates for 1991 to investors in Spruce Falls and to investors in Working Ventures. Spruce Falls is an employee ownership corporation; Working Ventures is a fund. There were 995 investors in Spruce Falls and they invested in the order of $9.6 million and received tax credits in the order of $2.5 million. In the case of Working Ventures, there were around 10,000 investors. They invested in the order of $28.3 million and received tax credits of $5.6 million.

Mr Marrs indicated that, yes, it is tentative. It is early and it's obviously going to be decided on the size and the nature of the businesses that come forward, whether they're labour-intensive or whether they're capital-intensive businesses. Those forecasts are extremely difficult to make, but we can share that factual information on the 1991 tax year.

Mr Carr: So we can get the details on Spruce Falls when, immediately?

Mr Evans: Spruce Falls, 995 investors; $9,648,100 invested; total tax credits paid, $2,552,338.

Mr Carr: But I was thinking in terms of—and I know it came through some of the disclosures—the business plan aspect of it. When will be that be made available?

Mr Evans: That was done through the Ontario Securities Commission, so I believe that information is on public record.

Mr Carr: Do you know, offhand, what the business plan calls for? Are they going to keep 995 employees? What are we looking at? Does anybody know?

Mr Evans: I do not know of any details that talk to a running down of the workforce at Spruce Falls.

The Chair: Mr Carr, I've got to carry on to Mr Kwinter.

Mr Carr: Time goes by so fast.

Mr Monte Kwinter (Wilson Heights): Thank you. Again, I don't know who's going to answer this question, but I just want to talk about a couple of general things.

The whole premise behind Bill 150 is to encourage employees and organized trade unions to invest in companies where they can either have ownership or provide venture capital. By its very nature, venture capital is risky. I assume there's unanimous agreement that these will be risky ventures to some extent and there's no guarantee they will all succeed. Some will survive; some will fail.

There's a provision that says there will be an Employee Ownership Advisory Board—and I underline the word “advisory”—and MITT will also take a look at the viability, the human resources, the financial implications and make recommendations to cabinet as to whether or not a particular proposal be registered under this act. Even if they do make the recommendations, there are some that will fail.

My question is this: What happens if, in a one-industry town, a corporation is in trouble or whatever—it doesn't have to necessarily be in trouble, but it could be—and the employees want to use this particular vehicle to finance an employee ownership. The advisory board and MITT suggest that it is not viable and yet these employees are determined that they want to save their company and they want to get ahead with it. What recourse do they have?

Mr Marrs: I guess the simple answer is they could proceed without tax credits.

1140

Mr Kwinter: All right. Then that leads to the next question. Why would they not be entitled to the same tax credits as someone who may have gotten the endorsement of the advisory board and MITT and fails? They may succeed, where, for whatever reason on paper, it doesn't seem they're going to succeed?

Mr Whitehead: I guess there probably is an opportunity to appeal the decision of the board, but it would seem to me that if the board ruled that it was not a reasonably commercially viable proposition, it would do so on the basis of very strong evidence. It would be unlikely, I would think, that you would have an independent adviser passing on it. You may have some difficulties in the OSC receipting the disclosure document. You may have a number of reasons. I guess it would depend on the situation, but it would seem to me an unusual circumstance where you would have all those bodies determining that the thing was fundamentally not viable and yet the employees being committed to proceeding.

Mr Evans: If I may, commercial viability is an important aspect of this program. Among other things, the government did not want to be inducing people, through the use of tax credits, to invest money since this is an investment of after-tax dollars into firms which had no reasonable prospects for success. Among other things, this program comes out of the government's desire to assist in a variety of ways the restructuring and growth of the economy. That objective wouldn't be well served by permitting tax credits in respect of firms which, for example, had no customers, or firms which were so badly saddled with debt that there was no prospect for immediate success or even success over the long term.

So the commercial viability aspect of the program becomes very important in the overall policy. It's a question of the appropriateness of government providing tax credits which may induce people to make investments which wouldn't otherwise make any sense.

Mr Kwinter: Without getting too political and without mentioning companies, there are several companies in Canada that are surviving even though they have no commercial viability, but because of government policy it is deemed essential that they keep operating because the alternative is worse than the losses they are incurring. There's every possibility that we could have that kind of situation, where it may be deemed advisable, for whatever reason, political or otherwise, to keep that company going. What I don't understand is why there would not be the same tax credits for those people who are investing.

Mr Evans: Yes, it is common policy that an industry or a company needs to be supported because the consequence of its failure would be more dramatic for a community, but that does not have to be through an employee ownership vehicle. Indeed, the whole point of the structure of the safeguards that are described in this bill in relation to the advisory board and the role of the Ontario Securities Commission and the Ministry of Revenue is geared towards investor protection, the protection of employees in what might otherwise be a fairly difficult period in terms of the employment decisions they are being invited to make. Bill 150, in relation to employee ownership, is not intended to be the only mechanism whereby governments make investments in essential industries, and the mechanisms, to answer your first point, are there as safeguards.

There is another point that you made in your opening comment, and that was in relation to employees and trade unions making investments. I want to make sure that I was clear in my own presentation, that although the trade unions are the people who may devise and operate the funds, the opportunity for investment in funds is available to any resident in Ontario. It is not a closed opportunity to invest in the funds; it is an open one.

Mr Kwinter: I understand that. Can I get a clarification on something that was said about, “The venture capital fund cannot own the company; the employee ownership must own the company”? In the employee ownership vehicle, they have to have at least 50%, unless there is an outside investor, and then they have to have 40%. Would you explain to me how that works, how they get control if there is one entity that has 50%, another entity has 10% that is not related in any way to the employee ownership group and the employee ownership group has 40%?

Mr Sholtack: I think in the circumstances of the provision of the act, as long as there is a change of control, that is sufficient. The employee ownership venture capital corporation plus the other investor together have more than 50%, so there would be a change of control. As long as that happens, then the act is satisfied.

The example of that is the Spruce Falls situation, where you had both an employee ownership group plus another investor. Together there was a change of control, so the two organizations would work together to control the employer corporation and that is sufficient for the act. There's a flexibility built into the act, so if there is a significant outside partner, then the EO doesn't have to have the burden all on its own. It can operate with another outside person as long as between both of them there is a change of control.

Mr Kwinter: Can I direct a question to you about the general philosophy behind the fact that to have an employee ownership, all you have to do is have an employee group? They don't have to be a union; they don't have to be organized; they just have to be a group.

Mr Evans: That's correct.

Mr Kwinter: To have a venture capital fund, you must be a trade union.

Mr Evans: You must be provincially recognized, yes.

Mr Kwinter: Why would the same provision not apply where a group—to give you an example, the employee group at Dofasco—may decide that it wants to set up a venture capital fund? Why would they be excluded?

Mr Evans: The design of the fund side of the legislation is intended to parallel the federal legislation to ensure that there are federal matching credits. That requirement has been proved, as far as we are concerned in Ontario, by the fact that we could not secure federal matching credits for the employee ownership side when we took that broader set of criteria forward.

I understand under the federal labour-sponsored venture capital corporation they don't have a particular distinction that describes the funds separately from the employee ownership side; they are merely applying their criteria on size and who is in fact managing the proposal. In that case, our legislation, which did not have a size limit on the employee ownership side and did provide for that more general application or description in terms of the employee group, failed the federal test and did not attract matching credits. We believe the decision in terms of the design of the legislation on the fund side was the appropriate one to ensure that we did get the matching credits.

The Chair: Do we have more questions?

Mr Paul R. Johnson (Prince Edward-Lennox-South Hastings): For the information of the committee, I just wanted to clarify, or at least point out, that although this piece of legislation is unique because it only operates within Ontario, there are other jurisdictions within Canada that have similar legislation. I was wondering if Jim or someone else on the panel here could elaborate and give us just generally some comments with regard to how this legislation is similar to other jurisdictions, how it is working in other jurisdictions and, more specifically, how this would be perceived from a securities regulatory regime perspective.

Mr Evans: Gerry, can you answer that? We invite Joe to address that. Joe Lambert is the project manager involved with the implementation of the Ministry of Revenue administration of this bill.

1150

Mr Joe Lambert: That's a very difficult question to answer, Mr Johnson, but I'll try my best. A number of other provinces have similar programs. Those programs also involve employee ownership components as well as the so-called fund components. British Columbia, for example, has an employee ownership component and a fund component. Most recently a Working Opportunities fund was created, after the beginning of the new year. It's a labour-sponsored venture capital corporation fund, the only one, I believe, that's in existence.

I also understand that there are three employee ownership type of funds in British Columbia. Saskatchewan has two types of venture capital corporation funds. One is a so-called type A fund, and that's equivalent to our labour-sponsored investment fund. The so-called type B funds are the employee ownership counterparts to our employee ownership venture capital corporations.

I understand that in Saskatchewan there are no fund type of corporations established to date. We have approximately five, I believe, employee ownership type of funds established there. In Manitoba we have one fund established, and it's referred to as the Crocus fund. That, I believe, is equivalent to the labour-sponsored investment fund type of venture capital corporation.

Quebec has a fund referred to as the Quebec Solidarité fund. It is a labour-sponsored investment fund type of venture capital corporation. It's been in existence since 1983 and has raised almost $500 million in an equity capital.

With respect to the jurisdiction of the securities regimes that are in place in those jurisdictions, I understand that all the provinces have securities acts governing the operation, the provision of investor protection and the other regulatory concerns. They're regulated in that manner. Ontario is slightly distinct in that we have the employee ownership component to be regulated under Bill 150 as opposed to under Ontario's Securities Act. The labour-sponsored investment fund will be regulated under the Securities Act as administered by the Ontario Securities Commission.

With regard to the employee ownership labour-sponsored venture capital corporations, as I said, the investor protection provisions will be taken care of through a regime that's being built into Bill 150 through regulations. That also will be mainly administered by the Ontario Securities Commission. So we're unique, in a sense, with respect to the employee ownership side of things. We're consistent with respect to the labour-sponsored investment funds in regard to how the other provinces administer investor protection.

Mr Johnson: Would you say that these programs have been successful in these other jurisdictions? I guess I would have to define "successful." Have they raised or put into the economy the venture capital that was anticipated? Would you know?

Mr Lambert: With respect to the anticipated venture capital, we don't have information on what was anticipated. We do have some information on the amounts that have been raised. So it's difficult to give you a comparative—

Mr Johnson: That's why I say it's hard to define success.

Mr Lambert: British Columbia has raised, with respect to the three EOs we know about in British Columbia, about $4.7 million. Those were the objectives. With respect to Saskatchewan, I understand the information we have is that about $600,000 was raised by the five fund-type corporations that are in existence there, and as I mentioned earlier, in Quebec they've raised approximately $450 million since the inception of that particular fund. That's the senior fund in the country.

Mr Johnson: That's great.

Mr Lambert: Getting back to your question, Mr Carr, as to the numbers that were anticipated, the $250-million takeup is fairly consistent in relation to—it's actually below the amount that was raised in Quebec. That's the senior fund we have as a guidepost. So we're well within that $500-million capital to raise.

The Chair: Ms Caplan had a short question.

Mrs Elinor Caplan (Oriole): It's a supplementary. It really is on the use of language. Traditionally the term "venture capital" is for new and emerging firms, as opposed to this legislation, which is for the purpose of buyout of existing companies. How do you differentiate in that kind of language between existing venture capital funds for one purpose and this legislation, which is not traditional as far as venture capital is concerned but would be more considered as a bailout fund or a buyout fund?

Mr Whitehead: I prefer "buyout" a lot.

Mrs Caplan: Okay, but it's not traditional venture capital.

Mr Whitehead: With respect to the EOs, no, it's not really traditional venture capital. It is all brought forward under the one umbrella title for the act, which is labour-sponsored venture capital corporations—I can't remember the rest of it.

I take your point on the language. The employee ownership aspect of this credit program is very definitely single-purpose. There is, however, the other component of the program, which I think the term "venture capital" does describe relatively accurately, which is a disbursement of funds among a range of small and medium-sized businesses throughout the province.

I don't know if you want to add to that, Joe.

Mr Lambert: In defence of the name of the program, we're not alone in perhaps being guilty of a misnomer in that BC's legislation is called employee venture capital corporations, and it has both components under that mantle; in Saskatchewan as well, I might add.

Mr Carr: In the EO, what would be the average number of employees you're anticipating in the company? Do you say 50, 100 average?

Mr Marrs: I'm not sure. I would think the most likely targets will be companies in smaller communities where they're the major employer, or retiring owners. The retiring owner situation could be a wide range of employment levels. It could be fairly small, but in most smaller communities in Ontario you are looking at employment of 100 to 500 people.

Mr Evans: This is intended to be an act of general application, so it could be anywhere from that small business where the owner is retiring, which could be five or six, to—there are no top size limits on the EO side, so it could be relatively substantial industries in one-industry towns that are affecting the viability. There is a full range of possibilities. It is certainly not intended to be just saviours of communities. There are opportunities here for emerging industries. They may not be venture capital in terms of the startup connotation of that name but industries, as we were referring to in our presentation, that we're talking to positioning in relation to globalization. If we have a small to medium-sized company that has significant prospects, then the purpose of this act is to encourage that.

Mr Brad Ward (Brantford): I recognize the time, Mr Chair, but briefly, just so we're clear, even though it's Bill 150, there are the two components to Bill 150: the venture capital aspect, which is sponsored by labour organizations or groups that anyone can contribute to, and then the other aspect, which is employee ownership. I hope as this committee continues its deliberations that we don't confuse the two, because they are two separate, distinct aspects of the bill itself, even though the bill's name is all-encompassing. I hope that's clear, Mr Chairman, so we don't enter into some confusion about what this bill is.

The Chair: Thank you, Mr Ward. I would like to thank all of you for your presentation today. It was quite informative. It was a lot to absorb. Good thing we've got Hansard so we can read over some of the answers you've given. You would all be available to members of this committee in your offices for any questions in the future?

Mrs Caplan: Will we have an opportunity to place additional questions on the record at another time?

The Chair: I'll take the direction of the committee here.

Mr Kimble Sutherland (Oxford): What do we have scheduled for this afternoon?

The Chair: I have nothing on the schedule for this afternoon. Does the committee feel they need to ask more questions?

Mrs Caplan: I'd like some questions, if that's acceptable.

Mr Carr: I do, but I don't necessarily need them to come back. If they hadn't planned to, I'm sure they have other things they're looking at and saying, "Oh boy, all the things I was supposed to do this afternoon." I would be quite willing to put them in writing.

The Chair: The other thing, Ms Caplan—and this is why I wanted to call a subcommittee meeting—is to have witnesses come forth next Thursday. Maybe after some of the witnesses come forth, there will be additional questions. Certain questions will be raised by the witnesses that we can take a look at.

Mr Sutherland: We could certainly do it that way, if you want: have the staff come back after the witnesses for some more clarification.

Mrs Caplan: The only point I would make is that as long as there's an opportunity for questions to be placed and have the staff either here to answer or commit to answering in writing, I'd be satisfied.

The Chair: That's why I said a telephone call or a letter to any of these people.

I'd like to thank you again for appearing. This committee is adjourned for the day. Maybe we can have a quick sub-committee meeting for a minute or two if there's not a vote.

The committee adjourned at 1202.

CONTENTS

Thursday 7 May 1992

Labour Sponsored Venture Capital Corporations Act, 1992, Bill 150	F-21
Ministry of Revenue	F-21
Hon. Shelley Wark-Martyn, minister
John Whitehead, manager, personal income and payroll taxes
Ministry of Industry, Trade and Technology	F-23
Bob Marrs, manager, employee ownership section
Ministry of Financial Institutions	F-23
Julie-Luce B. Farrell, senior policy analyst
Ministry of Revenue	F-24
Jim Evans, executive director, revenue services and operations branch
Gerry Sholtack, director, legal services
Joe Lambert, legislation specialist

STANDING COMMITTEE ON FINANCE AND ECONOMIC AFFAIRS

- Chair / Président: Hansen, Ron (Lincoln ND)
- Vice-Chair / Vice-Président: Sutherland, Kimble (Oxford ND)
- *Caplan, Elinor (Oriole L)
- *Carr, Gary (Oakville South/-Sud PC)
- *Christopherson, David (Hamilton Centre ND)
- *Jamison, Norm (Norfolk ND)
- *Kwinter, Monte (Wilson Heights L)
- *Phillips, Gerry (Scarborough-Agincourt L)
- Sterling, Norman W. (Carleton PC)
- *Ward, Brad (Brantford ND)
- Ward, Margery (Don Mills ND)
- *Wiseman, Jim (Durham West/-Ouest ND)

Substitutions / Membres remplaçants:

- *Johnson, Paul R. (Prince Edward-Lennox-South Hastings/Prince Edward-Lennox-Hastings-Sud ND) for Ms Ward

*In attendance / présents

Clerk / Greffiere: Decker, Todd

Staff / Personnel: Campbell, Elaine, research officer, Legislative Research Service

F-4

F-4

ISSN 1180-4386

Legislative Assembly of Ontario

Second session, 35th Parliament

Official Report of Debates (Hansard)

Thursday 14 May 1992

Standing committee on finance and economic affairs

Labour Sponsored Venture
Capital Corporations Act, 1992

Assemblée législative de l'Ontario

Deuxième session, 35^e législature

Journal des débats (Hansard)

Jeudi 14 mai 1992

Comité permanent des finances et des affaires économiques

Loi de 1992 sur les corporations
à capital de risque de travailleurs

Chair: Ron Hansen
Clerk: Todd Decker

Président : Ron Hansen
Greffier : Todd Decker

Published by the Legislative Assembly of Ontario
Editor of Debates: Don Cameron

Publié par l'Assemblée législative de l'Ontario
Éditeur des débats : Don Cameron

Table of Contents

Table of Contents for proceedings reported in this issue appears on the outside back cover, together with a list of committee members and others taking part.

Index inquiries

Reference to a cumulative index of previous issues may be obtained by calling the Hansard Reporting Service indexing staff at (416) 325-7410 or 325-7411.

Numbering of committee reports

Effective with the opening of the Second Session of the 35th Parliament, committee reports and pages are numbered according to session, rather than calendar year as before.

Subscriptions

Subscription information may be obtained from: Sessional Subscription Service, Publications Ontario, Ministry of Government Services, 5th Floor, 880 Bay Street, Toronto, Ontario, M7A 1N8. Phone (416) 326-5310, 326-5311 or toll-free 1 (800) 668-9938.

Table des matières

La table des matières des séances rapportées dans ce numéro se trouve sur la couverture à l'arrière de ce fascicule, ainsi qu'une liste des membres du comité et d'autres personnes ayant participé.

Renseignements sur l'index

Il existe un index cumulatif des numéros précédents. Les renseignements qu'il contient sont à votre disposition par téléphone auprès des employés de l'index du Journal des débats au (416) 325-7410 ou 325-7411.

Numérotation des rapports de comités

A partir du début de la deuxième session de la 35^e législature, les pages et les numéros des rapports de comités sont numérotés par session et non plus par l'année civile.

Abonnements

Pour les abonnements, veuillez prendre contact avec le Service d'abonnement parlementaire, Publications Ontario, ministère des Services gouvernementaux, 5^e étage, 880, rue Bay, Toronto (Ontario) M7A 1N8. Par téléphone : (416) 326-5310, 326-5311 ou, sans frais : 1 (800) 668-9938.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

STANDING COMMITTEE ON FINANCE AND ECONOMIC AFFAIRS

Thursday 14 May 1992

The committee met at 1008 in committee room 1.

LABOUR SPONSORED VENTURE CAPITAL CORPORATIONS ACT, 1992

LOI DE 1992 SUR LES CORPORATIONS À CAPITAL DE RISQUE DE TRAVAILLEURS

Consideration of Bill 150, An Act to provide for the Creation and Registration of Labour Sponsored Venture Capital Corporations to Invest in Eligible Ontario Businesses and to make certain other amendments / Loi prévoyant la création et l'inscription de corporations à capital de risque de travailleurs aux fins d'investissement dans des entreprises ontariennes admissibles et apportant des modifications corrélatives.

The Chair (Mr Hansen): Good morning. I'd like to welcome you all here to the standing committee on finance and economic affairs. This morning we're having public hearings on Bill 150, An Act to provide for the Creation and Registration of Labour Sponsored Venture Capital Corporations to Invest in Eligible Ontario Businesses and to make certain other amendments.

WORKING VENTURES CANADIAN FUND INC

The Chair: The first group we've got on, for 10 am, is Working Ventures Canadian Fund Inc, Mr Ron Begg, president. Would you come forward, please. On your presentation, you have one-half hour, and in that one-half hour perhaps you can leave some time near the end within that half hour for questions from the three parties.

Mr Ron Begg: By all means.

The Chair: Thank you, and welcome to the committee.

Mr Begg: Good morning. My name is Ron Begg and I'm president of Working Ventures Canadian Fund. I'm also chair of the government relations committee of the Association of Canadian Venture Capital Companies, but I'm appearing before you this morning in my capacity as president of Working Ventures.

With me today is Jim Hall. Jim is the vice-president, investments, at Working Ventures.

We have three objectives in appearing before you this morning. The first is to communicate our strong support for the legislation, for Bill 150. We've had an opportunity to participate in the consultation process, principally with the four ministries that have been involved. We have had close cooperation, and we've had an opportunity to have some experience with this proposed direct legislation and we strongly support it.

The second purpose is to share with the committee our experience to date. We have had two years' experience with the similar federal legislation and a full RRSP season with the Ontario program.

Our third objective this morning is to share with you. While we strongly support the legislation in its current form, we would bring to the attention of this committee two important refinements which we would ask be considered at the third reading stage.

There should be on the table before you a letter from Jim McCambly, who is president of the Canadian Federation of Labour and also chair of Working Ventures Canadian Fund. On behalf of the Canadian Federation of Labour, Jim has confirmed the support of the CFL and that of the Ontario council of the CFL that recently passed a resolution last month at the Ontario convention of strong support for Bill 150. Also in front of you is a submission prepared by Working Ventures, which again confirms support for this legislation and proposes the two refinements I spoke of.

By way of background, Working Ventures is the first national labour-sponsored investment fund to be established under federal Bill C-18, which was enacted December 18, 1991. We are also the first labour-sponsored fund to be pre-registered under Bill 150 by the Minister of Revenue, subject to enactment of the legislation and compliance by Working Ventures with this legislation.

In the time we've been in the marketplace with the first labour-sponsored investment fund, we've been breaking new ground with, I think, five different constituencies. I'd like to share with you the experience we've had, which has been very positive. We think that the various constituencies have embraced this concept. We've found general support in the public and in professionals dealing with this new concept.

First of all, we have worked with securities regulators, both with the Ontario Securities Commission in Ontario and with securities regulators in other provinces, and we have found that experience has helped to mould and shape this as a financial product that has the kind of disciplines that have been built into it, at the insistence of the Ontario Securities Commission and other regulators, which make this a product that will very definitely serve the public interest. We think the disciplines that have been imposed by the OSC as part of its responsibility have been very beneficial to making this a better product.

A second constituency is really the financial industry. We have been working closely with all major firms in Ontario. The major brokerage firms which distribute Working Ventures have embraced this concept, and in the month of January this year we had an opportunity to actually visit some 70 to 80 branches in Ontario to help train professional stockbrokers in the investment merits of this product and the various tax implications of this new concept. We found an open mind, a willingness and an interest in this product.

It is being sold by brokers throughout the province, properly, in my view, as part of an otherwise balanced, long-term portfolio. This is not intended as any individual's first or only investment, but rather as part of an overall, long-term investment strategy. Across Canada now, as I mentioned, and in Ontario, all major firms are offering this product to the general public and to their clients. We have approximately 1,500 brokers across Canada, about two thirds of these in Ontario, who are actually personally selling shares in Working Ventures and distributing these shares to the public.

The third constituency I'd like to mention is our extensive work in communicating with members of the affiliated unions of the Canadian Federation of Labour. As sponsors of Working Ventures Canadian Fund, the Canadian Federation of Labour has arranged for introductions to the leadership and the membership of the affiliated unions, and this has been a particularly exciting experience for us. We've had the opportunity to get out into the union halls, into the conventions, and to put the membership in touch with licensed professionals who can provide the individuals with independent investment advice and bring this product to their attention.

It has been particularly exciting to see the dialogue that this has generated between professionals in the financial community and the membership of the union. There's a high interest in terms of increasing the stake in the free enterprise system by taking advantage of this program, one that has the potential to enhance retirement incomes but at the same time to create employment to add to the general prosperity by helping support companies that tend to generate more in the way in the way of exports and more in the way of research and development.

As you know, some 90% of the new jobs created in this province in the last decade have come from the small- and medium-sized businesses, which are the target of this legislation and the focus of Working Ventures' investment strategy.

The fourth constituency, of course, that we've addressed is the general public. We have been communicating through registered representatives in the major stock brokerage firms and through an advertising program. I'm pleased to report that Working Ventures, which until the beginning of this year had only $5 million in assets under administration, has now increased our assets to $43 million. With only $5 million in assets, we felt that pool was too small to properly diversify, but now we are swinging aggressively into the investment mode, and subject to enactment of this legislation will begin making investments focused in Ontario.

Of the $43 million, in this most recent season we actually raised $29 million in Ontario, and in total across the country we have 15,000 shareholders now, of which just over 10,000 are residents of Ontario.

The shares were initially offered March 1, 1990, at $10 per share, and the net asset value per share, which is published in the financial press on a daily basis, now stands at $11.81 as of April 30.

The fifth constituency with which we've been communicating in this period are small- and medium-sized businesses, the clients of the investment activities of Working Ventures. As I mentioned, until this year we really felt we couldn't diversify the portfolio, but Jim Hall, leading the investment process at Working Ventures, is now focusing his energies on Ontario, and Saskatchewan which also provide the matching provincial tax credit.

In the past three months, the investment department has reviewed some 179 business plans. We have narrowed and are focusing on the top 10, and we have two very exciting investment opportunities on the front burner which are presently being reviewed with the Ministry of Revenue to ensure their eligibility.

We believe that Working Ventures is now solidly established. We have built a foundation for growth, and we're competently looking forward to the enactment of the legislation so that we can swing aggressively into the investment mode in Ontario and begin investing in the kind of companies that will create increased employment and generate more in the way of exports and research and development.

Throughout the consultation process, we have had an excellent opportunity to work with the various ministries, and particularly have worked closely with Treasury and Economics, with the Ministry of Revenue, with the Ministry of Financial Institutions, and in the early stages with the Ministry of Industry, Trade and Technology and are very pleased to have had excellent cooperation and opportunity to comment. We know the legislation before the committee now has had some important refinements which we think are in the best interests of this legislation.

We have had an opportunity to review the 42 amendments which we understand were tabled at this committee last Friday, and we're in agreement with these 42 amendments as well. I want to be clear in our support for the legislation as it presently stands, and at the same time I would like to recommend for your consideration two important issues, which are covered in some detail in the submission which has been distributed to you.

I would like to briefly summarize those. The first has to do with the issue in the legislation which places a restriction on the ability of a labour-sponsored investment fund to take a control position in the companies in which it invests. Let me be clear that the objective of Working Ventures, and I believe any LSIF, quite properly is to become a significant minority investor. We are not interested in and we are not in the business of wanting to manage and control companies. For the most part, these situations come about, from time to time, for very good reasons, and it is important in our view that LSIFs have the ability to take control positions. One of the areas where this would occur is in the case of startups, particularly significant and aggressive startups where capital is required well beyond the means of the owner-managers and employees who are participating in the business. In these situations the principals involved recognize that they have insufficient capital and are prepared to part with an equitable split of the equity. If it is not possible for an LSIF to obtain an equitable split of equity, and given that its mandate of course is to make investments on their merits, then there would be a bias against this type of startup, which we think is very much consistent with the objectives of the legislation.

1020

Another situation that arises is where an investment that has been made in an investee company is in jeopardy for one of two reasons: An additional investment of capital is required. Take the case where an LSIF has invested perhaps to the point where it takes a 30% interest in the company. The company can run into difficulty either because of unexpected problems or because of unexpected success, to the point where a substantial additional equity infusion is required. It's important that an LSIF have the ability to make these infusions and to do so on an equitable basis.

A third situation is that as companies grow there's always the possibility they will become the target of a foreign takeover. We would like to be in a position in these circumstances to be able to increase our equity stake to prevent the company from falling into foreign hands or into third-party hands, which would not be in the best interests of the investee company, the shareholders or the employees.

We would urge the committee to consider eliminating the restriction on majority control, or failing that, if the committee decides not to do that, we would urge that the legislation be enacted to provide broad ministerial discretion to allow majority control in those circumstances where the situation is consistent with the spirit and intent of the legislation.

The second refinement to the legislation we would urge you to consider is with respect to the investment timetable restriction. The original legislation required that 70% of capital raised be invested within 48 months. The legislation before us now has been amended to call for 70% being invested within 24 months. We would urge the committee to phase this in over a longer period of time. The federal and the Quebec legislation require that 60% of capital raised be invested within 60 months. We think that the federal and Quebec and Saskatchewan limit of 60% in the case of the dynamic Ontario market could be exceeded. The target requiring 70% invested in the dynamic Ontario market can be achieved, but we would urge that rather than having a 24-month objective this be phased in between 24 and 48 months, so that 70% of capital raised is invested at the end of the fourth year after the capital has been raised.

In summary, we think our experience to date has clearly demonstrated, to us at least, that the general public, the membership of affiliated trade unions and the financial community have embraced the concept. We think the experience with the regulators and financial community has developed a product that has the disciplines such that the public interest will be served and the objectives of the government in terms of increased employment will be achieved.

I'd be very happy to take any questions from the committee. You can direct them either to myself or to Jim Hall.

The Chair: Okay. Mr Evans here would just like to ask one question on your recommendation. A little bit of clarification for the committee here.

Mr Jim Evans: Mr Begg, there is a clause in the existing act which provides for 12 months for control and broadly corresponds in terms of its reasoning or design with the points that you have outlined. Are you specifically looking for a longer time frame, or for the removal of any time frame in relation to that clause?

Mr Begg: I would look first of all for elimination of the requirement altogether, if that's possible. That would be our conviction: that the legislation would be best served by that.

Failing that, I would urge broader ministerial discretion, both in terms of the 12-month timing and also with respect to those circumstances defined in the legislation where the minister can exercise discretion. I think the minister should not be bound to the rather short list of crisis situations where discretion could be exercised. I believe there are circumstances where the minister could review a transaction and say, "This is very much in the spirit intended in the legislation." So very broad ministerial discretion I think would be appropriate.

Mr Evans: Okay. Thank you.

Mrs Elinor Caplan (Oriole): In your experience with investments by individuals, one of the concerns that has been expressed to me is that I understand the Ontario Securities Commission now will have some authority within this legislation to ensure that individual investors will have the information they need so that they can be aware, be fully knowledgeable, of the risk. Are you satisfied that the provisions are strong enough within this legislation to protect the individual who otherwise might not know or understand or have advice from a knowledgeable source?

Mr Begg: Yes, I believe that the process that has been put in place by the OSC from the beginning has ensured that the disciplines have been built into this as a financial product. We're being held, I believe quite properly, to the strictest accountability, as required by the Securities Act. Our prospectus is, I believe, a very fulsome description of the potential rewards, but certainly details the additional risks that are associated with this financial product. It has been required that this product only be offered to individuals who have the proficiency requirement to sell other securities and that it be done in the context of the full know-your-client regulations of the securities commission. This is our third year selling under the prospectus that discloses this information.

In addition to this, we make considerable effort to get out into the financial community to train professional brokers on the merits of this product, and we're very clear, in doing this, to position the product as one which should be sold only as part of an otherwise balanced, long-term portfolio.

Mrs Caplan: Thank you.

The Chair: Mr Phillips, do you have any questions?

Mr Gerry Phillips (Scarborough-Agincourt): No, sir.

Mr Gary Carr (Oakville South): Thank you very much for your presentation. On page 1 you say Working Ventures has now swung into an investment mode. You go on to say that as soon as these are accomplished and Working Ventures complies with the requirements of the OSC, "We will aggressively pursue investment opportunities in small and medium—"

I think as you are probably aware, the bill will pass. What are your plans now in terms of aggressively pursuing? Maybe you could just give us a little more detail of how far you are at, what you're looking at doing, companies and so on.

1030

Mr Begg: By all means. Our focus has been on communicating with the financial community, with small and medium-sized businesses as to the investment criteria which Working Ventures has established, consistent with the legislation. We've done this in a number of ways. We are working closely with lawyers, accountants, bankers who are known to us, who are active in the Association of Canadian Venture Capital Companies, but beyond this we have made every opportunity through the press to make business owner-managers aware of the investment criteria.

A special means of getting deeply into the community is that we've had an opportunity to get out into smaller centres throughout the province, to train licensed brokers not only in the merits of this as an investment but also to draw to their attention our investment criteria and to say: "You have clients in the community who need equity capital for growing businesses. Here are the criteria. We invite you to bring forward investment proposals." Those have started to come forward.

We've begun to review those. Jim Hall, our vice-president of investments, a thoroughly experienced investment professional, has begun to review these investment proposals and to go through the process with, the buzzword in the industry is, due diligence. Typically, "due diligence" in the case of private equity investments is about a two- to three-month process, where you get in and meet with the owner-managers, you get out and talk to the employees of the company, to the competitors, to the suppliers, to the customers, to understand that business so that you're in a position not only to make a proper investment but also, after the investment is made, to help add value to that investment.

This process is well under way. We do have some interim restrictions that have been detailed in an order by the Ontario Securities Commission, which we, of course, are respecting during the interim period, which really expires June 30. This interim order was in anticipation of consideration of this legislation by the Legislature, and as soon as the legislation is enacted, we have several requirements which we've agreed to with the OSC. Once those have been satisfied, we will then swing in to the investment mode.

In the meantime, we have several restrictions. We're not allowed to invest more than 20% of our assets in eligible investments until the order has been lifted. We're also restricted to the equity participation we can take in any one investment during this interim period.

Mr Carr: What are the number of proposals you have now, in terms of numbers? You said you have a few. How—

Mr Begg: We have had 179 of various types come in over the last three to four months. We're focusing our energies on what we call the top 10. We have two very active proposals which we have now taken forward to the Ministry of Revenue and invited its comments on with respect to eligibility. We want to make certain that these are in fact eligible before we proceed further.

Mr Carr: So the top 10, and you've got it narrowed down to two. Was that through your suggestion, or was that the government that suggested—

Mr Begg: No.

Mr Carr: They were the ones that you selected as being the criteria—

Mr Jim Hall: No. The determination as to whether or not they're good investments is entirely up to us. We've gone to the Ministry of Revenue to determine whether or not these are eligible investments under the bill.

Mr Carr: But presumably the government, in anticipation of this, has said to companies, "Oh, by the way, do you know you've got this?" Do you know if these have come through your efforts to get out into the business community and meet with them, or has it been a direct result of the government saying to companies, "This is what we're planning to do," and they may come to you? Do you know if that has been through a government initiative or through your own hard work that you've been doing?

Mr Hall: Sometimes it's difficult to know exactly what the source of deals is. Basically they come from everywhere. They come from people talking to people on the street as to who has capital, and the capital itself acts as a magnet and the deals come our way. If you're plugged into the financial community, the word gets around and the deals start showing up on your doorstep.

Mr Begg: We're happy to have investment proposals brought forward to us by everyone, and at every opportunity, whether we're talking to the press or out at a union hall or meeting with a stockbroker or talking with legislators, we say: "These are the investment criteria. Please send business proposals to us." The reality in this business is that out of every 100 investments you can end up doing one or two because of the variety of proposals that come forward. So we welcome and get them from all sources.

I'm not aware of any of the investments that have come forward being things that have specifically been brought forward by a legislator.

Mr Carr: But with 179 that have come through—and you've just gone through the process of how difficult it is getting in and meeting the suppliers and so on, the initial criteria of how you select them with the limited resources that you've got—how are you making the selections now? How did you come down to those two in the 10, and so on? What were the big factors in that?

Mr Hall: Generally it's an assessment of each and every deal against every other deal that you've ever seen, and basically the process is such that we look at the package. If we're impressed with the package, the next step is to run some numbers to see whether or not the deal makes sense in terms of return on a preliminary basis, and if we feel that the next step should happen after that, it's meeting the people. The majority of deals never get to the meeting-the-people stage.

Mr Brad Ward (Brantford): I'd like to thank you gentlemen for coming before this committee and expressing strong support for this initiative. I share your enthusiasm and I think the majority of the committee will as well.

This is a new form of venture capital to be utilized by our small and medium-sized business people. When a concern is expressed about this initiative by some members of the opposition, it's primarily because it says "labour-sponsored." I'm not sure why that concern is expressed, but this fund is professionally managed. It is a type of investment that not all people will want to take. It is their option and it's open to all investors in the province of Ontario.

What type of response have you been getting when you have discussions with brokers throughout the province? I'm sure there has to be an education, an awareness, I guess, that this type of investment is now available. What type of response have you been getting?

Mr Begg: It has been very interesting and quite exciting because I think it has caused increased understanding, both in the financial community and in the labour community, of the realities of investment and it has created kind of a search for ways that business and labour can work together.

I must say that in some cases, in getting out to meet with brokers, we've been met with scepticism. We sound on the face of it to be an oxymoron, labour-sponsored venture capital. But once we have an opportunity—and sometimes we'll arrive at a brokerage office and there'll be some arms folded and they'll want to know what this is all about. Typically, a fund manager going into a brokerage office might be given 15 minutes or half an hour to present the product. I don't think I've had a meeting at a brokerage office that's gone on less than an hour, because of the interest that this has generated.

One of the things we did when we first launched this fund is, I arranged to introduce the directors on our board who are drawn from the labour movement to leaders in the venture capital community, so there was an opportunity for these different parties to understand one another. I think not only the brokers but the venture capital community have come to understand and appreciate the merits and the bona fides of the investment strategy we're pursuing, and we've been welcomed.

We will be syndicating some of our investments with traditional venture capital firms and, in direct response to your question, I think the best testimony that the brokerage community has opened their minds and is positively supporting this concept is that across Canada some 1,500 brokers are actually selling this product. To put that in perspective, my best estimate is that there are about 4,000 to 5,000 brokers in all of Canada, and 1,500 of them have actually sold Working Ventures, and about two thirds of those are brokers here in the province of Ontario.

I think we're off to a good start. We've established a gold standard and a model that I think will serve this legislation well.

The Chair: I have got to go on to your colleague there. Mr Owens?

Mr Stephen Owens (Scarborough Centre): Thank you, Chair. I simply wanted to make a quick comment with respect to Mrs Caplan's question on the kinds of investor protections, but Mr Begg in his answer gave quite an excellent summary of the protections that they have in place.

I simply would like to add that in terms of the health warnings that will be explicit, these warnings will be in plain language so that people will understand without having to plow through a number of "whereofs" and "thereases" and other types of legalese.

The OSC has worked extremely hard to develop investor protections for something that's, in Ontario, a bit of a new animal, and I appreciate the other work they've done. I also, Mr Begg, appreciate your answer and your understanding of those protections that we've worked hard to put into place.

The Chair: Okay. I'd like to thank you gentlemen for appearing before this committee.

Mr Begg: Thank you very much.

1040

ONTARIO WORKER CO-OP ASSOCIATION

The Chair: The next presenter is the Ontario Worker Co-op Association, and a Mr John Brouwer. Would you come forward, please. We have one half-hour. In that half-hour, if you can make your presentation and leave some time at the end for questions from the three parties here. I welcome you here to this committee this morning. Go ahead.

Mr John Brouwer: Thank you. Good morning, I'm John Brouwer and I am with the Ontario Worker Co-op Association. Thank you for this opportunity to make this presentation.

As the Ontario Worker Co-op Association, we request that Bill 150 be amended to also include worker co-ops. Specifically the definition of organizations which can develop a labour-sponsored investment fund should be expanded to also include an association or federation of worker co-ops, since in its current form the bill won't be available to worker co-ops.

I want to note that worker co-ops are our most democratic form of worker ownership, such that they combine economic development with social justice, since they ensure that the creative business wealth is equitably distributed and stays in the community. Also, by forming worker co-ops, groups which traditionally have been unable to control their economic affairs can collectively control their business activities in a context of supportive community economic development structures. Amending Bill 150 would allow worker co-ops to become a realistic option within the industrial restructuring which Ontario is currently experiencing.

The worker co-op option ensures that workers retain democratic control of their businesses for the life of those businesses. Other forms of worker ownership don't provide that protection, and by not including the worker co-op option, workers will not have that option to develop ownership democratically. Amending the bill to include worker co-ops in all its aspects would allow workers to choose a protection of this democratic business form in the context of buying into their businesses.

Specifically, if we can expand the definition of "employee organization" to include "an association or a federation of worker co-ops," it has the potential to overcome the greatest obstacle that we've had in developing worker co-ops in Ontario, which is accessing investment capital for co-op initiatives. A secondary concern we had regarding eligible investment is now covered under the government's amendment, item 21, which expanded the definition of the meaning of shares.

I want to note that a worker co-op is a legislatively defined form of employee organization which is contained in the revisions to the Co-operative Corporations Act introduced in December. This amendment would allow worker co-op associations to develop a labour-sponsored investment fund corporation.

Worker co-ops have been strong instruments for job creation in the context of economic renewal and other jurisdictions. Quebec has 220 worker co-ops, employing at least 3,000. Within western Europe, they're very strong, having more than one million people employed in over 42,000 worker co-ops, and worker co-ops continue to provide jobs and create new jobs as part of the restructuring process within the European Community, especially in southern Europe.

Here, Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia and Newfoundland have instituted worker co-op development programs. By providing a vehicle for channelling investment into co-op development, this kind of job creation potential could be realized for Ontario.

The difficulties in regard to investment relate to a level playing field. The tax regulations, mainly federal ones, provide incentives for investment and joint stock corporations and partnerships which are not available to investment in cooperatives. That's largely because the legislation never considered co-op investment. But this resulted in investors having to take rates of return for co-op investments which are 20% to 90% lower than potential returns in conventional equivalent investments.

This amendment would allow us to work to level the playing field in attracting investment, and we note that the Advisory Group on Taxation of Co-operatives within the Fair Tax Commission has made a strong interim recommendation supporting expanding this definition. At the back we've included a copy of their letter.

There's a large reservoir of socially oriented investment which can be attracted to such an investment fund if from the investor's point of view the opportunities were equivalent. We note that Vancouver City Savings Credit Union's ethical growth fund, which they initiated, now has over $70 million invested in it.

The Canadian Co-operative Association has identified capitalization as a foundational issue for co-op development over the next decade, and this amendment would allow us to develop a vehicle which can access private investment for co-op development.

Since this is a labour program, we have had discussions with the Ontario Federation of Labour in regard to expanding this definition. They support this expanding of the definition. We also included a copy of their letter at the back of this paper.

Ontario needs community economic development. We want to emphasize that worker co-ops are engaged in community economic development since they are organized to provide employment directly. Within a worker-controlled enterprise, worker co-ops' primary goal is long-term stable employment for their members. This in turn of course contributes to the economic base for stable communities.

Worker co-ops exert full control over their co-ops and, as residents of local communities, they bring their communities' values to their co-ops in terms of decisions about the direction of their business. As such, they ensure that the business remains responsive to community needs. The created wealth stays in the communities in which it is generated. The very structure of the worker co-op ensures that capital is recycled, the capital remains anchored in the community and the jobs stay in Ontario.

Presently, most community economic development in Ontario is constrained by a lack of capital. The proposed amendment would provide a vehicle which we can access private capital for co-op economic development.

We note that in regard to compatibility with the federal program that British Columbia and Saskatchewan have a broad definition of the type of organization with can develop the labour-sponsored investment fund and that both of these provinces are recognized for their federal tax credit.

In British Columbia the definition includes a labour organization or other group with a work-related affiliation. In Saskatchewan it's a recognized labour association including a trade union, a corporation formed by employees of the same company or an investment cooperative.

Since these are broader definitions, we conclude that the definition of Bill 150 is overly restrictive. We also note that Nova Scotia just recently announced the establishment of a worker ownership program under the 1992 budget which specifically notes that employees of co-operatives will be eligible for that program.

We've excerpted pages from the discussion paper on the operation of labour-sponsored investment funds in other provinces. I want to note that the discussion paper around this bill recognized that:

"Cooperative corporations, by design, subscribe to the participatory values which this program promotes. Cooperatives are currently not eligible for this program due to a number of technical issues which remain to be addressed. Many of these issues are part of the Cooperative Corporations Act.

"Through the consultation process, the government will be seeking to identify changes to the CCA and this program necessary to enable cooperatives to participate in the program."

Amendments to the Cooperative Corporations Act were introduced in December. They should shortly receive second reading, so the technical obstacles are being eliminated. By expanding this definition, we would allow worker co-ops to contribute to the economic renewal which Ontario needs. Thank you for this opportunity to make this presentation. We hope we can work together in contributing to Ontario's economic renewal.

The Chair: We'll start off with the third party. Mr Sterling or Mr Carr.

Mr Norman W. Sterling (Carleton): Thank you very much, John. I appreciate your coming down. I've had an opportunity to talk to you on the phone about inclusion of worker co-ops and you have our full encouragement and endorsement for the inclusion of you, even if it doesn't mean—I'm not sure whether the federal government has moved on it or not, but notwithstanding that, I don't think we should limit the scope of our legislation based on federal legislation. We should do it in an equitable and even-handed fashion here.

In reading over the government amendments which were introduced last week—and I've just seen them for the first time in the last five or 10 minutes, not through the fault of the government but just that I haven't got down to it—is there any amendment which would include them in the definition of "employee organization"?

1050

Mr Evans: Not at the present time.

Mr Owens: I would like to respond to the question but perhaps I can respond to it when we reach our turn in the speaking order. At this point, there is no amendment—

Mr Sterling: That would include them.

Mr Owens: —in your package. However, I intend to address that.

Mr Sterling: Well, if Mr Owens is representing the ministry, perhaps he could respond then.

Mr Owens: Our intention today, Mr Sterling, is to signal to the committee that we'll be bringing forward an amendment to include worker co-ops in this bill. We are certainly looking at unanimous consent when we bring this amendment forward. I appreciate your comments of support on the issue. It's also my understanding that Mrs Caplan has indicated support for the issue. It's my understanding that clause-by-clause begins on June 5 and that—

The Chair: I believe so, after we've had all the other presenters forward on May 28.

Mr Owens: I simply want to say that the amendment will be available for the perusal of the opposition parties with enough time to allow for commentary. Again, I appreciate the support from both the Liberal and Conservative caucuses on this issue. We think it's an important inclusion.

Mr Sterling: Could I then ask Mr Brouwer, where does the federal government sit with regard to its legislation? This would give, I guess, a fund set up by yours the advantages of the provincial grant, but as I understand it you don't have that advantage with the federal. Is that correct?

Mr Brouwer: We don't have this advantage anywhere in Canada at this point. This would allow us to initiate such a fund here in Ontario and work with the federal government to get its backing to piggyback its credit on to the Ontario initiative.

Mr Sterling: Your definition of a "worker co-op" is what?

Mr Brouwer: "Worker co-operative" will be defined—it is being defined in the amendments to the Co-operative Corporations Act as a co-operative in which at least 80% of the employees are members.

The Chair: Could I just stop for a minute because Hansard's having a problem recording there. Can you signal me when you're ready to go again?

Go ahead, Mr Sterling.

Mr Sterling: Perhaps for the record, I will just repeat it. My question was, what is the definition of "worker co-op" and you were explaining. Perhaps you could repeat that for Hansard.

Mr Brouwer: The definition of a "worker co-operative" is defined in the revisions to the Co-operative Corporations Act which received first reading in December and essentially it says that 80% of the workers in a business have to be members of the co-op.

Mr Sterling: Do they have to have the ownership of the—

Mr Brouwer: They would have voting rights in the co-operative; 80% of the workers would have voting rights in the co-operative.

Mr Sterling: Does a co-operative have to have ownership rights in the business in which they're working?

Mr Brouwer: Yes, the co-operative owns the business.

Mr Sterling: One hundred per cent?

Mr Brouwer: There are other forms of investment that can come into that business, but the common shares would be owned by the workers. They can issue preferred shares. They can issue debt instruments so other people can invest in the business.

Mr Sterling: Are there any workers' co-ops that exist outside of private industry, for instance, a group in a non-union public enterprise?

Mr Brouwer: For example, in Quebec, they have ambulance cooperatives which here are considered to be a public enterprise. In the Quebec situation, there are some workers' co-ops or ambulance cooperatives. It depends upon the situation as to how close you would get to being a public enterprise.

Mr Sterling: Okay.

The Chair: For some clarification, Mr Sterling, we have Mr George Alkalay and maybe he could come forward to explain a little bit in this particular area of co-ops if the committee would wish.

Mr Sterling: I'm satisfied right now, but that's fine if some other members would—

The Chair: I'm not taking any time away from you, Mr Sterling.

Mr Sterling: I'm satisfied with that. I've got the right answers.

Mr George R. Alkalay: Do you want me to just quickly summarize what the amendment is?

The Chair: Yes.

Mr Alkalay: Under Bill 166, which received first reading in December, "worker co-operative" will mean a cooperative, "the articles of which provide that the cooperative's primary object is to provide employment to its condition of membership that, except in circumstances prescribed by the regulations, a member must be employed by the cooperative."

What's going to be prescribed in the regulations are certain provisions so that somebody who's a part-time worker working less than 15 hours a week doesn't necessarily have to be a member of the co-op or that the co-op can say that for a period of one year somebody's on probation and they're not a full member. The requirement is just a slight point of correction, that at least 75% of the permanent, full-time employees of the cooperative be members of the cooperative. It is not 80%; it's 75%; 75% of the permanent full-time employees must be members of the cooperative.

The Chair: Now, we go on to Mr Owens.

Mr Owens: Just a minor correction in the terminology I used in my comment: I used the terminology "worker cooperative." Our amendment will be taking a look at an enabling process for federations and/or associations of co-operatives to sponsor an LSIF which currently they are not able to do at this point.

Perhaps I could just thank John Brouwer for coming to the committee this morning. We've worked long and hard on this process and I'm really pleased to be able to signal the government's intention this morning for yourself and your colleagues that are with you today.

Mrs Caplan: I'm very pleased to hear the commitment from Mr Owens on behalf of the government caucus and of the minister on an issue that we've raised and discussed for quite some time, and that was our concern that this program would only be made available to organized labour union participation. The expansion today and the commitment to have an amendment brought forward that would allow non-union, which would include worker co-op, is indeed very welcome and we look forward to that amendment and are pleased to hear that commitment today.

I would assume that the amendment, which I'm disappointed we couldn't have today or have had before this time when the committee began its hearing because the debate has been going on for quite some time and this issue was raised during second reading in the Legislature—I would point out that there is a very good model in legislation existing in Saskatchewan which would resolve the problem that has been expressed by Mr Brouwer, and by others who I believe would like to have the opportunity of participating.

We've been concerned that there is a bias within the government, and particularly as witnessed by this legislation which would favour unduly union participation in government programs. I personally look forward to the amendment and will assume perhaps there could be a commitment today that it will be along the lines of the Saskatchewan legislation, which will be inclusive for unorganized or other non-union groups that would qualify, as well as worker co-ops.

Mr Owens: I'm not sure that I can make that commitment today. However, I will be pleased to bring the amendment forward to the committee. As I say, you will have it in your hands before we get to the process. The wording, at this point, is still being worked on. As we had the experience together of the health professions legislation, where things were constantly evolving, we are still in an evolutionary process with respect to the wording. So for me to give a commitment like that today would not be appropriate.

1100

Mrs Caplan: To be helpful, I would direct Mr Owens and the government to the wording in the Saskatchewan bill. Perhaps my colleague Mr Phillips could—

Mr Phillips: Yes.

Mr Owens: We thank you for your guidance.

Mrs Caplan: Just trying to be helpful.

Mr Phillips: I will follow up a little bit on that because—I'm glad it isn't finally drafted, because we can have some influence on it. Actually, the very day the bill was introduced in the Legislature, we raised this issue. We said that we thought the Saskatchewan model was a good one. At the time, I think the argument was the federal government wouldn't permit or wouldn't allow their tax credits to apply. Obviously, now that we're recognizing co-ops, that's not the driving force. Now that's gone and fortunately we've gone beyond that stage so we can now, I think, look at that Saskatchewan model. The fact you haven't finally drafted it will be helpful so that we're not as restrictive and we can see more worker participation in the province. We also have talked with John and his group and are very supportive of the direction they want to have.

The Chair: Anyone else with any questions left? Okay, Mr Brouwer, thank you for coming before this committee and thank you again for your submission.

BESPOKE CO-OPERATIVE ENTERPRISES INC
CO-OP HOUSING FEDERATION OF EASTERN ONTARIO

The Chair: We have two groups making the next presentation. It's the Bespoke Co-operative Enterprises Inc and Co-op Housing Federation of Eastern Ontario. Would you come forward, please? Could you identify yourselves for the purposes of Hansard? The same applies that you have one-half hour for your presentation and question period before the committee. Welcome here.

Ms Hazel Corcoran: Thank you. I'm Hazel Corcoran from Bespoke Co-operative.

Mr Mark Goldblatt: I'm Mark Goldblatt. It's true I am the current president of the Co-op Housing Federation of Eastern Ontario. I'm also a past vice-president of the National Co-op Housing Federation and also its previous executive director. I just want to point out to the committee that I'm here today in a voluntary capacity associated with the Bespoke Workers' Co-operative in Ottawa.

Ms Corcoran: I'd like to briefly begin by just giving a little bit of background about myself. I'm an articling student at the moment, the corporate secretary of the Canadian Worker Co-operative Federation. As you also know, I'm involved with the Bespoke workers' co-op in Ottawa. By the way, I should tell you that the word "bespoke" means "custom-made." Nobody ever knows what it means.

By the way, I should tell you that the word "bespoke" means "custom-made." Nobody ever knows what it means.

While at law school, I did a major research paper on various models of worker ownership with an emphasis on legislation in various Canadian provinces, including Ontario and several European countries. First of all, I'd like to say I prepared my topic before I knew the amendment was going to be made. I want to thank you very much for listening to us and amending the bill in terms of the labour-sponsored venture capital corporations side of the bill. However, the second issue, I believe, is still out there. The employee ownership part of the bill, from my understanding, would still exclude worker co-ops, so I'm going to go through with the rest of my remarks on the assumption that's still the case.

The reason I've been lobbying the government on this bill for several months is I believe it would achieve merely a half-way point to true worker ownership. I'm advocating that you include worker co-ops because they are a more complete type of worker ownership and democracy. What Bill 150 proposed at its outset was a different type of structure, somewhat similar to worker co-ops in the short term, but with a tendency to revert back to non-worker ownership structures.

I would simply like worker co-ops to also be included, because I believe that worker co-ops are an approach which has a similar effect to the one side on this bill, but on a lasting basis.

I guess I would revise those remarks to say that whereas we have been asking you to take a full step towards worker ownership, you are taking a half step. Now it's more like three quarters of the way, and we'd still like to see changes to the other side of the bill.

I take this position because I have discovered that worker co-ops represent the very best and most stable type of worker ownership, as John Brouwer also explained. Thus I and the other members of Bespoke were very disappointed and surprised when we discovered that you had excluded them from any part of the worker ownership bill; this still applies to the employee ownership part of it. When you exclude worker co-ops, you're actually discouraging the best form of worker ownership because they're at a disadvantage relative to other types of employee-owned companies.

There are going to be two small parts to the rest of my remarks. First, I'll try to explain why I think this move is so important, both the one you've already made and the one I'm still trying to convince you to. Also, I'm going to try to explain the difference between worker co-ops and employee-owned organizations of other types like the ones in this bill.

In terms of the importance of the move, all over the world and acutely here in Ontario workers are feeling the effects of globalization of the economy and deep recession. Politicians are often heard giving a litany of our economy's problems, but none of them seems to come up with good solutions, and I believe that's for a good reason.

The real economic decisions are now difficult, and in some cases impossible, to influence any more by provincial and national laws. The real decisions are being made by people who control capital, and capital owes loyalty to no community. It owes allegiance only to maximizing profit for investors, who are often outside of Ontario and even Canada.

As this government realizes all too painfully, the old solutions to the problems of workers do not work in a world where capital has no borders. Aggressive labour organizing and tough labour laws cannot stop capital from closing plants, even profitable ones. In fact, the opposite is sometimes closer to the truth: Where government attempts to strengthen labour and environmental laws, they may actually speed up the process of capital flight to places where workers have fewer protections. The free trade agreement has accelerated this problem for Canada.

But worker co-ops are a solution that works under the present conditions. Therefore, an option governments have is to encourage the re-employment of capital generated in Ontario to fuel Ontario businesses with the lasting commitment to their community, through encouraging worker co-ops. Unfortunately, the worker co-op sector, although it represents an extraordinarily powerful idea, always has difficulty getting established in any given place unless it gets a so-called kickstart from governments or some other partner, such as labour unions or churches. But once the sector is kickstarted, there is virtually no limit on what it can accomplish. The reason the worker co-op sector seems unable to kickstart itself is that it simply does not create a sufficient concentration of power or capital to attract capital investors; instead, the economic benefits of worker co-ops are broadly distributed. So I'm asking that the government take steps towards making worker co-ops eligible for all parts of this act.

Now I'll go to the difference between worker co-ops and other employee-owned corporations. The two are often confused because in both cases the employees have the votes and get the profits, but the two types of companies are based on very different principles. A worker co-op is a form of incorporated business owned by the collectivity of the workers and which each worker-member controls democratically and equally, on the basis of one-worker/one-vote, instead of on the basis of one-share/one-vote. Thus the roles of shareholder and employee are merged. They represent the only corporate form in which both characteristics of ownership—control and right to share in profits—are vested in the workers because of their status as workers, and not as shareholders due solely to infusion of capital. The workers in a worker co-op do invest their own capital but it's not on this basis alone that they own it. Rather, each worker has ownership and an equal vote because she or he is a worker in that company.

The other forms of employee ownership besides worker co-ops may be seen to be on a spectrum of democracy, with worker co-ops as the most democratic form. A very common form is the employee stock ownership plan or ESOP. In ESOPs, employees typically own a limited percentage of the shares, which does not allow them to control the company. Thus they serve mainly as a financing device for conventional corporations but do not significantly change the direction or management of such corporations.

The problem with the worker ownership proposal is that it basically establishes two types of labour-sponsored venture capital corporations for ESOP organizations—and now you're adding worker co-ops into one half, I recognize—but it stops short of allowing worker co-ops from benefiting from these provisions. If your goal is to encourage worker ownership, it is difficult to understand why you are in fact discouraging the best form of worker ownership in any way.

1110

I've been asking since December why worker co-ops have been excluded in any part. As I said, I'm glad to see that they're no longer excluded in one part, but I would like, if it's possible, to have someone explain to me what the technical issues are. I can't seem to find any. Once we get a definition of a worker co-op, what's the technical reason that worker co-ops can't fit into the employee ownership side? Barring any technical issues, I request that the committee amend the bill to include worker co-ops in all parts.

Mr Goldblatt: My name is Mark Goldblatt. I welcome the opportunity to comment on the Ontario investment and employee ownership program, Bill 150, because we feel it's an innovative and progressive piece of legislation that will contribute to strengthening Ontario's economy.

I want to make my points about Bill 150 by going a bit into my personal background. I've been involved in the co-op movement both as a volunteer and full-time employee for the past 18½ years, most of the time focused on non-profit co-op housing. I got involved in co-op housing in September 1973 by forming a community co-op in the neighbourhood where I lived, and then teaming up with another community activist, Noreen Dunphy, to cofound the Cooperative Housing Federation of Toronto, where I worked for the next 11 years.

However, the breakthrough in public policy that allowed me to become involved in co-op housing took place not in September 1973, but several months earlier, in June 1973, when the National Housing Act was amended to insert non-profit housing cooperatives as an eligible vehicle for financing under National Housing Act programs. This breakthrough was accomplished at a time of a minority federal government, where the Trudeau-led Liberals were in a working relationship with the David Lewis-led NDP. The NHA was amended to permit housing co-ops to benefit from its financing programs after lobbying pressure from the very young Co-op Housing Federation of Canada.

On the co-op housing side, there were just a handful of people with vision and not much else. At that time there were fewer than 10 family housing cooperatives existing in the country. Today there are nearly 2,000 housing cooperatives with 72,000 units, and the housing co-op phenomenon has definitely not peaked.

The worker co-op situation today is in very much the same place as the co-op housing movement was in 1973. There are few worker co-ops in English Canada, and no high-powered lobby of parliamentarians is possible. To begin realizing the potential of worker co-ops, some politicians will have to show leadership, some vision, to introduce mechanisms where the government acts as a catalyst opening the door to working people to get involved in generating and maintaining their own jobs using the worker co-op method.

One favourable part of the current environment, as has already been mentioned today, is that amendments to the Co-operative Corporations Act to provide a statutory definition of a worker co-op are imminent and should become law within this session of provincial Parliament. We're often in situations where we're faced with adopting legislation when the final implications are not completely known. However, if it's a priority, legislation is amended and the resources are brought to bear, action gets taken and we continue to work together to make adjustments as we go. This is the position with respect to worker cooperatives and Bill 150. Your decision, if in fact it's adopted, to amend Bill 150 to allow worker cooperatives to benefit from the act will be a key turning point in the history of the worker cooperative movement in Canada.

In closing, I had one question I wanted to direct towards Mr Owens. I think I've lost the attention of the Chair. Can I address a question to Mr Owens?

The Chair: It's usually in reverse, but go right ahead.

Mr Goldblatt: It's because of his earlier remarks that amendment was being considered, with the wording not exactly tabled at this time. Did I understand you to say that the amendment under consideration by the government is that associations or federations of cooperatives—not specifically just worker co-ops but cooperatives—would be defined as an eligible party to form a labour-sponsored venture capital corporation?

Mr Owens: Yes, your understanding is correct.

Mr Goldblatt: It is correct. Then I have an additional remark to make. In these 18½ years, I've played a continuous role in the larger co-op movement in Canada. I am a past, founding director of the Canadian Co-operative Association, which is the umbrella for all the English-speaking cooperatives in Canada. That's all the wheat pools, the credit unions, the fishing co-ops, the retail co-ops, the housing co-ops, the funeral co-ops etc. I've been a director of that organization.

In Ontario, there's often not enough public profile of cooperatives; I would say it's the province which up till now has had the least public profile for cooperatives. I just point out that in fact the co-op movement in Canada has over $100 billion in assets and nearly 100,000 employees. The statistics from the federal co-op secretariat is that 43% of Canadian adults belong to at least one type of cooperative.

On the basis of what you've said today, Mr Owens, I would support definitely a wording that allowed cooperatives of all types to form labour-sponsored investment capital corporations, because I think there's an enormous amount of experience and expertise in the broadly defined movement, and that will be a benefit, among others, to the worker cooperative sector itself.

The Chair: Mr George Alkalay, could you come forward a little on the co-op review and give a little explanation?

Mr Alkalay: The Ministry of Financial Institutions is on an ongoing basis reviewing various legislation and regulations and programs as they affect cooperatives, so some of these broader issues will be addressed at that point. Did you want to ask more specific—

Mr Goldblatt: I had a comment about that. We're aware in the co-op movement that the Ministry of Financial Institutions is imminently expecting to set up an advisory committee on cooperatives, generally speaking. The strong feeling, though, of the Canadian Co-op Association's Ontario division is that it welcomes the chance to work with the government through an advisory committee but doesn't want it to become an excuse for referring off the table every co-op issue that comes up in the next months and years to some sort of black hole and will eventually come back. Because even if this advisory committee gets set up and goes to work on this specific piece of legislation, the most that will happen is that they recommend that worker co-ops are included as an eligible participant in the act, and we'll be right back to where we are today. With that one proviso, we're glad to hear about the advisory committee.

Mr Owens: Just a comment regarding the review, as I will be the person chairing, or whichever form the other review takes. We have made a commitment to CCA and other stakeholders in the process that this will be clearly an action-oriented review; that if issues are identified as the process moves on, those issues will be dealt with at the time of identification rather than at the point of the conclusion of the review. It'll be a dynamic and ongoing process.

Your comments with respect to how Ontario sees co-ops are quite correct. In terms of Ontario relative to other provinces, we are probably 10th out of 10 provinces in how we recognize our co-ops. Your description of the kind of involvement you've had with respect to womb-to-tomb co-ops—I gather that's the phrase—is quite instructive. It's certainly the intention of our government to review the legislative process to determine how we can enhance the role of co-ops so we can reach at least an equal footing with other provinces at this point in how they view co-ops and their excellent contribution to the life of people in the provinces they operate in.

The Chair: Mr Alkalay, do you have any remarks?

Mr Alkalay: I think Steve has said it all.

Mr Carr: Thank you very much for your presentation. I guess you are going to be successful in being included. As you probably heard earlier with Norm Sterling, his feeling is that we should include everybody, whether you're union, non-union, co-op or whatever. Is that your feeling, and if not, why not?

Mr Goldblatt: We're not holding out to be here today in front of you as representatives of anything except the cooperative movement, so you would have to direct that type of question to the government. From our point of view, cooperatives have a singular, distinct role in the economy in that they're the only form of ownership we have in Canada which is organized on a democratic basis: The basis for control of the firm, whatever type of business it's involved in, is based on the individual human being, on the one-member/one-vote basis, as opposed to being associations of capital or government-controlled or, for that matter, philanthropic, non-profit, society-controlled. It's the only one where the individual person is at the base of the control structure of the enterprise, as I said, on a one-member/one-vote basis.

Mr Carr: Did you want to comment on that?

Ms Corcoran: I would just add that in terms of the specific issue of unions, co-ops can either be unionized or not.

Mr Carr: I was thinking specifically of the non-unions. Everybody should be included, right?

Ms Corcoran: Co-ops can be non-unions, and as far as we are concerned, and I can only speak about co-ops, whether they're unionized or not we would want them to be included. I can't speak for any other type of enterprise.

Mr Carr: Basically you're saying, "We don't want to talk about other groups; we're specifically here for this." Our feeling is that no group should be excluded, whatever the reason, and you're saying you don't want to discuss that issue, you're only here to talk about the co-ops.

The Chair: I'd like to thank you for coming before this committee with your presentation.

Mr Goldblatt: Thanks for giving us the opportunity.

The Chair: I've been talking to the Minister of Revenue, and for any members of the committee here who would like more information, on Tuesday, May 26, at 3:30 in the boardroom on the fourth floor of the Hearst Block, if anyone has any questions on the amendments or any other questions on Bill 150, as we said before, these people are available on an ongoing basis, but they are willing to meet with this whole committee on any questions.

So this committee will be adjourned until May 28 at 10 o'clock. We'd like to start sharp because we have quite a few presentations, so if some members aren't here, we'd like to start at 10. Hansard will be available for people who miss the first three or four minutes of the beginning of the presentations.

The committee adjourned at 1124.

CONTENTS

Thursday 14 May 1992

Labour Sponsored Venture Capital Corporations Act, 1992, Bill 150	F-35
Working Ventures Canadian Fund Inc	F-35
Ron Begg, president
James W. Hall, vice-president, investments
Ontario Worker Co-op Association	F-39
John Brouwer, president
Bespoke Co-operative Enterprises Inc; Co-op Housing Federation of Eastern Ontario	F-42
Hazel Corcoran, member, BCEI
Mark B. Goldblatt, president, CHFEO

STANDING COMMITTEE ON FINANCE AND ECONOMIC AFFAIRS

- Chair / Président: Hansen, Ron (Lincoln ND)
- Vice-Chair / Vice-Président: Sutherland, Kimble (Oxford ND)
- *Caplan, Elinor (Oriole L)
- *Carr, Gary (Oakville South/-Sud PC)
- *Christopherson, David (Hamilton Centre ND)
- Jamison, Norm (Norfolk ND)
- Kwinter, Monte (Wilson Heights L)
- *Phillips, Gerry (Scarborough-Agincourt L)
- *Sterling, Norman W. (Carleton PC)
- *Ward, Brad (Brantford ND)
- Ward, Margery (Don Mills ND)
- *Wiseman, Jim (Durham West/-Ouest ND)

Substitutions / Membres remplaçants:

- *Owens, Stephen (Scarborough Centre ND) for Ms Ward

*In attendance / présents

Also taking part / Autres participants et participantes:

Evans, Jim, executive director, revenue services and operations branch, Ministry of Revenue
Alkalay, George R., special adviser, deposit institutions division, Ministry of Financial Institutions

Clerk / Greffier: Decker, Todd

Staff / Personnel: Campbell, Elaine, research officer, Legislative Research Service

Legislative Assembly of Ontario

Second session, 35th Parliament

Assemblée législative de l'Ontario

Deuxième session, 35^e législature

Official Report of Debates (Hansard)

Thursday 28 May 1992

Journal des débats (Hansard)

Jeudi 28 mai 1992

Standing committee on finance and economic affairs

Labour Sponsored Venture
Capital Corporations Act, 1992

Comité permanent des finances et des affaires économiques

Loi de 1992 sur les corporations
à capital de risque de travailleurs

Chair: Ron Hansen
Clerk: Todd Decker

Président : Ron Hansen
Greffier : Todd Decker

Table of Contents

Table of Contents for proceedings reported in this issue appears on the outside back cover, together with a list of committee members and others taking part.

Index inquiries

Reference to a cumulative index of previous issues may be obtained by calling the Hansard Reporting Service indexing staff at (416) 325-7410 or 325-7411.

Numbering of committee reports

Effective with the opening of the Second Session of the 35th Parliament, committee reports and pages are numbered according to session, rather than calendar year as before.

Subscriptions

Subscription information may be obtained from: Sessional Subscription Service, Publications Ontario, Ministry of Government Services, 5th Floor, 880 Bay Street, Toronto, Ontario, M7A 1N8. Phone (416) 326-5310, 326-5311 or toll-free 1 (800) 668-9938.

Table des matières

La table des matières des séances rapportées dans ce numéro se trouve sur la couverture à l'arrière de ce fascicule, ainsi qu'une liste des membres du comité et d'autres personnes ayant participé.

Renseignements sur l'index

Il existe un index cumulatif des numéros précédents. Les renseignements qu'il contient sont à votre disposition par téléphone auprès des employés de l'index du Journal des débats au (416) 325-7410 ou 325-7411.

Numérotation des rapports de comités

A partir du début de la deuxième session de la 35^e législature, les pages et les numéros des rapports de comités sont numérotés par session et non plus par l'année civile.

Abonnements

Pour les abonnements, veuillez prendre contact avec le Service d'abonnement parlementaire, Publications Ontario, ministère des Services gouvernementaux, 5^e étage, 880, rue Bay, Toronto (Ontario) M7A 1N8. Par téléphone : (416) 326-5310, 326-5311 ou, sans frais : 1 (800) 668-9938.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

STANDING COMMITTEE ON FINANCE AND ECONOMIC AFFAIRS

Thursday 28 May 1992

The committee met at 1006 in committee room 1.

LABOUR SPONSORED VENTURE CAPITAL CORPORATIONS ACT, 1992

LOI DE 1992 SUR LES CORPORATIONS À CAPITAL DE RISQUE DE TRAVAILLEURS

Resuming consideration of Bill 150, An Act to provide for the Creation and Registration of Labour Sponsored Venture Capital Corporations to Invest in Eligible Ontario Businesses and to make certain other amendments / Loi prévoyant la création et l'inscription de corporations à capital de risque de travailleurs aux fins d'investissement dans des entreprises ontariennes admissibles et apportant des modifications corrélatives.

The Chair (Mr Ron Hansen): I'd like to welcome everybody to the standing committee on finance and economic affairs. This morning we're having hearings on Bill 150, An Act to provide for the Creation and Registration of Labour Sponsored Venture Capital Corporations to Invest in Eligible Ontario Businesses and to make certain other amendments.

CANADIAN FEDERATION OF INDEPENDENT BUSINESS

The Chair: The first group to come before us this morning that I'd like to welcome is the Canadian Federation of Independent Business. We have one half-hour for the presentation and in that half an hour, please leave some time for questions of the three parties. Would you please identify yourselves for the purposes of Hansard? You may begin.

Ms Linda Ruth Ciglen: My name is Linda Ruth Ciglen and I'm the director of provincial affairs for Ontario. With me is my colleague Bill Parsons, our director of political action.

You've got two items before you. One is our statement. It's briefer than a brief so we're calling it a statement and it really just focuses on one aspect of the proposed program which is the objective of providing capital to small and medium-sized businesses through labour-sponsored venture capital funds. Accompanying it is a backgrounder, our very recently produced report on the banking industry that just gives you some flavour of how the banks, and not equity financing, are the primary source of funding for small businesses.

As many of you know, because we've been here before, the Canadian Federation of Independent Business is a non-partisan political action organization. It represents about 83,000 members across Canada and about 40,000 here in Ontario. Our members are independent, Canadian-owned and -operated, small and medium-sized businesses. They are from every sector of the economy. They live in every corner of the province.

They range in sizes and ages from one-person proprietorships up to over 500-employee companies. About a third of them are located in rural areas, a third in smaller urban centres and a third in large metropolitan centres. Approximately one out of every eight small businesses in Ontario is a CFIB member.

This is not news to some of you who have seen us before, but I'd just like to stress again the important role that small businesses play in the economy. In 1989, which is the last best year of available data, there were over 320,000 firms operating in Ontario's private sector and 96% of these firms had fewer than 50 employees. It really is a small business universe out there.

These small businesses employ one third, about 30%, of the Ontario workforce and they also create most of the net new jobs in the economy. In the 10-year period 1979 to 1989, which again is the most recent available data, three quarters of all net new jobs in Ontario came from businesses with fewer than 50 employees. Another 300,000 Ontarians are sole proprietors operating without any employees who also count as small businesses.

The labour-sponsored venture capital program is being promoted by the government as a way to "provide small and medium-sized companies with a new source of capital which they can use to modernize for growth and for restructuring of their operations." That's a direct quote from John Whitehead who was before you when the bill first came before this committee. He also estimated that the program is projected to cost Ontario taxpayers up to $250 million at maturity.

Our analysis of the program shows this program is not an appropriate vehicle for encouraging modernization, growth and restructuring in small and medium-sized Ontario companies. It also shows that Ontario taxpayers, including the small business community, will not get good value for their hard-earned tax dollars from this program. A much better use of the $250 million the program is projected to cost and which would accomplish the objectives of the program is to exempt the first $400,000 of payroll from the purview of the employer health tax.

As you know, we gather data from our members on a continuous basis. Our field representatives see nearly 2,000 Canadian businesses a week, and about 800 of them are in Ontario. During these face-to-face visits, the members talk to our field representatives about the problems their firms are facing.

The number one problem, as it has been for a number of years, is not the access to financing but the crushing weight of the total tax burden imposed on small firms by all three levels of government. At the back of your brief, there's a chart that gives the most recent breakout of what small businesses feel are their major problems. Total tax burden is number one, and it just keeps getting bigger and bigger. About 10 years ago, in the last recession, somewhere around 40% to 42% of the members were reporting that total tax burden was a problem for them. Now in Ontario it's over 87%.

By contrast, you'll see near the bottom that less than a quarter of the members report that availability of financing is a problem for them. It's the one just above that catch-all "Other" category. The labour-sponsored venture capital program is thus based on a faulty assumption about what small business needs. The small businesses of Ontario are saying loud and clear that what they need is tax relief, not a program to make financing available, which over three quarters of them don't need and which siphons off even more of their hard-earned tax dollars.

Even if availability of financing were a bigger problem than it is in the small business community, the labour-sponsored venture capital program is inappropriately designed to deliver a solution. Small businesses fund their growth, modernization and restructuring plans through borrowings from their bank, through their own internal retained earnings and through loans or investments in relatively modest amounts from friends and family members. They are not well suited for outside investors to take equity positions.

The amounts of money that small firms typically need, when you weigh them against the amount of due diligence screening that equity investors require, particularly administrators of a mutual fund that have their funds at risk, make equity investments in small firms financially unattractive. It just costs too much up front to do the screening for the amount of money you're actually going to place. It doesn't make sense in a cost-benefit analysis. When the fund holders spend that much money up front doing the screening, they want to place a bigger amount of money for a bigger return to make it worthwhile. When you're only talking about $100,000, it usually doesn't pay out.

When Working Ventures came before you, they basically talked about the fact that they had reviewed nearly 200 business plans to get a short list of 10 proposals, of which two have investment potential. They're obviously doing a good job. That is very par for the course in the venture capital industry. There is an awful lot of screening to do before you come up with the ones that are worth investing in, and in order to recover the costs of the highly skilled investment professionals who have to be employed in this task over the number of months that it takes, the investments need to be chosen in order to produce a substantial return. In a cost-benefit analysis, outside equity investments in small firms just aren't worth it.

The government program designers know this. They have obviously heard and heeded—rightly so—the advice from the financial and venture capital industries. The outside parameters for eligible investments—$50 million in assets and 500 employees—allow for those bigger investments that are really needed to make this program viable. What that also means is that most of them will be pushing the parameters at the big end. It's just not going to work for the program in any other way. Those are the investments that will produce a cost-beneficial return for the fund investors. It's entirely understandable from an investment perspective. We're not criticizing it at all, but the point is that it will not produce benefits for small business. It's just not appropriate for that.

Table 1 in your brief gives a picture of the distribution by asset size of Canadian firms for 12 manufacturing industries. The data unfortunately are not available on an Ontario break-out. This is the way Statistics Canada provides it. However, these 12 firms tend to be Ontario-based and we can probably, in a ballpark estimate, figure that about 60% to 80% of these companies would be in Ontario.

The table shows the average asset size and average employee size per firm for each industry listed. It's clear when you look at the table that 95% of the firms have assets that are less than $5 million. Those first three columns consist of 95% of all the firms listed. Less than 4% of the firms have assets between $5 million and $25 million, and less than 1% are in the $25 million to $100 million category.

They didn't break it out by $50 million; otherwise we could have just stopped at that because those are the parameters of the program, but again this is the way Statistics Canada provides it. Basically, given that the investment realities dictate that the investments will probably cluster around the $50-million-asset cutoff point, only a minuscule number of firms at the high end of the medium-sized scale will be the beneficiaries of this program.

The available data from the Quebec prototype program, the solidarity fund, bear out these findings. Although reports of the total solidarity fund size vary between $450 million and $575 million, the reports are that only about $200 million, which is 35% to 45% of the total fund, is actually invested in Quebec companies. Again we're not faulting that from an investment perspective; it needs to be that way, but it again shows that that money doesn't flow to the small businesses. Moreover, this $200 million has been invested in only 97 Quebec companies since the inception of the fund in 1985. This is an average investment of over $2 million per company and an investment frequency average of about 16 deals a year.

Under the circumstances, it verges on misrepresentation for the government to portray this program as helping small and medium-sized business. It may do other things, it may have other objectives that are in line with what the government wants to do, but it is not going to be effective to help small and medium-sized businesses. Far from helping them, the program can actually work to the detriment of them; 99% of the small and medium-sized firms will not be able to benefit from this program because investment realities preclude them as a potential investment target, yet all of them will pay for the program through their tax dollars. In fact, their biggest competitors will be subsidized by the program at their expense. This is clearly unfair.

If the government is planning to spend up to $250 million on this program, there is a vastly simpler way to do so and benefit every small business in the province at a low to nil administrative cost. The Canadian Federation of Independent Business has been recommending for a number of years that an exemption be allowed for the first $400,000 of payroll that's subject to the employer health tax. This is parallel to the exemption that was first introduced in Manitoba under the NDP government of Howard Pawley, and the Manitoba exemption now stands at $600,000. Employers with payrolls of under $600,000 do not pay any employer health tax in Manitoba. It exempts all the small businesses. Such an exemption would most benefit the smallest firms that are hardest hit by regressive payroll taxes like the employer health tax.

The government estimates that 90% of the $2.6 billion that's raised yearly through payments by the province's employers to the employer health tax is paid by the larger companies with over $400,000 of payroll. So the impact on revenues of this exemption would therefore be in the neighbourhood of the $250 million the government is projecting will be spent through the labour-sponsored venture capital program.

The beneficial impact of this exemption is really incalculable. Besides the shot in the arm of a tax break where small firms need it most, on a regressive, job-killing payroll tax, the retained earnings that are left in the small business because it is not paying them out to the government could be put to work hiring people and creating jobs. When people are hired they pay personal income tax on their salary, which flows to the government and benefits the government. They also have disposable income in their hands, which they can then spend in the economy and help the economy recover; more retail sales tax revenues for the government again. As the economy gets back on its feet and corporate profits recover, corporate income tax revenues will again go higher.

So it looks like the government is forgoing the money, but if it's planning to forgo it anyway, this is a much better way that's going to benefit everybody rather than just a few minuscule companies that might get the benefits through venture capital investment. More than programs or well-meant words about helping small businesses, Ontario's small firms would appreciate this practical gesture that shows them their government understands small business realities and is on their side. Thank you, and we'd be pleased to take your questions.

1020

Mr Gary Carr (Oakville South): Thank you very much for your presentation. I was interested in the charts which show some of the concerns of small business in back. We brought this up on numerous occasions to both the Minister of Industry, Trade and Technology and the Treasurer, and it often seems that governments worry about the mice in the basement when there's elephants on the roof type of syndrome.

I notice on page 1 you quoted the government, "to provide small and medium-sized companies with a new source of capital." When the government says this program will do that, I think you said very clearly it is wrong about that. Is that right?

Ms Ciglen: That's right. Small businesses capitalize themselves in basically three ways: They borrow from their banks, they use their own retained earnings and they get modest loans from families and friends because they don't have to go through the same kind of structure. A tax break to small business represents increased retained earnings in the firm, which is a source of capital for them. It's a much better, more effective source of capital for them than a program.

Mr Carr: One of the reasons for this program, I believe, is to help the big unionized companies, yet they say they want to help the small and mediums, because I think that's politically popular. I know in New Directions we talked about the employee payroll tax and what we would do when we're in government and outlined some of those things as well. What you're saying is, if you really want to help small and medium businesses with the money you're going to spend, this is how you could do it?

Ms Ciglen: That's right. This is not the way. There may be other legitimate government policy reasons for going ahead with this program, and we're not even addressing those. All we're saying is, don't pretend this is going to help the small business sector.

Mr Carr: I guess that's our feeling as well. If you're going to do it for the big unionized companies, at least be up front—

Ms Ciglen: Be up front about it.

Mr Carr: —and honest and say that it's going to be for the larger companies.

Mr Bill Parsons: If anyone other than government was advertising this program for small business, the consumer affairs ministry would be after them for false advertising. The facts just don't bear it out.

Mr Carr: Let me ask you this: Having been involved with watching the political workings, why do you think the government is trying to basically—I don't want to mislead people with this. Why do you believe they are attempting to do this and sell the program that way?

Ms Ciglen: I think a lot of it is just the way this government still doesn't understand the realities of small business. I think they are attempting to get their minds around it, but they're still pretty far away.

When the earlier consultation went on, we went in and met with the Treasury staff and we told them exactly what we're telling you right now. Not a line of it, not a word of it showed up anywhere, and they're still maintaining that it's for small business. I don't know if they didn't understand it or if they just chose to ignore it, but we haven't said anything differently to you than what we said to John Whitehead and the other group we met with last summer when they were consulting about this.

Mr Carr: That's the frustrating part, as you know. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Technology says, "We're listening and consulting." We get rather sick when we hear that comment, because even if they didn't say it, the fact is they are coming in but there are no results.

Again, I'll give this government a little bit of its due and say it isn't purposely doing this to mislead the people but it doesn't understand. Rather than having to have any type of experience in looking at it, all they have to do is listen to the people who represent 83,000 small businesses, who see 800 small businesses. I mean, you consult with them more than this government—any government—will ever do. Yet they turn around and say, "We're consulting," but you don't see anything coming in as a result of it. That's the frustrating part.

Ms Ciglen: This is not to say that there isn't going to be the occasional small or medium-sized business a program like this could help, but the benefits to one or two that might be helped compared to the 300,000 that are just going to be paying for it through their taxes and not get any benefits; that's why we feel it's really a misrepresentation to say this is going to be helpful to small business.

The Chair: We have to move on.

Mr Monte Kwinter (Wilson Heights): Thank you for your presentation, and I agree that the intent of the program is different from what the government's advertising of it is. I was a minister at the time when this was being discussed, certainly at the initiative of labour, and my perception at the time was that labour wanted to have a pool it could invest in startup companies to encourage development.

That's really what a venture capital fund is. Venture capital is not used to address providing "small and medium-sized companies with a new source of capital which they can use to modernize, for growth and for restructuring of their operations." I agree with you that the amounts of money the average small business would require would not make it economically feasible to do it.

As a matter of fact, I had someone in just the other day trying to access some government funds and he was told that at $10 million or $11 million it wasn't worth anybody pursuing it and there were no programs available at that level. They'd have to be up at a much higher level before the federal government would get involved. So I agree.

I also think there's a problem in that access to capital doesn't seem to be the problem when you're talking about venture capital. It's projects which are viable that are the problem. I think the government would probably be better advised to encourage that kind of thing because good projects with good viability can attract capital. It's only the projects that are not viable, the companies that are in trouble, that are looking for capital. They're the ones saying, "We need some government help because otherwise we're going to fail." That is a problem. I was just wondering if you have any comments on that.

Mr Parsons: I would say that one need only look to the province of Alberta and what's gone on there in the last week to understand the very risky nature of government getting involved at the bigger-project level through any vehicle. Novatel was the high flyer, high-tech Alberta diversification company that was going to change the province. They now have a $566-million tab to pay. There are a number of other examples in Alberta and the total is $1 billion.

You have to ask yourselves, as custodians of the taxpayers' money, if you want to follow down that path, which is a logical next step with these types of bigger funds and where they go. The money goes to the bigger project, but if the project fails you lose an awful lot of money.

Ms Ciglen: The only thing I'd like to add to that, from a perspective of the problem you've raised, Mr Kwinter, is for government to really address why firms fail and what goes wrong, why they get into trouble. One of the things we keep hearing from our members is that one of the major causes of their problems is the total tax burden. It is just crushingly heavy right now.

The fact that in the last recession only some 40% of firms were saying the tax burden was their number one problem and now 87% are saying it shows how much the burden has grown in the last 10 years, and it's at all three levels of government. Governments have voracious appetites for revenue right now; most of them are in deficit positions or would be.

The problems it's creating in the economy in the small business sector because of that are mammoth and you can't solve them by finding a program to throw more money into small business; you've got to address it at the root. Our entire tax structure really needs to be reviewed and revised to make it more viable for firms to be successful, particularly the small ones that are being hit so much by these regressive taxes. The costs go up and up and up and they just don't have any room to manoeuvre and eventually they go under.

The Chair: Mr Phillips, one short question.

Mr Gerry Phillips (Scarborough-Agincourt): Thank you very much for the comment. Realistically, the government is going to proceed with Bill 150 and I wonder—this is always a bit of a trap for an organization because once you start commenting on it you've kind of bought into it—have you any thoughts, on the assumption it is going to proceed, on how it might be improved, from the CFIB's viewpoint?

Ms Ciglen: There really isn't any way to improve it that would make it viable for small business. The best thing the government could do is stop pretending it's going to help small business. The nature of venture capital and the nature of the due diligence screening that needs to be done and the types of money small businesses are typically looking for, there's just not a match. It just doesn't mesh.

That's why traditional venture capital in the private sector doesn't usually have a lot to do with small businesses. Sometimes there can be high-tech startups that are appropriate for it, that start off small but are going to grow fast really quickly, but for the vast majority of small businesses venture capital is not an appropriate vehicle. So it's just not a match.

The best thing the government can do is stop pretending it's going to help the small business community, because it's not. It may have other policy reasons for doing it, and we're not going to comment on those, but it is a misrepresentation to say this program is going to help small business.

The Chair: We'll go on to Mr Jamison.

1030

Mr Norm Jamison (Norfolk): I think part of the thrust is that in your opinion you're not being heard as far as the direction your organization would like to see the government go is concerned. I can say that there have been a number of directives from the last budget that may not hit right on the things that you'd like to see in a budget but certainly do help small business, the potential of that help being the $10,000 that is made available for hiring new employees and the 0.5% drop in the tax rate, those kinds of things.

But in saying that, as chair of the parliamentary assistants committee for small business I know we listened to a number of groups. We inquired a number of times to meet with you, and you indicated that you couldn't find the time to meet with us prior to the budget. I would have been interested in having this prior to the budget, because I can tell you that when you talk about going to Treasury, the parliamentary assistants committee is set up to interact with the small business community, all the sectors involved there, to try to map out a course, a direction that we as a recognized committee can set forward to the Premier. If there was just some advice I could give you, that is to really consider making the time to meet with the parliamentary assistants committee because it does have that direct responsibility and the responsibility from there to report to the Treasurer.

I don't see that there isn't going to be a positive effect for small business from this document, even if what you're saying is correct, because small business in fact relies very heavily on the success and nature of large business in many circumstances, so I don't necessarily agree with that. But if there was something I should say to you it is that there have been some very recognizable changes, beneficial changes that are coming forward for small business. Again, I detect an overall tone of negativity, but certainly the tax system built around small business was not built in one single move and the changes under financial situations that are exacerbated at this time are ones in which we moved in those directions.

The other thing I'd like to say is that there is a direction now being taken to reduce the paper burden. I remember talking to you specifically about that. That is something again that has to take place in stages so it works, to put it that way.

I'd like to say to you that I detect a very strong tone of negativity. I don't fault you; recessionary times bring that on in people. But if I have any advice for you, it is that the parliamentary assistants committee for small business is a vehicle you should be using and unfortunately haven't used at this point.

Ms Ciglen: Let me just respond to that. I appreciate, Norm, that it wasn't you and I speaking directly and that we were going through the officials at the Ministry of Industry, Trade and Technology. I'm sorry if what you were told was that we didn't have the time, because that was not the case. What we said was that we would like to come and speak to the parliamentary assistants committee about the labour law reform because that was the thing that our members were most concerned about at that time. We were told that was a no-go. That is why we did not appear. It was not a question of time, and I appreciate it was not a direct communication between you and me.

Mr Jamison: There must have been some misunderstanding. We didn't want that to predominate a meeting on looking at the tax structure.

Ms Ciglen: Anyway, that—

The Chair: Mr Sutherland, one quick question.

Ms Ciglen: Can I finish responding to Mr Jamison? There were some questions in there. Basically, the one thing that this government has done that has improved the lot of small business the most is raise the limits in the Small Claims Court. That is something we have been asking for for years and we are extremely pleased to see that. That is going to make a big difference to a number of small businesses.

The fact that there is a commitment to raise the limit province-wide to $6,000 next year is again a help. I know the Attorney General has personally said that he's committed to having it go as high as $15,000, which would be a tremendous help for small business. That's one of the best things this government has done. Under the previous government, the limit was raised but it was never proclaimed in force. It's something small businesses have been waiting for for some time and that's great.

With regard to the tax system, the trouble with looking at dropping a tax rate on corporate income tax as the budget did is that when businesses are not making any money it doesn't help them. It looks good on paper, but it doesn't actually put any more dollars in their pocket if they're not paying taxes now because they don't have any income now. The kind of taxes they are paying, no matter whether they're making money or not, are payroll taxes. They've got to pay them whether they're taking in any revenues or making any profits or not.

That's why we're saying that what would have made a bigger difference would have been some kind of break on the payroll tax level. The corporate income tax level looks good on paper, but for those businesses really hurting it's not going to give them any more money in their pockets to hire somebody. That's our concern and we come to basically tell you the facts about what's going on in small business.

The Chair: Okay, the clock has run out and I hate to interrupt the questioning going on here, but we'll have to move on to our next group. I'd like to thank you for appearing before this committee.

Ms Ciglen: You're welcome.

ONTARIO FEDERATION OF LABOUR

The Chair: The next group we've got coming forward is from the Ontario Federation of Labour. Do you have a handout, sir?

Mr Chris Schenk: Yes, sir.

The Chair: Okay, the clerk will pick up the copies there. I'd like to welcome you here to the standing committee on finance and economic affairs and your participation coming up on Bill 150. You have one half-hour and in that half-hour, if you can, leave some time at the end for questions and answers with the three parties. If you wouldn't mind identifying yourself, sir, for the purposes of Hansard and the committee here, you may begin.

Mr Schenk: Thank you. My name is Chris Schenk. I'm the research director of the Ontario Federation of Labour. I have a short presentation to make and time for your questions. Perhaps if you're running behind time we can help you out.

The Ontario Federation of Labour is pleased to present its views to the standing committee on finance and economic affairs concerning Bill 150. I want to run through part of the written presentation and part of it concerns details which I will leave for your own perusal. As you know, the vast majority of trade unions in the province, public and private sector, are affiliated to the Ontario Federation of Labour, consisting of about 800,000 affiliated members. Since this subject concerns working people, we are most interested in the provisions of the bill.

As you know, the bill has two parts. The first one concerns employee ownership and the second part concerns the labour-sponsored investment fund corporations. I will talk about these two parts in that order and then I'd like to present the case for a social investment fund, which would involve some changes to the latter proposal in the bill.

The first part is the employee-owned, labour-sponsored venture capital corporations. These are designed to encourage worker takeovers of firms in which they are employed. This concerns majority employee ownership. The participation of the federal government is also a question here in terms of the tax breaks. But, as you know, to facilitate the process of majority employee ownership there will be an Ontario tax credit of 20% to the first $3,500 invested and up to 30% on incremental investments to a maximum annual investment of $15,000.

1040

The Ontario Federation of Labour supports this experiment in employee ownership, as we noted in the OFL convention document, Economic Renewal—Our Vision.

"In periods of severe economic recession, it may well be necessary to exercise the option of buying out one's employer. Mechanisms allowing for employee ownership in the face of closure, such as Algoma Steel"—in the Sioux—"and Spruce Falls Pulp and Paper Mill in Kapuskasing, are valuable experiments and often the only alternative workers have to the loss of their jobs."

While such employee ownership therefore could make a welcome contribution to a more democratically structured and egalitarian society, we are not unaware that coming to grips with Ontario's economic problems will take considerably further innovation and more substantial economic intervention.

The harsh reality is that the option of majority worker ownership has rarely involved workers taking over strong and profitable firms. It usually emerges as a final effort to save jobs by taking over facilities that employers don't want for reasons of market difficulties, central to which of course is the level of corporate profitability. It is therefore difficult to see how this can form the basis for a widespread alternative to an increasingly unregulated market economy.

Fortunately, the government is addressing the issues of economic development in other venues such as taxation, skills development and institutional investment funds. We in the Ontario Federation of Labour will follow these developments with interest. None the less, we think the employee ownership provision is a valuable one and I would certainly like to leave you with that thought.

On the labour-sponsored investment funds, the other part of the bill, these are modelled on the Quebec solidarity fund and are designed to generate venture capital from employees. To qualify for a tax credit, individuals must make investments in a registered labour-sponsored investment fund. The qualifications and the tax breaks are generous. Nevertheless, there are questions concerning the philosophy and purpose of this fund which are not so easily answered.

First, to our knowledge, there has been no research presented to indicate that a lack of venture capital is a major problem in the economy of Ontario. Either we have missed something or you people know something we don't. We have never seen it documented that this is a major problem, and we think it would be valuable not to assume but to document.

Second, if there were such "capital gaps," the question that arises is, why should union members and other employees be the central focus of raising the necessary moneys rather than those individuals and institutions with capital who are in the business of providing it for a fee? If the rules are too rigid or the price is too high, surely amendments in these areas would come first and foremost.

Although working people in Quebec have supported the Quebec solidarity fund, on which the labour-sponsored investment fund is modelled, we remain unconvinced that there is any advantage for our members to use their hard-earned moneys for purposes of bailing out small companies, all the while remaining minority holders.

As an investment, the rate of return for Quebec solidarity fund shareholders has been very low. A Canada savings bond has a higher rate of return in the long term. If you looked at it over 10 years, for example, by the end of 10 years, even with the tax breaks, the Quebec equivalent of the fund you are establishing in this bill would not produce more than a Canada savings bond. We would suggest that the reason many Quebec employees have invested in the QSF is more for purposes of a tax break than an investment with a high or even comparable rate of return. Without detailing the evidence here, it is suffice to note that the Quebec solidarity fund record on job creation is also disappointingly low.

The Ontario Federation of Labour has long debated the role of such venture capital funds, including a lengthy discussion at our last convention. In our view, while majority ownership may well be an option for workers, minority ownership venture capital funds are not. They amount to buying into the margins of the economy without having any say over how it operates or how it is structured. Indeed, in being so peripheral economically and promoting a culture of tax breaks, such funds may function to divert attention from the important and complex problems of economic strategy and the substantial investment necessary for economic renewal.

A labour-managed social investment fund: The purpose of a social investment fund as proposed by the Ontario Federation of Labour is to channel a portion of workers' weekly savings into socially advantageous economic projects such as non-profit housing and environmental projects. Such a fund, designed with social targets, would necessitate substantial amendments to the proposal for a labour-sponsored investment fund in Bill 150.

Let me give you briefly some background on this. The idea of a social investment fund is not a new one in Ontario. Indeed it precedes this government.

Back on January 25, 1989, the Ontario Federation of Labour met with the then Liberal Premier of Ontario, David Peterson, and several cabinet ministers on the topic of a labour-managed investment fund. Following this meeting, Mr Peterson wrote the OFL inviting the labour movement to consider the establishment of such a fund. This invitation followed a similar recommendation contained in volume 1 of the Premier's Council reports—the Premier's Council which was prior to the one now struck.

The Ontario Federation of Labour proceeded to establish a task force to review the notion of a labour-managed social investment fund. The report of this task force favoured the creation of a social investment fund, was adopted by the OFL executive board and passed by the delegates to the November 1989 convention. This issue was revisited, with similar results, by the delegates to the November 1991 convention.

Let me take just a moment to mention the key principles behind a social investment fund. The Ontario Federation of Labour task force produced a summary statement on four key principles that should inform such a project. These are useful for the committee in assessing the Bill 150 labour-sponsored investment fund and the OFL proposal and are therefore outlined below.

1. The objective: socially useful investment. That would be the objective of the fund. It would be to promote socially useful economic projects, the initial focus of which, we would think, should be affordable cooperative housing, initiatives in the environmental sector involving recycling and conservation technology and, based upon these experiences, perhaps certain types of community economic development.

2. What do we think are counterproductive pursuits? A labour-managed fund should not be geared, in our view, to trying to save plants that are threatened with closure. This problem must be dealt with through other mechanisms. Nor should the fund be set up to promote competitiveness in the manufacturing sector. Finally, the projects undertaken by the fund should not compete with public programs.

3. Part of a broader strategy: The projects undertaken by a labour-managed social investment fund will not solve our major problems. Rather the activities of such a fund should be seen as catalytic. Their purpose should be to increase the pressure on the government to support socially useful investment. A labour-managed social investment fund would therefore fit into our broader strategy of fighting for increased public investment social projects, working to politicize our members to increase their level of awareness and building coalitions for progressive social change.

4. Solidarity and the system of financing a fund: Workers who make deposits in a labour-managed fund would do so because they support the objectives of the fund, not because they are seeking tax dodges or higher capital gains. The financing of a labour-managed fund should be designed so that there is no individual enrichment as a result of either tax assistance or capital gains. The only valid motivation is support for the social goals of the project and solidarity in doing so. The fund would offer a way for those workers who are able to channel a fraction of their savings into socially progressive projects in exchange for a relatively safe and fair rate of return. Under no circumstances would deposits in a labour-managed fund be an acceptable alternative to a pension plan.

The OFL task force stated at the conclusion of its outline of the above principles, "In any discussions that are pursued with the Ontario government, we must make clear that only a model that incorporates these four basic principles will be acceptable to the labour movement in this province." It is for this reason that we have taken the time to outline them for you.

1050

In conclusion, the social investment model that is envisioned is discussed in greater detail in the attached memorandum regarding a labour-managed social investment fund. It is submitted for purposes of providing a practical and viable alternative to the current proposal for a labour-sponsored investment fund. Given economy of time and space, only the key elements of the memorandum are referred to here.

First, it contains a basic description of the proposed fund, its capital base, the focus of the proposed investment activity and its policy regarding a fair rate of return.

Second, the memorandum concerns issues integral to a social investment fund that need to be worked out in concert with the government, such as the legal structure, access to payroll deduction, the pros and cons of various tax measures, the necessary startup assistance and the need for certain technical and feasibility studies. These are outlined, along with some cost proposals.

One additional point should be made here. The Ontario Federation of Labour favours including worker cooperatives as organizations that should be covered under Bill 150. This would involve including in part I, definitions, "an association of federation of worker cooperatives," along with trade unions. In our view, this inclusion should thereafter inform the act.

All of the above points concerning a labour-managed social investment fund are made within the framework of the principles discussed earlier.

In conclusion, we encourage all members of the committee to examine the enclosed memorandum, which is a concise overview of the full task force conducted by the Ontario Federation of Labour.

The Chair: Mr Evans just pointed out to me a few of the items in here where there have been some amendments to the bill. I believe your group has not received them as yet. Perhaps he can just go over the amounts there and maybe you can correct a few in your book, and the rest of the members, so when they're reading your brief it's correct.

Mr Jim Evans: In relation to both the federal and provincial budgets of 1992, there were limits that were modified in relation to the fund activity that you describe on page 4. I believe the asset limit for 1992 is $50 million; the 20% of the Ontario tax credit will now apply to the first $1,000, with matching federal credits; and the limit will be up to the first $5,000, not to the first $3,500. That is on the fund activity only. The employee ownership is as you have described. It's my understanding that the government intends to introduce amendments to the bill to reflect those numbers I have just given you.

Mr Schenk: That was $5,000 instead of $3,500?

Mr Evans: Yes.

The Chair: I believe Mr Phillips had his hand up there.

Mr Phillips: I appreciate the brief. As you quite correctly point out, to accommodate the social investment fund requires fairly dramatic revisions to the bill as it's currently drafted. Is it the OFL's position that, as it's currently structured, the OFL has no interest in it and would not participate in it?

Mr Schenk: We would participate in the first part on employee ownership. That is a part that we think is valuable. In the Algoma Steel situation I think we virtually have a worker buyout. It's a valuable experiment and perhaps, as we state here, the only way to save people's jobs. It perhaps will lead to some interesting experiments in technology and work design as well, so we're very much in favour of that.

It's the labour-sponsored investment fund, which is to raise money from workers to give out to those small and medium-sized firms which allegedly have experienced capital gaps, that we don't think is valuable. We would much prefer to have that socially targeted, along the lines of what we suggest. So, yes, it is something that we think needs substantial amendment and it's something that we do not favour.

Mr Phillips: I guess there were words in here somewhere that suggest you wouldn't participate in it. I'm trying to find those words.

Mr Schenk: We are not interested in participating in the labour-sponsored investment fund aspect of the act.

Mr Phillips: Does it make much sense for the government to proceed with it, then? There are two groups, I think, that are eligible, yours and the Canadian Labour Congress. You're the huge organization here in Ontario. What economic value is there in even proceeding with this if you're not going to participate?

Mr Schenk: That would be something you would want to ask the government. I can only say that we had discussed this in the 1989 convention and we discussed it again at the 1991 convention. As a federation of labour, of course, we are an overall umbrella body that tries to coordinate and develop labour positions on issues like this. We don't have any way, other than moral suasion, of enforcing that view, so you may find some unions are interested in this and some are not, but I think we would do our best to put forward our view and the view these unions themselves voted on through their delegates at our conventions.

Mr Kwinter: I just wanted to make a comment. I'm delighted to hear your comments, because as the response I made to the previous presenter indicated, during 1989 when labour came to us and presented their ideas, exactly what you have outlined is what I envisioned was going to happen. This particular piece of legislation does not respond to that. I echo the thoughts of my colleague Mr Phillips. If this was supposedly a labour initiative and it was supposed to be a response to that initiative and it doesn't address it, why is this being pursued? Because it doesn't do what it's supposed to do, that is, to help small and medium-sized businesses, it doesn't deal with the social fund labour wanted. It's neither fish nor fowl; it doesn't serve the purpose and doesn't answer the need. Do you have any comments on that, other than you say that's not for you to respond?

Mr Schenk: I'm not so sure there's not some need for these kinds of funds. The point I tried to make is that I have never seen documentation. I've never seen it empirically proven to me that there is a problem for small business in getting capital. I think the case could be made, perhaps, but I've just never seen that. I'm not opposed to raising and providing capital to small and medium businesses. I'm not at all trying to suggest that. I'm just saying that I haven't seen that. There just needs to be a case made there, as far as I'm concerned. I certainly would prefer the bill to have a social investment aspect to it.

Mr Paul R. Johnson (Prince Edward-Lennox-South Hastings): I just wanted to say that there's an impression that worker investment will be viewed in some cases as bailing out their employers. That need not be the case and may in fact never be the case, because the intention of this bill is not for employees to bail out their employers if they find themselves in particular difficulty. In fact, in certain situations it may be advantageous for employees, for example, in the cases where an employer may be retiring and wants to divest ownership in his or her particular business; it would be the sort of thing employees might want to gain control over or ensure that the business continue so they don't lose their jobs. That's certainly one aspect of this legislation that isn't seen maybe as clearly as it could be.

Wouldn't you agree that the Canadian economy is changing dramatically and has changed dramatically in the past few years, and our society is changing, our economic climate certainly is changing? It's my opinion at least that worker investment, worker involvement, the relationship between business and labour, has to improve. I think an opportunity like this for employees to invest directly in their jobs is positive. I can't see where one could suggest that's wrong or not a good thing. I think opportunities for people to invest in the province, that is, the tax incentives for them to invest, are positive ones. It means the government invests proportionately less than what the actual investors do with regard to tax incentives. I'm looking for an opinion or maybe a view on what you think the future holds for relationships between workers and employers and the relationship this bill will have on that.

1100

Mr Schenk: I'll try to answer you briefly. Yes, I agree the economy is restructuring and I agree it's beneficial for employees to participate in this economy more and more and to participate in the workforce. I'm certainly in favour of anything that moves us in that direction.

You gave the example of someone retiring from his business and an employee being able to buy it out. I agree with you that should happen and that can happen under the employee ownership labour-sponsored venture capital. It's the other aspect of the fund I have a problem with because it limits you to minority status in the funds. It gives you absolutely no say in how this place is going to run. What you're really doing is using workers' hard-earned money to put into these businesses which are probably non-union, anti-union and may or may not be producing a valuable product or service to the community. If you socially target it, I think it would make some sense. I think that could be done under this bill. It would take some substantial amendments, but I think it could be done.

The Chair: I have to move on to Mr Sterling.

Mr Norman W. Sterling (Carleton): I'm interested in your brief because you're so much in line with the Ontario Federation of Independent Business, which usually is not an ally on other issues.

Mr Schenk: I don't know that we are on this one.

Mr Sterling: It sounds pretty similar, or maybe to the unsophisticated like myself it sounds similar.

Mr Schenk: It is now favouring social housing and those kinds of things?

Mr Jim Wiseman (Durham West): No, not even close.

Mr Sterling: I'm not aware that that's included in this bill; I think perhaps you divert off.

In the first part of the bill that you look at, under section 5 of the bill there's an obligation to present this to a "government committee" to approve the investment. What is your feeling in terms of the obligation of the government back to the workers who put their money in if this endeavour fails? Is there any obligation at all in your view?

Mr Schenk: What is the obligation of the government if the investment fails?

Mr Sterling: Yes. The government is basically saying this is a good investment. Do you believe the government has any obligation back to the workers?

Mr Schenk: This was for the labour-sponsored investment funds section?

Mr Sterling: Yes. The employee group has to make its presentation and there's some certification that takes place.

Mrs Elinor Caplan (Orlino): Mr Chairman, on a supplementary: I believe there's actually a requirement for order-in-council approval before—I see a head nodding. So it's much more than just an application. As I understand it, you must have order-in-council cabinet approval before the investment can be made.

Mr Sterling: What would your feeling be, representing the workers in this area, if the investment failed, if these people lost their life savings as a result of putting their money up?

Mr Schenk: I guess what I did here was try to focus on our alternative to that whole section. It is a different kind of fund than the government set up, so I didn't go through and look at all the pros and cons of those kinds of issues, to tell you the truth. I looked at the essence of what the labour-sponsored investment fund corporation was going to do and thought that this is not in line with what we in the trade union movement have debated and developed policy on, so what I've tried to do is just counterpose a labour-managed social investment fund to that whole section of the bill.

Mr Sterling: We're dealing with this first section. I'm dealing with the first section, the worker buyout, which you have said you are in support of.

Mr Schenk: Okay. I thought you were dealing with the second section.

Mr Sterling: No, I'm dealing with the first one. Part of that is that there's a government committee which reviews the investment, ostensibly for the employees. Then there's an order in council, as my colleague has pointed out, which says in effect, "This is okay." Then we go out and we entice the workers to invest in this by giving them 20% off their first $3,500 invested and 30% off the next up to $15,000, as you've pointed out in your brief.

I think that if I were a worker and the government had approved this investment and I had put not only $15,000 but $150,000 into this business, which I am entitled to over a 10-year period, and it failed, somebody might be looking at the government and saying, "You guys approved this and I've lost my house." Would you not be taking that position, representing labour?

Mr Schenk: I would say that if you're going to take over a business like Algoma Steel, which is a concrete example, there is a tremendous risk involved. There's no doubt about it. That's the danger I see in this. While it's a viable option for people under certain circumstances, there are not many times when workers have an opportunity to buy a company when it's doing well. It's usually when it's not doing well.

Mr Sterling: Yes. I agree.

Mr Schenk: There are reasons why Dofasco didn't want Algoma. So there's a risk involved and I think employees have to be aware of that. There's a real chance that you can be successful and there's a chance that you won't be. That is a problem.

Mr Sterling: You're not answering me, then, are you?

Mr Schenk: You're saying that the government is supposed to guarantee—

Mr Sterling: No, I'm just saying that if you were representing these workers, would you be looking to compensation for your workers who had lost their investment? I've got to tell you, if I were a union leader I would be looking to the government to bail my workers out, especially when it has approved this investment.

The Chair: Mr Kwinter's got a quick supplementary there.

Mr Kwinter: I just want to ask a question and follow up Mr Sterling's question. When I was the Minister of Financial Institutions we had pickets outside our doors every day on the Astra/Re-Mor Trust issue. The point of the investors was that this was a licensed trust company of the province, and as a result of its losing money, the government of Ontario was responsible because it licensed it. They went to court. They went to the Ombudsman. It dragged on for years and years and it was finally resolved with no resolution as far as the investors were concerned.

This is exactly the point Mr Sterling was making: If an investment into one of these funds goes to the cabinet and gets the approval, I can tell you, whether it's intended or not, the workers who invest will have the impression that this is sanctioned by the government of Ontario, it has been approved by the cabinet, and if there's a problem they will look to the government for redress, because, "Why did you approve this thing if it wasn't going to succeed?" I think, and my colleague has suggested, that somewhere along the line maybe we should bring in an amendment to clearly specify that there is no obligation on the part of the government and there is no redress or recourse to the government of Ontario so that is perfectly clear to the investors.

Mr Wiseman: You know that's impossible. I can't just sit here and let you get away with this. If a company town like Kapuskasing or Algoma is going to lose the main industry in that town, the province of Ontario is going to be called into it. The government of the day—it doesn't matter who it is—is going to be called in and they're going to say, "Why don't you save this?" As opposition members, you've been doing this on a continuous basis for the last 18 months.

Mr Kwinter: You misunderstand—

Mr Wiseman: No, I'm not misunderstanding, because what we heard earlier was that this fund was part of a vehicle to help save it.

Mr Kwinter: That's a different issue.

The Chair: I'm sorry, but the time has expired. I thought it was a short supplementary you had, a short question.

I'd like to thank you for appearing before this committee. I guess your address is on the pamphlet here so any one of the opposition or government members can address their concerns to your group. Thank you for appearing here.

Mr Schenk: Thank you very much.

1110

ESOP (EMPLOYEE SHARE OWNERSHIP PLAN) ASSOCIATION

The Chair: The next group to come forward is the ESOP Association. I'd like to welcome you to the standing committee on finance and economic affairs. You have one half-hour for your presentation. Can you leave some time at the end for questions and answers? If you will identify yourselves for the purposes of Hansard, you may begin.

Mr Perry Phillips: On behalf of the ESOP Association I would like to thank you for inviting us to give a brief on Bill 150. My name is Perry Phillips. I'm president of the ESOP Association.

Mrs Caplan: No relation.

Mr P. Phillips: No, as far as I know. To my side is Dave Clark, who is a director of our association.

Our association believes this bill will be one of the most significant pieces of legislation brought out in this decade. It will have a profound effect on all workers, their families and their standard of living. Documented research in the United States has shown that both in Canada and the United States allowing employees to participate in the ownership of their companies increases productivity, one study shows, as much as 8% to 11% per annum, increases competitiveness, increases innovation and tends to anchor capital in Ontario, which is where we would want to keep it.

To achieve these results the legislation must be sensitive to the needs of the marketplace, both for the workers and for the owners of businesses. In the US over 22 pieces of legislation have been passed over 14 years dealing strictly with ESOPs. In the United Kingdom three legislative acts have been passed in the last four years, again dealing just with ESOPs.

If we look at the US, close to 10,000 companies have employed ESOPs, of which 90% are closely held companies or small to medium-sized, not public companies. In the UK over 100 companies have employed ESOPs. The relationship there is completely reversed. Over 95% of the companies in the UK are public, not private, companies. We feel that the difference lies in the type of legislation that exists in the different countries.

We believe this act is an excellent starting point and applaud the hard work that went into this act from the various ministries in putting together what is a very difficult piece of legislation. Our brief today highlights eight areas where our association believes the needs of the workers and the businesses can be improved on over time. Our comments and recommendations relate only to the ESOP portions of Bill 150.

I'd like Mr Clark to start off on our brief.

Mr David Clark: I guess our first point is that we believe the legislation is really directed at big company bailout situations like Spruce Falls and Algoma. Based on the US experience, we think that probably represents less than 10% of the potential ESOP market. Our concern is that the legislative requirements set out in the bill, while they may be appropriate for large companies like Algoma and Spruce Falls, will be too onerous for small and medium-sized companies. We think it will be an expensive process that a small company or medium-sized company will simply not be able to afford. As a result, they simply won't engage in the process.

Our recommendation in this regard is that there be a threshold established and "small business" defined and that if a company is a small business as defined by the act, the legislative requirements be less onerous and less costly. We think if that happens there will be a substantial number of small and medium-sized businesses that will participate in labour-sponsored venture capital companies.

There's legislative precedent, of course, for having thresholds. For example, in the Ontario Small Business Development Corporations Act there's a definition of small business. We suggest that a definition similar to that be adopted so that small and medium-sized businesses can participate. We're concerned that because of the legislative requirements they simply won't.

Our suggestion for a small business is that, first of all, it not be a public company or an offering company and that it have less than $5 million in assets, $10 million in annual revenues and fewer than 200 employees. If a company falls below those thresholds, then it can in effect file a short-form application or a short-form business plan and not be put to the type of expense it would otherwise be put to, based on the bill as it now stands.

The second thing I'd like to talk about is control. It is a requirement of the bill that the labour-sponsored venture capital corporation acquire control or together with an outside party acquire control. Again, we think that may be appropriate for the large company bailout situations like Spruce Falls and Algoma, but we think it will discourage small and medium-sized businesses from becoming involved.

Owner-operators who have built up their companies over 25 years may have a number of reasons for wanting to get employee ownership in their companies: They may be a healthy company; they may want some additional financing to do some expansion; they may want to provide additional benefits to their employees; they may want to establish a succession plan—and we think this is very important.

A lot of owner-operators who may control a company through their family are getting on in years and want to retire. Their family's not interested and they would like to eventually turn control over to their employees. If they're required to turn control over immediately and not over an extended period of time, we think it's going to discourage them from becoming involved.

We think the control provision will be detrimental. Our suggestion is that the control be reduced to 35%, which would give any employee group a large say in the company and encourage owner-operators to get employee ownership in their company.

Those are the two things I wanted to talk about and I'd like Mr Phillips to carry on.

Mr P. Phillips: One of the issues we think is important is having a supply of companies to be purchased by the employees or by the workers. For example, if you take your kid to a toy store and everything's off 90% but there's nothing on the shelves, what's the point of it?

We believe you have to supply some kind of incentive to the owners to sell their companies. As the act reads now, under subclauses 10(1)(c)(i) and 10(1)(f)(iv), the employee-owned shareholder group will buy the company and receive treasury stock. In return the owner, by giving up treasury stock, is basically selling the company and receiving no consideration. The funds go into the equity of the operating company and he does not see any benefit for trading that company which he has built up.

We think this is a serious situation. In reading Hansard we found that Mr Evans, the executive director of revenue services, stated that ESOP may invest in newly issued or existing shares of a corporation. This is not spelled out in the legislation; we think it should be. Our recommendation is that when an employee group buys a company, whatever the situation is, it should either be allowed to issue treasury stock or buy existing shares of the corporation.

Finally, we questioned what would happen down the road if an employee group bought the company, and new employees who were hired or came into the firm wanted to buy into the same corporation. We feel the act has not addressed this issue. We would recommend the bill be amended to provide a mechanism for additional employees to become shareholders after the original subscription.

That basically is our position paper. We're open to any questions you may have.

1120

The Chair: Fine. On the government side, Mr Wiseman.

Mr Wiseman: I don't have any questions.

The Chair: I saw your hand up from last time. I thought maybe you still had a question. Okay, Mr Sterling.

Mr Sterling: I agree with your concern over the complexity of getting into employee-ownership labour. It really is very difficult. When we were briefed by Ministry of Revenue officials at the first, I started to realize the hoops you have to go through. It really is a bill designed, in my view, for a very large employee buyout. I would like to see something in there. The problem is always that when you're dealing with a government guarantee thing—and you may have heard my question to the OFL representative before—it's always difficult for the government to lessen the qualifications it's going to be asked to come up with if the thing goes sour later. Notwithstanding that, I agree there has to be some limit.

The one part I have difficulty with in your representation, however, is the majority requirement. Would your suggestion of going down to 35% of the voting stock or the common shares, or whatever way you want to put it, not lead to the possibility of really fiddling with the whole plan in terms of owners jacking up the price of their stock by utilizing the grant in terms of what could happen overall? I mean, if I were an employer and if I were trying to be devious with your suggestion, I might say to my employees: "Look, we're going to get involved in this thing. You're going to get so much back out of this. The present stock is going to increase in value because the price of the stock will be inflated by the government largess, if you want to call it that, under this circumstance. Therefore, we'll be able to modernize our plant, make more money etc and you're going to get paid higher wages."

Isn't there a problem in that when you allow—I can see the reasoning behind the government's requirement that it needs to control 50% plus one share. I mean, if you say 35% you could say 20%; you could say any amount.

Mr Clark: I think there's no end of possibilities, and if somebody wants to be devious he can be devious. I think what the US experience shows is that a great many of the ESOPs in the US have far less control, and they're successful, they lead to more productivity.

I'm a lawyer. I act for small and medium-sized companies and I think private owner-operators are not going to want to get involved in this program if they have to turn over control right from the start. I think they would be quite happy to turn over control over a period of time if, for example, it was a succession plan. I think they should provide that sort of succession plan as part of their submission before the thing can be approved. But if somebody has built up his company over a long period of time and the only way he can participate in this thing is to turn over control and really not get any money for it, I just don't think it's going to happen. In a large company example like Spruce Falls or Algoma, it's probably right that there should be control. But I'm talking about the smaller companies.

Mr Sterling: A quick question. In the American ESOPs that you are aware of, is the bait as attractive as it is in this legislation?

Mr P. Phillips: American ESOPs give something to everybody, as you'll see in our brief. Basically the employees get a benefit. In the US the employees actually do not put up any net worth to buy the company. The company is bought out by the future cash flows of the corporation. This is different from the approach we've taken in Ontario and across Canada. Basically the approach here is that the employee will put up some money and get the tax credit for that. In the States they also tend to give benefit to the lender so the acquisition can be made at a lower lending rate. They also give a benefit to the corporation, as well as the owner. Everybody wins in this scenario.

For example, in the UK one of the reasons they have not been successful in attracting privately held companies is because of the restrictions put on the owners in terms of telling them: "Look, you have to sell X%. You have to sell control." There're just too many variables out there. The owner may be 55 or 60, thinking of retiring in five years. If he could sell 35%, for example, he would get the benefits of employee participation at this point in time. If there was an option to buy the remainder, they could be put in place.

In terms of value and protecting the employees, the employee group, I would assume, would have to go out and get an independent valuation. A valuation of a closely held company for a minority would be at a discount from the value they would pay for 50%. So if the company were worth $1 million and they paid 50%, they'd pay $500,000. If they were only buying 35% and let's say they had a good shareholders' agreement that had an option and created some liquidity for them, that 35% might be worth $250,000. So you're equating the risk of what the employee group is doing with the acquisition. That's where your protection comes in.

The Chair: We have some clarification from the minister's office.

Mr Evans: In relation to your observations around employee ownership, I want you to understand that the point you were making was a point that relates to subclause 10(1)(c)(i) in the bill. That talks to the acquisition of shares issued by a corporation. In the case of employee ownership, they could be shares that have been issued to a shareholder. The treasury shares are not a limit on the employee-ownership side. They can be shares acquired from an existing owner. Is that in any way at variance with what you've described?

Mr P. Phillips: When we read that, coupled with subclause 10(1)(f)(iv), where you cannot buy shares from an existing shareholder, we were concerned that the act was not clear. But if that is the intent—

Mr Evans: The intention in subclause 10(1)(c)(i) is to allow for the acquisition of shares from an existing shareholder.

Mr P. Phillips: That's fine.

Mr Evans: Further to that, under the regulating powers under section 37 of the act, it is my understanding the government is going to introduce amendments concerning the investor protection regime. I believe under those regulations, under the amended powers, there will be the ability to tailor the nature of the regime to ensure it is appropriate to the size and nature of the business being addressed. So in relation to the elements of your presentation that talk to the nature of the hurdles that would have to be overcome in investing in a small business, I believe it's the government's intention that the investor protection regime should be appropriate to the size and nature of the business, so there will be some attempt there to be flexible.

Mr Wiseman: I'd like to turn to a presentation we had a little earlier on in this process. I can't remember their exact titles, but they were from mutual fund investment groups. They've gone out and put this into the marketplace and have received people investing back into this fund, I think to the tune of almost $29 million. They told us that at the beginning of that process they went into the money markets and said: "This is a very risky venture. This is risk capital and you should be aware of the risk nature of this capital."

Stemming from some of the questions earlier, given that they're told up front that you have a choice of putting money into this or not—it's like buying into other mutual funds or buying into the stock market; there are no guarantees there—do you think it's reasonable or even fair that there should be something written into the legislation saying either that these investors aren't going to be protected or that they should be protected by the government in the future?

1130

Mr P. Phillips: It's hard to protect someone from a bad investment. As far as the mutual funds go, they buy a portfolio of stock and therefore hopefully they're spreading the risk based on the portfolio of assets they've purchased, so you're not putting all your eggs in one basket. If I understand the question, you're asking, should the government protect those investors?

Mr Wiseman: Yes, give guarantees to protect those investors or write into the legislation that there are no guarantees. Is it necessary? Maybe I'm sitting on the wrong side, but I always thought about caveat emptor, buyer beware. What we heard earlier was just exactly that: "Don't enter into this if you're 62 years old, you've got three years to your retirement and you want to take your money out. This may not be the kind of investment you want to make. But if you're 30, you have a fairly healthy income and it's only 1% or 2% of your gross, you want to play with it and see what you can get out of it"—and judging from the numbers you've given us, it's possible that somebody could do really well with a managed portfolio—"then maybe that's the kind of venture you want to get into. But remember that this is called 'risk venture.'"

Mr Clark: I don't think the government should be guaranteeing anything. I think the government should be reviewing the thing to see whether the proposal makes sense and has the proper assumptions and so on and perhaps even has some long-term prospects for being successful.

But things can happen that nobody can predict, and that's the risk, so I don't think there should be any guarantees.

Mr Wiseman: Do you think the way this legislation is written in terms of the instructions that are being given—they're similar to the Ontario Securities Commission's requirements but they're slightly different, because they need to be for this kind of investment. In your opinion, are they adequate? Are they the kind of instructions that should be given in terms of making sure that investors know what they're buying when they buy?

Mr Clark: Frankly, I haven't focused too much on that part of the legislation. One of the things we discuss in our brief is that there seem to be a lot of subjective criteria that the minister or the advisory board is supposed to bring to bear, and we think that presents risks. We think there should be more objective criteria, more like the Ontario Securities Commission has. It's a little more predictable for people who want to engage in the process. It seems to deal with whether you've complied with the spirit and intent of the legislation, and we think that's just a little too broad and a little too subjective. There should be more objective criteria involved in the thing.

Mr Phillips: I really appreciate the presentation. The presentation we've heard today really got at the heart of some of the problems of the legislation.

The OFL, as you've heard—I think you were sitting here—said it's not going to participate in the big part of the venture capital one. You're on the other side on the worker ownership and I think you pointed out that if the objective of the bill is as stated, that is, to encourage employees to participate in their workplace, if the objective is to encourage employees in successful operations to participate we should listen carefully to some of your recommendations, because if the bill requires impossible hurdles for employees to get over, then we're going to be counterproductive.

I have nothing other than saying that I appreciate your comments. I think you've given us a lot to think about.

Mr Kwinter: Can I just get a clarification or maybe an expansion on one of the fable-and-fact points you made? I think everybody agrees, as my colleague has just said, that the purpose of this thing is to keep companies going, keep them viable and be a benefit to the employees who are participating.

In your first fable and fact on page 2, you say, "Research shows that real gains are made only when employee owners have a chance to share the information and ideas they have on how they can do their jobs better." Later on you say, "Participation programs alone have little impact on corporate performance." My point is that you can be a non-owner and share, so that you can improve companies like Magna where they have input, lots of other companies where the employees have incentive programs to make suggestions, and you can have employee ownership where that doesn't happen. Could you just expand on that particular part of it?

Mr P. Phillips: I think your analysis is correct. The research has shown that where you combine the two, where you have the ability to basically control your workplace but then also see a direct result of that benefit, other than in a short-run, let's say profit/bonus, situation, that's when productivity improvements of 8% to 11% start to show up. In other words, the employee not only has the motivation to do better, he has the ability to control his own work space and therefore what benefits he does accrue to the company he will see in future.

Part of the participation, of course, is training the employees to understand this and to understand how to read a balance sheet and to understand if that they can cut their work from eight hours to seven hours or six hours and get the same amount of work out, then the bottom line improves and they will in fact reap the rewards. That's where the participation comes in.

The Chair: I'd like to thank you for appearing before this committee.

This committee will adjourn until 3:30 sharp this afternoon, when we have six other presenters. We'll start right at 3:30 so we can finish at 6 o'clock tonight.

The committee recessed at 1137.

AFTERNOON SITTING

The committee resumed at 1534.

The Chair: I'd like to welcome you to the standing committee on finance and economic affairs. This afternoon we're going to have presenters on Bill 150, An Act to provide for the Creation and Registration of Labour Sponsored Venture Capital Corporations to Invest in Eligible Ontario Businesses and to make certain other amendments.

ONTARIO SECURITIES COMMISSION

The Chair: I'd like to welcome to the committee this afternoon the Ontario Securities Commission. I believe we have Mr Robert Wright, Mr Joe Oliver. Welcome. I believe we have another—

Mr Robert J. Wright: That's Catherine Wade.

The Chair: Miss Catherine Wade.

We have one half-hour, and if you can wind up leaving some time at the end for questions from the three parties, you may begin.

Mr Wright: I appreciate the opportunity of speaking to the committee with respect to a matter which is of considerable importance to the Ontario commission and the role it plays in the regulation of the capital markets in the province.

We've been engaged for some time in a discussion with officials of several government ministries with respect to the concept and drafting of the legislation and regulations relating to the Ontario investor and worker ownership program. Our goal has been to see that neither the commission itself nor the staff are placed in a position of either prejudicing our ongoing ability to regulate the capital markets of the province or alternatively that we deal with the initiatives of this proposed legislation in a way which will defeat its policy objectives.

The concepts in the bill and its amendments are a bit foreign to securities regulators. The intent of the bill, as I understand it, is twofold: to provide small- to medium-sized Ontario businesses with access to new sources of equity capital and to provide workers with the opportunity to have input into the ongoing ownership, management and direction of their employer. Obviously this initiative raises questions, particularly ones relating to investor protection, which you will want to ensure are answered.

Until now the existing framework in Ontario for investor protection in the capital markets is that set out in the Ontario Securities Act. While that act provides the commission with broad discretion, this discretion is to be exercised in a public interest context. The courts and the commission have from time to time had occasion to determine the scope of the public interest mandate and have consistently related and limited that concept to investor protection and the regulation of the market. The Securities Act and its regulations provide a strong investor protection requirement and mandate for our work.

Without the proposed amendments, Bill 150 would require full compliance with the Ontario Securities Act for both parts of the program. It is my view that such a requirement would almost certainly result in limited use of the incentives provided for under the bill. Most of those who wish to avail themselves of them would either not be able to meet the requirements of the Securities Act or would find these requirements so costly as to prejudice the program. This comment is applicable to both investment vehicles.

From the beginning it has been apparent to us that unless the legislation and regulations were carefully drafted there would be a serious risk for either the commission or the program or both. The risk for the commission is that by granting exemptions under a new and expanded public interest concept, our ability to regulate the capital markets in the province will be jeopardized. On the other hand, not to do so would mean that the commission was by its processes effectively undermining an important government policy.

This problem became very evident in the Spruce Falls application. The decision of the commission in that case signalled our view of the need to draft the regime in a manner which will accomplish the policy objectives of the government while at the same time not affecting adversely the ability of the commission to perform its mandate.

In my view, the broad public policy considerations which are inherent in the objectives of Bill 150 are just not the same as the more narrow focus of the Securities Act. The mandate of the commission is, as I read the Securities Act and the decisions of the courts and the commission, the protection of the public and the regulation of the securities market to ensure a fair and efficient capital market in which the general public will have confidence. This confidence is critical to the capital markets and therefore to the economy of this province. It is for this reason we have made it clear that if the role of the Ontario Securities Commission is to change, it must be changed by legislation.

For a number of reasons, it is my view that the appropriate regulatory model for investor protection for the investment vehicles provided for in Bill 150 is something other than that provided in the Securities Act and regulations. It will not surprise you when I express the view that the investor protection features of the Securities Act should not be abandoned without careful thought. They have served investors and those seeking capital very well over the past 50 years and in my view there must be good reason to abandon the framework, either entirely or for a limited purpose.

1540

Having said this, I do not believe the current regulatory regime can accommodate the spirit and intent of Bill 150. To accommodate the policy objectives of Bill 150, a choice must therefore be made to revise the Securities Act, which is a law of general application, or to develop a separate regime under the bill itself. Our choice, in order to make the intention of the government clear and to clearly limit the extent of the change, is the latter.

This is not the first time the government has been faced with this difficult decision. The cooperatives situation is one such example. Investors who invest in cooperatives are provided with an alternative, and I might say, less stringent model of investor protection than that existing under the Securities Act.

The bill creates two new investment vehicles. One is the employee ownership vehicle, such as that used in the Spruce Falls and Algoma situations. The second is a mutual fund with features somewhat different from the mutual funds with which we are familiar.

I have reviewed Bill 150 and the amendments with the staff. I accept that they set out a clear role for the Ontario Securities Commission which should not prejudice our general mandate.

I'd like to discuss for a moment the employee ownership vehicle. As I have mentioned, the OSC has had the task of dealing with one of these under the Securities Act prior to implementation of the bill. The Spruce Falls acquisition matter was difficult for both the staff and the commission. The level of protection both expected and requested by those involved in that transaction was different from and less than the level contemplated by the Securities Act. Of particular concern to the promoters of the transaction and the dealers involved was the regulatory requirement that there be a full-blown prospectus and that dealers should meet their statutory duties to "know your client" and to advise clients based on the suitability of the investment in question. These are considered key elements of investor protection for those buying securities. It was their view that these investor protection measures should not be imposed.

Staff of the commission did not agree with this view and the issue was taken to the commission. After a public hearing, the commission granted an exemption from certain of the investment protection provisions of the Securities Act, while making it very clear that future applicants should not expect similar treatment.

The mindset of the investor in these situations is not in my view the mindset of a person looking to whether this particular investment fits his or her portfolio. Rather, the investors are weighing such things as whether they'll have a job in the near future, whether their children will have the opportunity to grow up in the community, whether their major investment to date, their home and their mortgage, will have value and whether they will be forced to relocate. These are not issues which registrants under the Securities Act have been trained to consider when providing investment advice. They are individual life decisions.

The regulatory framework of prospectus disclosure and advice by trained investment counsellors does not in my view, when balanced again cost, create a benefit of equal value. Perhaps more important, it would not provide an adequate level of investor protection. Reliance on the normal securities regulatory regime would not provide an adequate basis for decision-making. This in my opinion is true of employee investment vehicles which are not in financial difficulties as well as those which are.

As most of you are aware, the Ministry of Financial Institutions, its counsel, Stikeman Elliott, and other ministries have worked very hard to determine the appropriate level of investor protection. We have participated in this process to ensure that the regulatory regime necessary to achieve this level is in place.

As the person ultimately responsible for securities regulation in this province, I believe very strongly that all investors in the capital markets should be afforded the appropriate level of investor protection. In my view, there are investor protection features now provided for in the bill and its amendments. These include requirements that there be a business plan, the consideration by an advisory board of the commercial viability of the project, the requirements of a supervised vote of the employee investors and the control in a trust account of employee funds. These requirements provide a measure of protection for these investors. Given the desire of the government to encourage this vehicle, they are in my opinion more effective than those presently provided in the Securities Act.

I'd now like to turn to the second investment vehicle created under Bill 150. The funds proposed fall squarely within the definition of "mutual fund" in the Securities Act. We've had the opportunity to deal with one of these fund vehicles prior to implementation of Bill 150. Working Ventures, from which I understand you have already heard, was the first labour-sponsored venture capital corporation in Ontario. To date, its funds have been invested in fully liquid and fully secure investments as a result of a condition imposed by the commission pending completion of this legislative process. The investments in which Working Ventures must invest within the next two years in order to maintain registration under Bill 150 are, however, not nearly as liquid and may be speculative in nature.

The Ontario Securities Commission, together with the other Canadian securities administrators, has implemented a policy on a national basis which sets out guidelines as to investment criteria and other investor protection-based criteria to which mutual funds must adhere in order to distribute their funds in the province. These criteria have been considered by this and other commissions to be necessary to meet the public interest mandate of the legislation we administer.

There are two basic principles inherent in the investment criteria under this policy: diversification and liquidity. As you are probably aware, mutual funds do not trade; rather they are bought and then redeemed. In order to fund investors' requests for redemption on a timely basis, a mutual fund must have access to cash which is ensured by the liquidity of the underlying investments of the fund itself. Diversification of portfolio attempts to provide a reasonable safeguard against the possibility of sustaining losses materially affecting liquidity if any particular segment of the economy fails.

The funds created under Bill 150 will not have the same levels of liquidity and diversification as are required of other mutual funds sold in this province. Liquidity and diversification are investor protection features, and this should be recognized. This issue is unavoidable in a vehicle which promotes investment in small to medium-sized businesses which otherwise have limited access to the capital markets. It is also inherent in the provisions of the bill which allow for significant investment in a particular enterprise. The design feature of tax credit recapture if a redemption occurs within five years from the date of purchase may also create a monetary constraint to the ability of investors to access the redemption features inherent in a mutual fund.

In making these observations, I do not want to be taken as saying these investments are not meritorious. In my view, however, it is important that these issues be considered and balanced with the policy objectives underlying the creation of these new investment vehicles.

To encourage participation in the equity market for investors who might not otherwise invest in the market or who might not otherwise invest in small to medium business, the government is proposing what is in effect a revenue bill which provides tax credits to such investors. The tax credit not only provides an incentive to invest; it can be seen as reducing the real cost to the investors. In addition, the amendments include a reduced recapture of tax credits where the investment has lost value between the time of acquisition and the time of resale or redemption if such event occurs within the period for which recapture is applicable. These are features which may make the investment attractive and may balance other features of the funds.

Unlike the employee ownership initiative, it is presently contemplated that the provisions exempting these funds from the liquidity and diversification requirements imposed upon other mutual funds offered in the province will be implemented by way of regulation to the Securities Act. While it would be my preference that such regulation be dealt with by way of amendment to Bill 150 or pursuant to regulation under that statute, thereby making it very clear that these are somewhat unusual investments and are being authorized for policy reasons outside the Securities Act, it is not critical to the commission that this be done, as it is in our view with respect to the employee ownership vehicles.

Our degree of comfort with these proposals is subject to the resolution of certain issues which I understand remain outstanding. In particular, Bill 150 requires valuations to be undertaken in respect of both vehicles. The valuations are important for the program. In particular, the pricing of the shares will be based on the valuations, as will the redemption price.

As I understand it, it has not been determined who should have the responsibility for regulating to the extent deemed necessary the preparation of the valuations and the independence of the valuer. We have made it clear that in our view this should not be left to the OSC. The OSC does not currently review or assess valuations for the purposes of investor protection. While under some OSC policies guidelines have been provided for preparing valuations and determining the independence of valuers, we have left ultimate responsibility in these matters to the entity which retains the adviser.

1550

This is consistent with the whole concept of securities regulation. We are not equipped and do not have the expertise to ensure the validity of the valuation or the valuation procedure. Our role is to ensure disclosure by issuers to all investors who are being asked to make a decision in relation to their investment. It is not and has not been a role which in any way assesses or passes on merit. Any significant involvement of the OSC in the consideration of valuations would involve a new responsibility for us and would require legislative instruction on the nature of the mandate and how it is to be carried out.

The Ontario Securities Commission will continue to fulfil its mandate under the Securities Act to the best of its abilities. It also will fulfil whatever mandate is given to it under Bill 150 to the best of its abilities. As presently contemplated, this initiative does not adversely affect our ability to carry out our responsibilities nor will the discharge of our responsibilities be likely to jeopardize the policy initiative which Bill 150 reflects. We trust that, as the program is finalized, this will continue to be the case. Thank you.

Mr Sterling: Thank you very much for your brief. I assume, therefore, the bottom line is that the OSC doesn't really want to be involved with these two investment vehicles.

Mr Wright: I don't think it's quite right to say we don't want to be involved with it. We're quite prepared to do what we're asked to do, but we think it's appropriate that we might have a role where we determine that, for instance, a summary of a valuation or of a business plan is a reasonable representation of the plan. Where we do not think we should be involved is in any way assessing whether the business plan itself makes sense. We don't have the capacity to do that.

Mr Sterling: This morning we had some other people—I know at least one of your people was here—and the question I asked was that it seems, under Bill 150 and particularly the first plan, the employee ownership plan, the government is requiring or almost sanctioning the investment in terms of its viability, etc. They're asking for significant plans with regard to what's going to happen, etc. Would the concern you have, in terms of taking on that role, be the upshot of a failure? In other words, what would happen as a result of the failure and the investor coming back to the OSC saying: "You sanctioned this investment. What went wrong?"

Mr Wright: No, I don't think that would be our concern. Frankly, we approve prospectuses, and occasionally companies who have filed prospectuses with us either go under or the stock price goes down. That's something we live with.

What we're concerned with is that in any way we would be involved in a process which suggests we think that—for instance, supposing there's an advisory board that says this investment is commercially viable. It may be possible for an advisory board to say that. It is not possible for us to say it. We don't have the people who can make that kind of assessment and it's not the kind of thing we do. The same is true for a valuation. We have said in certain of our policies that companies, when they're doing things, have to provide a valuation. We've given them some indication of who can do the valuation but we don't pass on whether the valuation is good, bad or indifferent. That's up to the shareholders, if something goes wrong.

Mr Sterling: In your scenario, or in your normal function under the Ontario Securities Commission, if the investor interprets the information in such a way and invests but loses, then he loses and that's the end of the matter in terms of his investment, as long as the prospectus—

Mr Wright: Could I just interrupt you here? That's not quite right. It's right the way you've said it, but I'm not sure it's the question you're asking. If an investor loses because the information is wrong, the investor has rights but not against the commission. The investor has rights against the issuer. If you exempt employee ownership vehicles from the Securities Act, unless there's something else in the bill or in the arrangements, there may be no such recourse for the investor. I'm saying that with reasonable—

Ms Catherine Wade: There will be civil liability, but it's individual.

Mr Wright: Yes, there is civil liability, but it's a new issuer.

Mr Sterling: If I'm reading your brief correctly, you're saying that there's a higher degree of investor protection needed for employee ownership.

Mr Wright: I hope the brief doesn't say that, Mr Sterling, and if it does, I think it would be expressing a view which is not ours to express. What I've tried to say—and not everybody at the commission agrees with me about this, but I feel fairly comfortable about saying it notwithstanding—is that the kind of investor protection provided under the Securities Act will not, in my opinion, give very good value or very much comfort to an investor buying under the employee ownership particularly and specially in a case where it's an investment in a troubled company, to save a company.

I have made it very clear to anybody who's asked and to some who didn't ask that, in my view, you can't ask the commission to deal with those vehicles under the act. We said that in effect in the Spruce Falls decision. There has to be some other arrangement to provide whatever the government determines is an adequate and appropriate level of investor protection, but it's not up to us as a commission to say what that level is.

The Chair: Okay. We'll have to go on to Mr Kwinter. Four minutes.

Mr Kwinter: I want to follow that same route because we discussed that this morning. One of my concerns is that if an investor purchases a stock on the Toronto Stock Exchange or any of the other exchanges governed by the Ontario Securities Commission, that investor has a certain confidence that this stock has met the requirements of the filing: There's a prospectus, certain standards have been met. As you say, you certainly don't warrant or guarantee that these companies are going to succeed, but you do warrant and guarantee that, in all cases unless there's fraud, the prospectus truly states the state of the investment.

My concern is this: Under this act, every vehicle covered by Bill 150, as it goes to the advisory committee and everything else, ultimately gets to the cabinet and the cabinet makes the decision that, "Yes, we have seen all the representations and we are satisfied this is a vehicle that qualifies under our program, or we're going to approve it." Then that begs the question: You said the securities commission is not there to provide redress, but something else has to be there.

Given the fact that this gets the seal of approval of the Ontario cabinet, if the company does go down, my concern is that those investors will be looking to the Ontario government for protection on the assumption that, "You approved this thing, this is your proposal, it's not through the securities commission, you have given it your approval and we would like you to compensate us for it."

How do you get around that? I know it's a problem, but I can tell you that, as Minister of Financial Institutions, I've lived through it with the Astra/Re-Mor situation. I've seen what happened in Alberta when the Canada Deposit Insurance Corp went to $60,000: The government topped it up another billion because it felt it had no choice politically. How do you deal with that?

1600

Mr Wright: I think the only possible way you could deal with it is to make very clear whether or not there is a back-stop like that. If you don't make it clear, then I would think there would be a risk such as you are talking about. There are features of the bill, as I read it, including particularly what's before the advisory board, which could lead to that, and, of course, as you say, cabinet approval.

I think it would be only fair, in some kind of disclosure document or whatever, to make it very clear either that there is a back-stop, if I can use that word, or that there isn't. One of the features of what we try to do at the commission is to say there has to be full, plain disclosure. I would think that should be a feature of this aspect as well.

The Chair: Mr Phillips, you have one minute.

Mr Phillips: This is a whole very important issue, and I think you've quite correctly identified that these are unique situations where people's lives are really at stake. This isn't an investment; this is their future.

The proposal here essentially says to a group of employees, "Get your plan together and then send it off to an independent board." It would do the advising. I share the concerns of my colleagues here: I think that once the stamp of agreement is on, five, six or seven years later people will have an expectation that it has been looked at by an advisory board. Is there a better vehicle? Is there another way of doing it, for example, saying, "Here are the criteria that must be satisfied and you, the employees, have to have done all of these things using whatever outside counsel you want to use and have satisfied yourselves on that," as opposed to this one, which is essentially to prepare it all, send it to the government and it will approve it? Have you examined a better alternative?

Mr Wright: I'm not sure that it's really up to us to examine the alternatives, and frankly, no, we haven't. We have been concerned about whether or not there is recourse in the event that something untoward happens. I think the best I can do is repeat again that I personally think that, either in the legislation or wherever, it should be clear whether or not there is disclosure, whether or not there is that back-stopping, and that there should be full disclosure to the employees, the people who are buying this. Either they do or they do not have some recourse if this thing doesn't turn out as everybody hopes it does.

Mr Stephen Owens (Scarborough Centre): Mr Wright, as the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Financial Institutions I want to thank you for your presentation.

I know your staff has worked hard on the regulations and at looking at some of the protections we're talking about here today.

In terms of the health warnings and the disclosure process that I understand is going to be part of the process, and indicating in plain language that the investment, like many other investments, is a risk, I'm getting the sense from yourself—and perhaps I'm incorrect—that perhaps another level of protection or a different kind of protection is required. Is that a correct sense?

Mr Wright: I don't think it's a correct sense. In my judgement there are—and I know some people don't call them this—what I consider investor protection features in Bill 150. They are things like the preparation of a business plan, the participation of an advisory board and the other things, and I've mentioned one or two others. Whether those are adequate investor protection features, frankly, I don't know, and I don't think it's up to the securities commission to say. They are investor protection features, and I would go so far as to say that in my view—this is a personal view—they are more appropriate and better than the requirements in the existing Securities Act when applied to purchases of securities.

I do think there should be very full disclosure of what the risks are. I don't want to be taken as saying I think the investor protection is appropriate, but I certainly don't want to be taken as saying it isn't appropriate either. I'm saying it's better than if you'd just left it under the Securities Act. In fact the program would not work under the Securities Act.

Mr Owens: You've mentioned the issue with respect to recourse if in fact something happens down the line and the investment goes down. Even with all the protections, the health warnings and plain language and people understanding that what they're doing is inherently risky, and in the employee ownership scenario under a company that may not have made it anyway, do you still see the need for recourse for investors?

Mr Wright: I do not want to be taken as saying I see a need for recourse for the investors, because I think that is very much a matter for the people who set the policy and pass the legislation to decide. All I meant to say was that I think it should be clear whether or not there is recourse. It's a personal view, frankly, whether there should be recourse. If you want a personal view from me—maybe you don't, but I'll give it to you—I don't think there should be recourse, but I think that I should know.

The Chair: I'd like to thank you. Time has expired and I don't think we want to send out for supper tonight. I'd like to thank you for coming before this committee with your presentation.

1610

CANADIAN AUTO WORKERS

The Chair: The next group to make a presentation is the Canadian Auto Workers. I'd like to welcome you to the standing committee on finance and economic affairs. If you have a handout, the clerk will hand it out for you. We'll have half an hour, and if you can, leave some time at the end for questions and answers. If you wouldn't mind, identify yourselves and your positions for the purpose of Hansard. You may begin.

Mr James O'Neil: My name is Jim O'Neil. I'm the secretary-treasurer of the Canadian Auto Workers. With me is Sam Gindin, assistant to Bob White, the president of the CAW. We have a brief. I thought what we'd like to do is read over the first few pages, and then Sam Gindin would like to spend some time, just five or 10 minutes, explaining some of the attachments and hopefully leave about 15 minutes for some questions.

Worker venture funds, the rationale: Worker venture funds are, first of all, a response to a failure in how Canadian capital markets work. New companies, particularly smaller and mid-size companies, have had trouble getting access to finances for investment. The idea is to get workers to put their savings into a central fund that can correct this market failure and therefore support the strengthening of our future manufacturing base. Tax breaks—very generous tax breaks—are the inducement for workers to participate in such investments. The involvement of workers is also viewed as a democratization of the economy.

But is this the appropriate way to deal with a legitimate problem? Does it really contribute to job creation? Is it a good investment for workers? What about the implications of the tax breaks? Does it really contribute to worker control? Does labour have a better alternative? Can workers' funds solve the failure of the capital market?

A worker venture fund would necessarily remain a bit player in the overall scheme of things. The Quebec solidarity fund, in place now for eight years, has assets of some $425 million, a good portion of which come directly from the taxpayer. Allowing private pension funds to invest a further 10% abroad, as the federal government has just done, could mean losing 50 times as much funds as the Quebec solidarity fund has accumulated. The Caisse de dépôt is another matter. Having control over massive funds like the Quebec pension fund and the workers' compensation fund, which are accumulated through premiums on all employers and workers, it has been a major player in Quebec's economic development.

Why are so much of our savings ending up in speculation, real estate or leaving the country? Why aren't they being invested productively? Why, if we need funds in Canada, is the federal government easing the restrictions on sending pension moneys outside our country? Shouldn't we, at a minimum, be discussing greater regulation over the banks and other financial institutions? Common sense suggests that focusing on working people to solve a major problem in Canadian capital markets is either marginal or a cynical and ultimately very costly diversion from dealing with the real issues behind private mismanagement of the country's savings.

Won't they create some jobs in Ontario? Workers investing in such funds face limits that capitalists do not normally face: You can't take your money out if the return is poor—the investment is locked in—and the ultimate investment of funds has to take place in Ontario. These are positive features from the perspective of job creation in our province, and the job argument seems to be reinforced by the only example we have to look at, the Quebec solidarity fund, which, it is argued, has maintained or created some 23,000 jobs. But this must be put in the following context:

(a) There are reasons to believe the Quebec numbers are an exaggeration. But even if we accept them at face value—an average of less than 3,000 jobs per year—this has not made any kind of dent in Quebec's unemployment rate. Quebec's unemployment rate has not improved at all relative to Ontario's in spite of the dramatic deterioration of Ontario's manufacturing base, and Quebec lost more jobs in the latest two months than the Quebec solidarity fund supposedly maintained or created in over eight years.

(b) Where such a fund does play a prominent role in preserving a facility important to the community and the future, the point remains that even if no fund existed the government should and could be acting directly to save those jobs.

(c) If the government used the taxes it is providing to subsidize venture capitalists more directly, would it create equivalent numbers of jobs? If the taxes were used to alleviate pressures on public sector jobs, would this create equivalent numbers of jobs? Is this, in other words, the best use of taxes for a job creation strategy?

Are such funds a good investment for working people? The extremely attractive tax breaks of these funds are used to lure workers into the funds. The relatively low rate of return and the risk involved keep other investors away, and without the tax breaks workers would not be considering them at all.

For workers saving for the future, however, the issue is long-term: What will they have when they retire and how secure will it be? While venture funds might get a return of about 5%—the experience of the Quebec solidarity fund showed an average return of 5.1%—safer funds might get more than twice as much. Canada savings bonds over the same period earned an average return of 10.5%. The advantage of the seductive tax breaks is, because of the lower return, eroded over time.

We have put together some numbers in attachment 1. While they are not conclusive and do depend on assumptions made, they suggest that as an investment for retirement the benefits, even after the tax breaks, are questionable. For workers close to retirement and with relatively higher incomes, the investment may generate more moneys than alternatives, although the risk factor is higher; for younger workers and relatively lower-paid workers, other investments are likely better.

Moreover, and again based on the Quebec experience, the limited ability of workers to generate savings in today's economic circumstances means that such funds are competing with the traditional focus on pension funds. The tendency to erode future pensions in favour of venture funds is, for working people, a dangerous mistake.

If we want to do something about retirement income for workers, let's do it directly by improving on the CPP and OAS through higher premiums and let's make sure the funds are also invested productively in Canada so that in the future Canada will have the strong economic base that can support retirees.

Is the tax break a sensible tax? Corporations get all kinds of tax breaks. What's wrong with workers also getting some?

This particular tax break represents a regressive and unproductive tax reform. First of all, if it weakens worker opposition to corporate tax breaks by buying us off with some crumbs, we've been had. We should be attacking those tax breaks to the rich that are unfair and serve no defensible social purpose. Second, the tax break is not for workers as a whole but is only for those workers with enough savings to invest in such funds, and, when combined with RRSPs, the tax breaks are higher if you earn more. Workers who are unemployed or who end up working part time or who are unorganized or who are simply having trouble making ends meet are not going to share in the tax goodies. Third, it erodes the tax base at a time when funds are desperately needed for health care, education, infrastructure, training, housing and other social programs.

What does this have to do with worker democracy? The workers' venture fund does not control the companies it invests in. Essentially, it is shifting workers' savings and taxpayers' moneys to others who do have control, although when it comes to risks, the workers are very involved. Nor do the investments even have to meet social criteria like the existence of a union or an affirmative action program. In short, it offers neither workers nor their representatives any significant control over the economy.

Other jurisdictions and the business community have supported such funds and articulated the rhetoric of democratization and partnership while simultaneously attacking working people when any concrete democratic measures are actually put on the agenda, measures like increasing the capacity of workers and unions to participate in the economy by providing us with more information about specific sectors; providing resources so we can do more of our own research towards the development of economic alternatives; democratizing, through regulations, private decisions that have a social impact; introducing greater worker input into corporate decisions before they are allowed to close plants and offices; expanding the commitment to widely available and broadly defined training for workers so we have the tools and skills to increase our participation in the economy.

In the debate on worker participation, our union places its focus on the combination of such directions and measures, measures which develop workers' skills, strengthen their organizations and reinforce workers' rights.

Conclusion: The Ontario federation alternative: If the government is serious in its intent to increase worker participation in the economy, it hardly makes sense to begin by introducing a proposal the labour movement has itself rejected, and rejecting, while talking about worker input, the proposal the labour movement is recommending.

The Ontario Federation of Labour has considered worker venture funds at the executive board and at convention. The conclusion was that such structures were not in the interests of working people and we developed an alternative: attachment 2, the social investment fund. This alternative would cost the taxpayer no more money and would offer workers a place to put their savings that promises both a secure rate of return and a socially progressive use of those funds. Instead of tax breaks to individuals, government funding would go directly to the fund. Instead of dabbling with venture funds and pretending that this held the key to developing our economic base, the funds would be used to support low- and middle-income co-op housing or integrated into a broader green industrial strategy.

We strongly urge the government to withdraw its current proposal and seriously consider introducing an alternative based on the OFL model.

Mr Sam Gindin: I'll take you through the attachments and then maybe we can have questions. I won't take long.

The first attachment is an earlier letter we sent. While the brief concentrates on the worker venture fund, the attachment also comments on the question of workers directly owning their own factories or workplaces.

I think the second attachment is more important. We tried to deal with the issue that when you have a tax break, you obviously do very well in the short term but you're locking yourself into a lower rate of return in the long term, and at some point the two lines cross. The example we chose is to take two workers. To make it comparable, we imagined the first worker investing in the fund and getting a 40% tax break: he invests $10 and gets $4 back, so he invests $6 but gets a return on $10. In the second case, we take a situation where somebody with the same $10 just pockets the first $4, so that it's the same as the first individual, invests the other $6 without the tax breaks, so gets his return only on $6.

In that table, we took the actual performance of the Quebec solidarity fund, and we see in the column under "value" that the solidarity fund shares go from $10 to $14.80. Then we compared that to somebody who only started with the $6 investment because he didn't get the tax break. We take that through based on the Canada savings bond average for each year. What you find is that after about 10 years you're in the same place and after 10 years you actually begin to fall behind if you're locked into the solidarity fund type of investment.

1620

You can make that more complicated by throwing in the rollup of the RRSPs; that extends the period at which they cross, but they do cross. There's a table there that people may want to ask some questions about.

I want to make one point on that table, because one of the changes both in the BC model and the Ontario proposal was that people could actually take their money out after eight years. I presume that was partly a response to what the table shows, that if you leave it locked in it turns out to be not a very good investment for the long term. The problem with having the option to take it out after eight years is that it contradicts other objectives of the program. If you take it out after eight years either it simply ends up costing the taxpayer a lot more money, because every eight years you take it out with one hand and with the other hand you put in an equivalent amount and get the tax breaks again, so you get a lot more tax breaks, or from the worker's perspective you obviously have to pay the tax when you pull it out, which removes some of the advantages. If you do take it out it defeats the point of making this into some kind of savings plan for retirement, which was the original rationale for why it was locked in.

The second attachment I think you may have seen earlier today when the OFL was here. It just summarizes the OFL's alternative. I want to emphasize that it's an alternative in the sense of a different direction based on some different principles rather than a detailed proposal. I attached an example of how that alternative might work in terms of a social investment fund that essentially issued shelter bonds or green bonds.

Maybe we can take questions now.

Mr Kwinter: I'd like to address this to Sam Gindin, with whom I've had the pleasure of debating over the years as he talked about things like free trade. I'm puzzled. The reason I'm puzzled is that I was approached by labour representation in 1989 about their plan to put up a social fund financed by workers, wanting the support of our government, which we gave and which we felt had some merit. What has happened on the way? This is supposedly a labour-oriented fund, and to date, and from the presentation you've made—I see the signatories, Gordie Wilson, Julie Davis, John Calvert, Sam Gindin, Hugh MacKenzie, John O'Grady and Robin Sears, all signing a document that essentially says: "Labour has rejected this plan. We have another idea." Why hasn't that idea come forward? This was certainly a government initiative. It certainly implies that it's to benefit labour. So what happened on the way?

Mr Gindin: You're looking for possibly the first thing we have agreed on, Monte. I guess this started with the Liberal government approaching the Ontario Federation of Labour with whether it would be interested in the fund. The response of the OFL was that we weren't interested in the kind of fund that discussions were about, but we wanted an alternative. I wasn't part of the actual meeting with the Liberals at the time but, as I understand it, what you said is basically true: Your response was that you'd be sympathetic to looking at the kind of alternative we put forth.

The OFL has been lobbying on this kind of proposal although, to be honest, there is some division within the labour movement. Although this did pass our convention, there was a debate over it. I can't tell you what has happened since then. I think the Ontario government is basically following the Quebec model. It looks like that's what's happening across the country. Part of this may be that the federal government matches the tax credits, and if you changed the structure of the fund you'd also have to get the approval of the federal government that would go along with it. I don't see why that should be a problem.

From our perspective, we really don't understand why, if this is supposed to be a labour-oriented fund, the alternative put forth by the labour movement isn't what we're discussing today. Maybe somebody else can answer that question. I can't answer that question.

Mr Carr: I can't answer it, but I'll ask my own question; it's along the same lines, though. With the opposition you've shown, obviously you've had a chance to discuss numerous issues with the government. How far along in the process did you have a chance to sit down with the government and say, "We don't like this"? Did they pop the bill on you and say, "There it is," as sometimes happens, and then you're into it and sometimes it's tough to back out politically? How far back down the road did you voice your opposition to this plan? When and where and so on?

Mr Gindin: Let me comment on that, because I was involved rather than Jimmy at that point. First of all, the debate that was taking place before the last election wasn't taking place in secret. The position the labour movement came out with was well known. Robin Sears was actually one member of the subcommittee that discussed this. The position was distributed, so our position hasn't been a secret. There may have been an assumption that the Quebec-type fund was acceptable; I don't know. But about the middle of September 1991 we were contacted that there were hearings taking place and that this was very far on the way. I think we had something like a week or 10 days to put together a brief. That's why we've enclosed the attachment. We were surprised that it was moving ahead so fast and moving in a different direction, so we quickly put together that letter to lay it out. Nothing has happened since then; no one has contacted us to say, "Let's talk about this alternative."

Mr Carr: It seems to me to be something that has been driven not by the government—forgive me, some of the people who work in the ministries—but it seems to be a bureaucrat-driven initiative, where the government has been pushed. Of course there are two options that come in: the policy up through the people in the various ministries and then the one that's set by the government of the day. This seems to be one that has been driven, going as far back as the Liberals—again, I don't say it in the negative sense—by the same people working in government; we refer to them as bureaucrats. They pushed it during that period of time and are pushing it now, and they seem to be successful. Is that your assessment, that it isn't a policy of the government, but that the bureaucrats have pushed this forward?

Mr Gindin: I don't know. That may very well be the case. I'm less interested in who's doing it and more interested in stopping it and getting it changed.

The Chair: Mr Kwinter. There's one minute left.

Mr Kwinter: I'd like to ask another question. It seems to me, just by the very dynamics of the presentations made to us by the Ontario Federation of Labour and by the CAW, that this whole project is doomed to failure. How could you possibly encourage an employee to buy into a program where the two major entities in the labour movement are saying, "This is of no consequence, a terrible deal, and we don't think it should be done"? How do you deal with that?

Mr O'Neil: If you're asking whether, if this happens to pass, we will encourage, in fact we'll discourage workers and will lay out what we think are the consequences of investing in this program. So we will not be supportive; there's no question that at the end of the day we will not be supportive of this bill if it gets passed.

Mr Kwinter: Yet it's supposed to be—

The Chair: We have to go on.

Mr Kimble Sutherland (Oxford): If I understood your presentation correctly, what you're saying is that the idea of some type of worker-sponsored venture fund is fine if it goes far enough in terms of dealing with some other issues you have concerns about: (a) a guaranteed return and (b) some democratization in the workplace, or some say in how the company is going to work or how the economy is going to. Is that basically what you're saying? In other words, this doesn't go far enough in terms of dealing with the concerns that the labour movement has about its involvement in the overall thing. "All you're asking us to do is put in the money, but you're not allowing us to have any say in how it's operated." Is that what the concern is?

1630

Mr Gindin: No, I don't think that's a fair characterization. I think we're really saying we'd like to see this thing move in a different direction, a direction which in some ways is less ambitious. We're saying there really is a major problem in how capital markets work in this country, and you can't expect to solve that by trying to get voluntary contributions from workers. We think that's the wrong direction to go and that to lure workers with major tax breaks which may not be in their long-term interest is also a dangerous thing to do.

What we're suggesting is something quite different. If the idea is to mobilize workers' savings, we're saying the best way of doing that is to say to workers, "Okay, maybe you will get a lower rate of return, but in exchange for that you'll have a safe rate of return and you'll know that what the money is being put into will be socially useful, like co-op housing or a green industrial strategy, and you may have some input into making sure it's done in an innovative way." We're not saying this would be a vehicle for solving the co-op housing problem or replacing the government, so at that level it's more modest, but it would illustrate something that could be done.

Mr Sutherland: I want to take an example, let's say one of the plants that maybe even CAW has organized. Due to some of the rationalization that's gone on, the plant is still making money and has been making money, but companies are rationalizing, they're setting their priorities and they don't want to operate that part of the branch, or a buyout has occurred and they've bought out their competition, so now they're going to close it down.

You said you're concerned about pension contributions, but if that plant closes down, there aren't going to be any more pension contributions. In that type of scenario, in the long run, is it not in their interests to try investing to keep it going so there are ongoing pension contributions and so in the long run they will have an adequate pension? In that type of scenario, would you encourage your members to look at it?

Mr Gindin: No. There may be circumstances, in kind of an ad hoc way, where it makes sense for workers to say, "We think there's no alternative to getting involved in worker ownership." It's different from what we've been talking about. This is a worker venture fund. Direct worker ownership might, in certain very specific situations, make sense, although we wouldn't recommend that as a general model. The idea that workers should take their savings and put them into things businessmen don't want to put into or have decided are going to be failures makes no sense. If you're a worker and you're afraid of losing your job, it makes a lot more sense to invest your money in something else rather than to throw it at something that seems to fail. I'm not objecting to the fact that there may be unique circumstances, and I think Algoma might have been one, where this would make sense, but it doesn't fit as a general solution to those kinds of problems at all.

The Chair: Mr Sutherland, we've run out of time.

Mr Sutherland: Okay, I'll have to pass.

The Chair: With the brief here I imagine there's an address where you can get a hold of Mr Gindin. I'd like to thank you for coming before this committee with your presentation.

Mr Gindin: Thank you.

Mr Kwinter: Put a mark on the calendar. We both agree on something.

INVESTMENT DEALERS ASSOCIATION OF CANADA

The Chair: The next group to be here is the Investment Dealers Association of Canada. I'd like to welcome you here to this committee. We have one half-hour, if you can leave some time at the end for questions. If you wouldn't mind identifying yourselves and your position for the purposes of Hansard, you may begin.

Mr Michael Mackasey: Good afternoon. My name is Michael Mackasey. I'm the chairman of the Ontario district council of the Investment Dealers Association of Canada. We have been involved in the early stages of consultations on the issue of labour-sponsored investment and ownership plans. We are pleased to have this opportunity to meet with members of the standing committee on finance and economic affairs to discuss Bill 150.

The district's concern with both components of the legislation is similar: We believe that the dual aims of the program, worker ownership and increased liquidity in the capital markets, are not substantially achievable through the two mechanisms set out in the bill. The costs of $250 million for the program's first year are sufficiently high to make the success or failure of the program a matter of general concern.

A central theme of the program appears to be that there is insufficient capital currently available for the restructuring of business on the scale the government would like to see undertaken. We believe there are enormous pools of readily available capital for Canadian enterprise, which are only waiting for the appropriate economic conditions to be employed as equity in the restructuring of the Canadian economy. In the absence of appropriate economic conditions, the government has chosen very narrowly focused tax incentives, in the case of employee investment funds, to free up capital for small cap Ontario businesses. In so doing, the risks of speculative investment have also been focused. In our view, the government would be better advised to apply its fiscal and policy weight to the development of a far more broadly based incentive to capital formation.

There exists already in Ontario a system of public equity markets that, judging by the press of foreign delegations, is the envy of the world. The market system is the only true means of broadly assessing the value of company shares and there is a far broader spectrum of investment options available in the public markets than there will be in either of the investment vehicles proposed in Bill 150. The appeal to the investor is the tax benefit, and the prospect of retained jobs in the case of the ownership plan, not necessarily the underlying investment, as we believe should be the case. This approach creates distortions in the marketplace that would not be present if the government focused on providing a broad framework for efficient markets.

We have heard it widely suggested that the government will examine policy options to encourage the listing of small businesses some time in the near future. We encourage this. While this presents its own set of policy challenges, it also presents the opportunity for greater market efficiency and liquidity.

Although not necessarily a direct concern of the government of Ontario, the high capital gains tax structure in Canada, particularly when compared with average tax rates on dividends and income, has discouraged individuals from participating in domestic equity markets. The tax reform measures introduced in the late 1980s have shifted the incentive away from risk investment. Effective capital gains tax rates have increased by more than one third under tax reform, bequeathing Canada with the highest capital gains tax rate of any major industrial country; further, the capital gains tax rate exceeds the rate on dividends. The tax system creates a disincentive for risk investments which provide return primarily on the increased asset values rather than dividend payouts. The tax structure thus discourages the growth of small and medium-sized businesses which will come to depend on public markets for equity capital as they grow.

We have some specific comments on Bill 150. The first is with respect to employee investment funds. We understand from conversations with officials that one reason for the structuring of this incentive in its current form is the availability of matching dollars from the federal government. We consider this reason to be insufficient. We can clearly understand the government's interest in structuring an incentive on that basis, but we see little public policy benefit to it. The taxpayers in Ontario will foot their share of the bill regardless of whether they do so through taxes at the provincial or the federal level.

We would prefer to see a more broadly based incentive rather than a narrowly based one selected for the sole purpose of the multiplier arising from federal contributions. We are concerned about the credit risk that some of the venture funds will present. There will be less reason for the fund's managers to be concerned about the fund's investment objectives, we think, if governments on the surface provide 80% or more of the cost of the investment. This is also a particular concern if the fund is not subject to the regulatory review of the Ontario Securities Commission and either the full force of the Ontario Securities Act or some other regulator or regulatory authority set up to deal with it.

On the basis, however, that such a policy is already in place, particularly from the federal government, we would express our strong concerns with respect to employee investment funds, that all such funds that are set up to function under this bill be structured under stringent guidelines. Items such as liquidity, quality of management of the funds, fees and expenses of the funds, startup costs, their use of proceeds, regulatory supervision, their method of distribution and, in particular, the valuation question are all items that must be strongly considered.

1640

Under the topic of worker ownership plan, we support the government's program to encourage worker ownership. While this program has been widely reported as being an option for a range of employee ownership initiatives, from hostile takeovers to employee buyouts at the time of a founder's retirement, we believe the conditions in which such buyouts will be attractive are relatively narrow, for the following reasons.

Since under this program employees are required to acquire control of the employing company, their resources, within the $5,000 to $15,000 range provided, must be sufficient to acquire that control. The deal can't be so small that regulatory and underwriting costs are prohibitive. The equity in the corporation has to be worth something. The current owners have to be willing to cede control. The government, with scarce resources, has to be willing to approve the proposal, and therefore it must represent a fairly compelling case.

We believe that, properly used, the employee ownership buyout will assist an orderly transfer of ownership to employees in situations in which market conditions have made sale to an independent third party difficult. In these cases, and we hope in only these cases, the public subsidy of the purchase price would be acceptable to ensure that viable situations or companies can survive, and we expect that the lost tax revenues at the early stages will be more than recovered through future profits of the enterprise.

As long as the program is administered in that manner and is not designed to prop up businesses which are doomed to ultimate failure through natural changing markets or technology or other economic conditions, and as long as securities regulations are followed, we support the government's initiative in this view.

One specific comment we do make is the difficulty with the threshold of control and that this might be reconsidered. It may be more effective, given the size of some of these transfers, that the amount of money required to be raised to fully control the company is large and that the program can apply to significant equity ownership by the workers in conjunction with the changing control, as opposed to dictating that majority control go to the workers. We feel such a relaxation might add to the universe of healthy investments and give the public and the government more leverage in these situations.

We could go on considerably with a list of constraints. It is our assessment that many, if not all, of these situations will continue along the lines of the Spruce Falls deal, as a bailout option for some companies. In this regard there seems to be general support among investment dealers for this approach as an alternative to outright government bailouts. The worker ownership approach can significantly reduce the cost to taxpayers of either a company bailout or the social assistance that may be required to provide transitional support to a whole community should a linchpin industry fail. The cost to taxpayers is reduced to a one-time payment of 10% to 20% of the company equity, with considerably reduced ongoing liability.

When assessing this program in the light of the government's objectives of worker ownership and venture capital investment, it is doubtful that this program meets the test, however. The investment's value to workers may be minimal in conventional investment or regulatory terms. The payoff for the workers is the survival of their economic base.

From this analysis we conclude that if the government is interested in increasing the scope of this program, it should seriously consider whether it's necessary for workers to have control of the restructured company, as I've already suggested. We also believe it is important to develop an understanding of the role of pivotal regulatory concepts, such as the "know your client" and suitability provisions, of these transactions.

I'd like to thank you for the opportunity to comment before the committee today. We are at your disposal to answer questions.

The Chair: Mr Sutherland.

Mr Sutherland: Actually, I think I'll pass to Mr Johnson.

Mr Johnson: Thank you very much for coming today with your submission. I listened with a great deal of interest to what you had to say. I'm curious to know your own opinion. Bill 150 becomes law and now there's an opportunity for people to take advantage of all the options within that law. How often do you think the worker ownership plan—how many businesses are there, because you mentioned something about this, that you expected there wouldn't be many options where this would actually be put into place? I was just wondering if you could elaborate on that a little more.

Mr Thomas Dalzell: In answer to that, I guess what we're really getting at in that section is to point out not so much the total number of businesses that would be eligible or would want to make use of this sort of situation, whose employees would want to do so, but more to talk about the narrow focus. If you look at the program in total—and I went back to look at some of the Hansard discussions—there were an awful lot of possibilities that were raised as options for using that particular section of the bill.

We want to narrow our focus and say, "Look, we have some experience through one of our members, Spruce Falls, and looking at budgetary constraints and other factors, we think the real use will be in this one narrow range." Now, we could be wrong. That would depend entirely on how much money the government made available and what the intention of the government is in doing it. That was just our assessment so we could narrow the focus of our response. I suppose the use that's made of it will largely depend on how it's received once it's generally known and what the economic conditions are.

Mr Johnson: I'd like to say too that there are certain situations where it won't be a bailout situation. This isn't the intent of the legislation. The intent of the legislation isn't to encourage employees to bail out their companies; it's to encourage employees, where a company is still viable, to become involved and to go for that option, which will be made available under this legislation.

Mr Dalzell: That's perhaps an unfair term we used in that regard. Certainly when we were talking about such matters as the necessity that there be true value left in the shares and so on, we were referring to the fact that the potential investors, the employees, would have to regard this as being an ongoing concern, at least for some period, before they would be willing to come up with the money required. So that's not contrary to our view.

Mr Sutherland: There's been quite a bit of discussion today about the ability to access capital. We had the Canadian Federation of Independent Business here this morning and a survey indicated that 25% of its members have indicated they've had trouble accessing capital or problems with their institutions. They're not always happy with the mainstay financial institutions.

I guess too that the last time we went through a recession, with some of the impacts on the banking industry and for small investors and medium-sized companies as a result of some of the problems with Dome in 1982-83, financial policies tightened up a great deal in terms of accessing capital. Given the nature of some of the events that have been happening in the last few weeks and the last couple of years, do you see access to capital becoming a more difficult thing, particularly through the mainstay financial institutions?

Mr Mackasey: Currently in today's environment, with respect to the banking system—and I'm not a banker; you may want to ask one; you may disagree with me—with the Olympia and York problems and real estate values in general, what we typically see at the end of any recession is that the banking system tends to tighten up and become much more restrictive in terms of its propensity to lend money and its risk profile. That tends to loosen up as economic conditions improve.

At the same time, in the event that you've had a restructuring of companies, admittedly a painful but probably a healthy restructuring over the longer term in terms of cutting costs and becoming more efficient, to those people who provide equity in smaller situations—I don't want to use the term "venture capitalists"—both on the venture capital side and on the mezzanine capital side, the return commensurate with the risk will start to get back into line, as asset values have declined and returns will become generally more attractive. My feeling is we will probably see more equity money over the next few years forwarded to smaller situations, as opposed to what we see right now. We saw that coming out of the recession of 1982. We saw that in 1983-85 where we saw a lot of smaller situations coming to market for the first time in initial public offerings and having their equity listed.

1650

Mr Carr: I don't know if you were here earlier for the presentation of the Canadian Auto Workers. They basically said that they don't see anybody investing in the worker ownership plan. What is your assessment of how much activity you'll see if this bill goes the way it is now?

Mr Dalzell: I guess there were two points discussed there. One is the question of, what would the impact be of the fact that those two organizations might be sending out a negative signal on this thing? I guess the other main issue is, is it a viable program? We have the one instance of Spruce Falls already. I suppose, under certain circumstances, it's going to be a viable program. Particularly where jobs are at stake and so forth, you're going to find people certainly considering it. That particular element of the program is relatively broadly based.

As to the matter of what impact union or non-union membership would have on that, I think you'll find that it'll be mainly judged on the circumstances at the time.

Mr Mackasey: Just following up on that, I've not been directly involved in the previous issue, the labour-sponsored fund side as opposed to the Spruce Falls side of it. I think that over the long run, whenever a new issue is brought to market or whenever a mutual fund or another kind of investment fund or vehicle is brought to market, that's the time typically when you raise the most money. I think how much money you're going to raise in these kinds of vehicles over the long term is going to depend largely on how the funds treat their investors in terms of return, risk, liquidity and so forth.

I think the concerns of the gentlemen before us were that the historic returns on these funds, particularly the solidarity fund in Quebec, have not been terribly good. Their concern, I think, was that enticing people into funds with essentially short-term tax incentives, particularly when part of that tax incentive, to my knowledge, in Quebec has been discussion of placing the units of the fund in your RRSP, can be a detriment for the long term if not handled correctly by the management of the fund.

You're asking me how much money will be raised. If you look at the mutual fund business in general, although this is different, typically the moneys are attracted by the managers and their track record over time. I think that's what the test will be.

Mr Carr: Just on that point, you say that how the fund responds is going to be the big question. What criteria do you see as the most important? I know people obviously look at track records, but what do you see as the most critical things for them to do?

Mr Mackasey: I think clearly the most important aspect of any fund is its management. I have some concerns with respect to the valuation of these funds, both on the illiquid and difficult, in many situations, challenge of valuing what is going into and coming out of the funds.

I also have a concern with the illiquidity aspect, particularly of smaller situations. It's okay to put 20% or 25% or 10% of a private company into a fund and its shares, but when it comes time for the investor to take his money out, where does the fund get the money to pay the redemption when the underlying assets themselves are not necessarily liquid? As such, we've seen funds in the UK that in themselves have either had to bring the underlying investments public—they've been at it since 1945. They ended up going into a closed-end structure and listing themselves on the stock exchange and allowing liquidity in that view, but that's different from what we're talking about here.

The Chair: Before we go on to Mr Kwinter, Mr Evans just wants to make a comment—I guess a typing mistake or whatever was in the brief—just to identify a figure here.

Mr Evans: The Investment Dealers Association of Canada brief refers to $250 million for the program's first year. I believe that's a quotation, probably from John Whitehead, and in fact the $250 million is a treasury estimate of the cost at maturity. Strictly speaking, 1991 was the first year of operation. Spruce was the only employee ownership operation, Working Ventures was the fund, and the tax credits in that year were $8.2 million. That's merely a question of fact.

Mr Dalzell: That's correct. We did get that.

Mr Kwinter: I want to thank you for your presentation. I agree with virtually all of it. I just want to ask you a question. It's hypothetical, but given the vehicle that is described in the proposed legislation—and you're an investment dealer—and removing the fact that someone may feel this is the only way he can protect his job, if someone came to you, given all of the other investment vehicles that were available, is this the kind of program that you can, in all consciousness and knowing your responsibility to know your client and everything else, something that you could recommend over and above other vehicles that are available?

Mr Mackasey: I'm sorry, Mr Kwinter, are you referring to the labour-sponsored funds or to the one-off Spruce Falls kind of—

Mr Kwinter: To either one.

Mr Mackasey: We'll refer quickly to the one-off Spruce Falls type of employee ownership. It would clearly, upon investigation, depend on the determination of return, on the viability of the business and basically to analyse the situation on a one-off basis to see if the investment return, commensurate with the risk involved in entering into the deal, is worthwhile when compared with other alternative investment choices out in the marketplace, which range anywhere from 30-day government of Canada treasury bills to some venture capital funds. Whether it would be recommended would be clearly one of economics and looking at the situation independently.

With respect to the funds, because of the longer-term nature of the funds—essentially you're investing in a blind pool and leaving all the investment decisions up to the manager of the fund as opposed to having a chance to look at each individual piece of business that goes into the fund—before I would recommend it to anybody I would certainly want to know the manager's track record, his view on investment merits, how the fund will be able to pay me out, what the expected returns are etc, and compare that with the spectrum of investment product out there.

Mr Dalzell: I'll respond to that also. Certainly in talking about the funds, the clear purpose of this is to move investment into areas where it hasn't previously been achievable at an economic return or not at the level the government would like to see, so it almost becomes a matter of definition, that if you simply strip away the really substantial tax credits there's going to be something to be made up there.

On a kind of Spruce Falls deal, there seemed to be a number of different levels at which—and you mentioned suitability in particular. First of all, the mere fact that the money is there, the tax credit is there, creates an opportunity for people to look in that direction and that, I'm sure, puts a focus on something that wouldn't have been considered as much, perhaps, in the past.

I also point out what the CAW mentioned before—I believe it was the CAW—certainly the previous group mentioned the fact that if business isn't going to invest in it by definition, then why should workers invest in it. There may be cases where there's some overall strategic move that a company is taking to do something and it might make sense, in the short or the long term, for the workers to step in in that situation where it didn't make sense for the business.

Finally, on the specific issue of suitability, there was certainly something we heard back from our members who had been involved in Spruce Falls. Specifically, you get into the situation of whether such relatively large chunks of money are suitable investments for investors who typically may not be terribly high in the earning bracket and so forth. I think that raises real questions and it was probably addressed obliquely in some of the remarks about what kind of regulatory structure this would have to be under.

The Chair: Mr Kwinter, the clock has run out. I would like to thank you, gentlemen, for coming before the committee.

1700

ONTARIO CHAMBER OF COMMERCE

The Chair: The next group to come before the committee is the Ontario Chamber of Commerce. Mr Eastman, you're by yourself today?

Mr Don N. Eastman: Yes, I'm all on my own right now.

The Chair: Okay, I had two names down here. I'd like to welcome you again to the standing committee on finance and economics. Your face is quite familiar around here.

Mr Eastman: No, I'm not by myself.

The Chair: Would you identify yourself for the purposes of Hansard. I believe it's Mr Couto.

Mr Joe Couto: Yes.

The Chair: You're coordinator, economic policy, correct? Okay, fine. We have half an hour, until 5:30. Please leave some time at the end for questions from the committee.

Mr Eastman: Thank you for having us. As you've heard before, the Ontario Chamber of Commerce represents 165 local chambers of commerce and boards of trade and about 65,000 businesses in the province.

Before I begin to address Bill 150, I'd like to ask your indulgence for a couple of seconds. I've just come from our annual convention, three very full, very hectic, and I'd like to think very productive days in Windsor. We are tired of crabbing, complaining and generally depressing ourselves about the political economic climate we find ourselves in. We dramatically changed what we normally do at that convention.

Instead of spending most of our time on a series of specific policy resolutions, we committed ourselves to developing a positive strategy for economic prosperity in Ontario. It's called Ontario Today and Tomorrow: An Agenda for Renewal. It's a strategy for all stakeholders in Ontario's economy and recognizes the interdependence of quality social programs and a healthy economy. We commend it to you and would be delighted to discuss it with you either individually or on a group basis.

Turning to Bill 150, we have some general concerns about the consultation process that preceded this legislation and some concerns about the proposed legislation.

Let me begin by expressing some frustration. The day before the original set of hearings were to begin, I and thousands of other Ontarians received this leaflet in my newspaper: Take Advantage of New Tax Legislation.

I consider the timing of this leaflet to be an insult to the consultation process that was supposedly under way and an insult to the responsibilities of this Legislature. The presumption of automatic passage of the legislation is offensive, even if it does reflect political reality.

On the consultation process, this government has taken some bold and positive initiatives in improving and extending the consultation process in the province. By opening up the process, the government has helped all of us to better understand what that process could be and should be. It's in that context of understanding that Bill 150 can be seen as the product of a consultation process that really didn't begin soon enough.

For a consultation process to be truly effective, it has to begin at the problem definition stage: "We have some concerns. We think this is the problem we are dealing with. Is this the right problem? Have we described it properly? What are we missing?" It's only when that stage is complete that we can begin to talk productively about possible solutions.

Bill 150 has been another one of those consultation processes that didn't begin at the problem definition stage but with: "Here's our solution. What do you think of it?" That's certainly better than no consultation, but it sure leaves a lot of room for improvement.

Our major problem with Bill 150 is that when we work our way through it, it attempts to deal with several perceived problems at once and as a result doesn't deal with any of them as simply, effectively and positively as we think they need to be dealt with. We see two major pieces of new legislation rolled into one document, and as a result neither piece is receiving the focused attention it deserves. The employee ownership labour-sponsored venture capital corporations are addressing problems that are very different from those addressed by the labour-sponsored investment fund corporations. We are all for consistency, but not at the expense of clarity and focus.

Let's address the labour-sponsored investment fund corporations portion of Bill 150 first. The objective of this portion of the act is to assist employees in buying the companies they work for.

While a lot of wonderful things have been said about employee-owned companies, their track record here and elsewhere is mixed. There have been some successes, some failures, and in a number of instances it's simply hard to tell. Certainly, for some companies in trouble, employee ownership is an option that may make it possible to salvage companies and jobs that would otherwise be lost.

We endorse the concept of the provincial government facilitating employee ownership under these circumstances, but we do question whether this is the most effective, most responsible way of proceeding. We have a sense that with some more imagination, it should have been possible to work with the RRSP concept to free up investment funds.

There is a positive role for the province to play in facilitating the process. The legal challenges faced by a worker group in contemplating a buyout are immense. By simply providing assistance through that process, the provincial government could be immensely helpful with relatively little direct cost to itself.

What is before you may actually be the best way of solving this specific employee ownership problem, but we are not comfortable that the alternatives received sufficient attention.

One of the concerns we had with the initial version of the bill appears to have been addressed in the government amendments. The initial proposals would have permitted an employee group to proceed with far less than majority support of the affected employees. A majority of the relevant unionized employees would have sufficed without regard to the relevant non-union workforce. That was a necessary change and it appears to have been made.

The portion of Bill 150 that is much more problematical is the one dealing with employee ownership labour-sponsored venture capital corporations. At the risk of sounding a little dull, we are not sure what problems this portion of this bill is trying to cure; and, yes, we do understand that this portion of the bill has been largely driven by federal initiatives.

Let us list some of the problems this portion of the bill is apparently trying to address, at least in part: increase the number of people in the province who have a clear and visible link to the market economy through investment in companies; increase the funds available for relatively new, developing companies with difficulty of access to traditional sources of capital, and increase the financial resources and financial clout of the unions.

We're not sure that the list is complete, and we hesitate to list the union "problem" in that fashion, but there's no other way to explain the exclusivity of what's being proposed. If we had started the consultation process at the problem definition stage, it's highly unlikely that process would have arrived at the set of solutions we see before us.

We have deeply rooted concerns about legislation that uses tax money to turn the labour movement into investment bankers, even if that legislation is stimulated by a federal initiative that was itself inadequately considered.

1710

Is the labour movement so much in control of the other challenges it faces that it can afford to divert the substantial time and effort required to competently manage this investment activity?

Is it fair to Ontario's taxpayer base and competing requirements for funds for health, education and social services to use tax money to substantially subsidize labour movement activities?

What effective constraints are possible to prevent the union movement from using this new-found, tax-based financial power unfairly in the marketplace? For example, unless your small company has a union connected with a labour-sponsored venture capital fund, should it forget about access to this source of money? That's a concern, not a conclusion.

We encounter a great deal of legislation that diverts the province's real resources into non-productive activities. We are concerned that we have already overinstitutionalized our savings and investment. The result is that we appear to be losing a lot of our savings to administration costs instead of productively investing them. We need legislation that simplifies the investment process, not further complications.

We wholeheartedly endorse the concept of broader share ownership in the province and feel this would assist an appreciation of business and market realities that is sadly lacking in the current environment. Unfortunately, we do not believe the proposed legislation moves us forward on these very legitimate objectives.

Ideally, we would like to see Bill 150 divided into two pieces, with a positive problem definition-based consultation process for both of them. If that is not possible, the legislation should at least be opened up to eliminate the union exclusivity.

Mr Sutherland: First of all, thanks for being here. The pamphlet you passed around was of course sent out by an organization, and for whatever reasons, it has decided to do that before legislation is passed in its final nature. It may be a bit presumptuous on their part to know what the final outcome is going to be and whether they are going to be eligible.

I just had a chance to glance through this other document you gave us, An Agenda for Renewal, and may I say that I think it's a very good document overall. It's very constructive and positive. It doesn't mean I agree with everything I saw in it, but overall I think you should be complimented for taking a very positive and constructive approach in terms of outlining some ideas as to where you think the province should be going in terms of economic issues and other issues. That was certainly striking in terms of some of the comments on social issues in there, as well. I just wanted to make note of that and I hope you will take that back to your people. Certainly I'm only speaking for myself on that, but I thought overall it was a very positive document.

Mr Eastman: Thank you. I shall.

Mr Carr: I also had a chance to put your document forward to the Treasurer today. He said that he liked some things in it, and as Deputy Premier and Treasurer, hopefully he will have the authority to do something with it, although two days ago I gave him your resolutions during January and February or February and March and he wasn't as receptive. So maybe changing the format from a resolution style might help a little bit in terms of getting it through. It is helpful.

Just on this particular piece of legislation, one of the concerns small businesses in particular have is that governments of the day seem to be—I think I've referred to it this morning as worrying about mice in the basement when there are elephants on the roof. They'll put a program together for whatever reason, but it isn't the most critical question. Some of the business groups that were here this morning said that. If you looked at it, they said, in terms of rating priorities, financing was farther down the list, behind taxes, regulation and so on. Is that your assessment as well?

I'm thinking particularly from the small businesses' perspective, which normally aren't involved in a lot of complicated investment deals. Is that what your membership is saying, that in the overall scheme of things they're looking at something that isn't as important as taking a look at the taxes, regulations and all the other things slowing down business?

Mr Eastman: Yes, I think that's a fair assessment if you were to look at the things in order of their relative importance. Certainly the regulatory burden and the whole paperwork challenge, for a small business in particular, is immense. If that could somehow be streamlined, I think we would all benefit from it. Taxes are easy to focus on and, boy, we sure do a lot of complaining about that with more than a little validity.

I think the access to capital will depend on the specific company. It is not a universal problem, but certainly there are companies out there that have that problem. One of the reasons that arises is that we have institutionalized savings. The normal access to capital for a company in a small-scale startup operation is being diverted into such things as RRSPs where it's no longer available. With friends, family, cousins etc, who you could normally rely on for that kind of capital without having to put together a great formal business plan etc, it has been dried up.

Mr Carr: That's what a lot of businesses I've talked to say. Again, I won't say specifically in Ontario, because governments at all levels and political stripes do this as well. They say that governments put things in place where you tax and regulate people so you can turn around and bring in programs and somehow give tax credits so you can help those companies you've taxed and regulated out of existence. That's the way it turns out. They look at it and say, "My goodness, essentially that's what has happened." I try to be non-political by saying that regulation and taxation is by governments at all levels.

Specifically on this bill, though, looking at it from the standpoint of how many people you see will be investing in it and taking a look at where we're going with this, do you see it as being very difficult? You may have been here during the presentation when the Canadian Auto Workers and some people from the labour movement said they don't see too many people investing in either of these particular ventures. What's your assessment? If the bill stands as it is, do you see many people jumping into this particular aspect?

Mr Eastman: Again, I think it's important to really look at the two different portions of the bill very differently. I believe there will be opportunities for specific companies where an employee buyout kind of approach is appropriate. How often that will come along, I'm not sure. I think it will be primarily in a salvage operation kind of concept. There will be some of those. The risk will be that they will tend to be companies in industries that are facing pressures for other reasons and this kind of thing will not be sufficient to bring them out of it. I think that's one end of things. There are a number of limited opportunities, but the ones that do exist may be of significance.

I think there are two major parts to it: How much incentive is there for the investor and how many investment opportunities are there for the funds? If I just look at the numbers, one of the things that annoyed me was, boy, this looked attractive. When you worked the numbers out that was, superficially anyway, an attractive place to put funds. To the extent that it is successful—I'm not sure how many appropriate investment opportunities there are that could make use of that without absorbing far too much of the funds in the administration process.

The Chair: Before we go on to Mr Kwinter, there were just a few items in the brief that Mr Evans from the Ministry of Revenue wanted to comment on—the headings.

Mr Evans: In your brief you have a specific reference to "Labour-Sponsored Investment Fund Corporations," and following that heading there are a number of items I would recognize as being appropriate to the employee ownership side rather than to the investment side. Was there some other part of your presentation that might have got missed in the construction that relate to the investment side? These do not seem to be investment fund comments under the investment fund heading.

Mr Eastman: Could you be more specific, please?

1720

Mr Evans: Yes. In particular, your references to voting in the last paragraph there are an amendment under the employee-ownership aspect of the bill, which is your following heading—the agreement of employees before the investment can be made. I believe that is specifically employee ownership.

Mr Eastman: Are you dealing with our brief or with the previous one?

Mr Evans: With your brief, I believe, that whole centre section there. Under the fund situation as presently described by the bill, the employees do not gain control of corporations. They invest in a fund that takes minority positions in corporations. The points you raise are points that I think properly relate to the employee-ownership segment, which is the point that follows. So I wondered if there were other points you had intended to make there appropriately referring to the investment fund.

Mr Eastman: I'm still trying to wrestle with the comments you're making and trying to sort them out. Can I spend a couple of minutes with you on that for clarification, or we can share the same piece of paper? I think that would be helpful.

Mr Evans: Certainly.

The Chair: Okay, we'll go on to Mr Kwinter then.

Mr Kwinter: Mr Eastman, we've listened to several groups all day today and we've been getting some very strong signals. A survey of members of the Canadian Federation of Independent Business showed that their number one concern is taxation and overregulation by government. Lack of access to capital was down at the bottom of the list, somewhere around 23% or 24%. We had other groups coming in saying there was a vast pool of investment capital available to business in Canada. It does not seem to be the problem; the problem is having the right vehicle to access it.

We had the Ontario Federation of Labour saying it's not supportive of this, even though it's supposed to be a labour-driven fund. They don't see this as the vehicle they had envisioned. We have the Canadian Auto Workers saying that not only are they not supportive of it, but that they will be encouraging their members not to participate, that they see this is not going to do anybody any good.

What does the chamber feel on that kind of level? Other than your comments saying there was no consultation and everything else, what is the feeling of the chamber? Does it feel this is something that is going to help the economy of Ontario? Is it something it would support on that broad level, as opposed to its concerns about the consultation and also about the union orientation? Talking for the chamber, is this something you would support with some modification, major modification? Or is this something you see a need for?

Mr Eastman: I think our preference would be to go back to the problem-definition stage and try to understand what problems we are trying to solve and how we might best address those. What we see here has been driven by federal legislation. I understand that, but again it appears to add a layer of complexity to a world that is already far too complex.

I keep a file of quotations. One I particularly enjoy is from Einstein and says that everything should be kept as simple as possible but no simpler. I think we can move a lot farther in that direction of "as simple as possible but no simpler" than what I see in Bill 150.

Mr Phillips: I share with I guess all three parties in complimenting you on your earlier brief; it was a thoughtful document and I appreciate it.

I've found these hearings quite informative, because originally this bill was just going to slide right through and it was only that we thought it might be worth a couple of days of hearings to see if there were any little hitches in it. As my colleague just said, we're finding very few people who think it's going to have any merit, particularly the venture capital portion. The union movement is solidly against it, the business community doesn't seem to be particularly enthused about it, and I gather from listening and reading your document that you've got some significant reservations about the venture capital part of this.

Mr Eastman: Particular reservations on that end of it, yes.

Mr Phillips: On the employee ownership side, there seems to be much broader support for that concept, I think, among the groups we've heard from. I don't necessarily mean the chamber, but among groups. Have you any recommendations on how it can be enhanced to further the document your group presented today, how that portion of the legislation could advance the agenda the chamber has put forward?

Mr Eastman: Basically, we would like the opportunity to divide this up and look at the worker ownership aspect separately and then consider how that might be facilitated, relying less heavily on taxpayers' funds and more on what are the current barriers to that and how much of that can we help solve by clearing away, simplifying the process through all the legal roadblocks.

Mr Phillips: Has the chamber seen the latest estimate of the annual cost of this?

Mr Eastman: No, we have not.

Mr Phillips: I think it's now up to $250 million a year for the total, for the venture capital part of taxpayer—

The Chair: Excuse me, Mr Phillips. We had a correction earlier.

Mr Phillips: Did you?

The Chair: Maybe Mr Evans can repeat it. At that time I think you'd just stepped out for a minute.

Mr Evans: It was $250 million a year at maturity. In the first year, 1991, the actual tax credits were $8.1 million.

Mr Phillips: I had assumed we always look at maturity.

The Chair: Sorry I interrupted you. But your time has run out too, Mr Phillips. We'll have to go to Mr Johnson.

Mr Johnson: First of all, I want to say thank you for coming, but I found that your presentation today is rife with error; if not that, there are certainly misunderstandings or misconceptions.

You start off on one page talking about labour-sponsored investment fund corporations and in your second paragraph you talk about employee-owned companies. There's no relationship there, and it makes it somewhat difficult to follow.

You also say there should have been more imagination and it should have been possible to work within the RRSP concept. At this point in time it isn't said that it will happen or it won't happen.

But what I found most offensive is on the next page when you talk about employee ownership labour-sponsored venture capital corporations and say this will increase the financial resources and financial clout of unions. My goodness, sir, you're starting to sound like Mr Carr from the Progressive Conservative Party. We don't want to propagate that kind of misinformation, because that absolutely is not correct, and I want to make sure—that's why I'm saying it now—that it's on Hansard. This is not correct. There is no intention in this legislation to increase the financial resources and financial clout of unions. Labour-sponsored investment funds are opportunities for people—they don't have to belong to a union—to make investments that are sponsored by labour organizations in the province of Ontario. Certainly anyone in the province can do that. Anyone can invest, anyone can get the tax breaks we're talking about here if he or she wants to invest, but in no way is this going to increase the financial resources or the financial clout of unions.

With regard to employee ownership labour-sponsored venture capital corporations, these people don't have to be unionized at all if they want to invest in their business or invest in their employer's business and help maintain their jobs or their future by some kind of sound investment in the business they are already working in.

I think we've got to make sure these facts are clear. That's why I wanted to raise that.

1730

Mr Eastman: May I respond? I think one of the problems here is, yes, we do understand, as proposed, they are investments that are available to everybody, but they're only available for them to take place through the union movement. If there was a need, then it was our opinion that that vehicle should have been available on a broader basis rather than specifically through the union movement.

It was on that basis—not of how the funds flow, but the potential effective control of them—that raised the concern with us that we felt we had a responsibility to convey to you.

Mr Johnson: I am curious to know, if you could elaborate just a little more, how you think this is going to increase the financial resources and even more so the financial clout of unions when unions aren't going to benefit directly from this.

Mr Eastman: Because the funds are administered by the union.

Mr Wiseman: How's that going to do anything?

Mr Phillips: He who has the authority to make an investment often has a little bit of clout. That's common sense.

The Chair: Can I just ask for some clarification from the ministry?

Mr Evans: The investment funds are managed by the sponsor and invested accordingly. It is not the intention that the sponsoring organizations exact any sort of levy on the fund or any contribution from the fund as a consequence of their sponsorship.

Mr Phillips: The sponsoring organization is the union.

Mr Evans: Yes.

Mr Phillips: Isn't that obvious to everybody?

Interjections.

Mr Owens: Yes, but the insinuation that's coming across is that the levers of power are going to be thrust in the workers' hands.

Mr Johnson: Did you say "lovers"?

Mr Carr: I thought he said "lovers" too.

Mr Owens: Notwithstanding the mispronunciation, in terms of the unions controlling the funds, I don't see the direct relationship in what you seem to fear as some group of labour types gaining the upper hand.

Mr Eastman: I guess I'm more concerned about the extent to which all of us have limited capacity. Asking the union movement to become professional fund managers I think diverts it from other activities. In terms of the funds available, there is a question of how are the decisions going to be made on how those will be invested. There are some checks in place to ensure that there are not specific abuses, and I accept that.

Mr Owens: Look at the professionals, like Olympia and York, that follow traditional models and you're looking at the kind of catastrophic results that take place. Do you find that problematic? They're certainly not a labour-sponsored group. They're going bankrupt.

Concentration of power: Banks, financial institutions are looking at the amount of their exposure on this issue and looking at it with some concern. They're certainly not—

The Chair: Mr Owens, I'm going to have to cut you off. I know you're not going to get the answer you want back right away.

I'd like to thank you for coming before this committee with your input. Mr Evans here from the ministry can meet you out in the hall just to discuss what he was trying to get across to you on page 3 there.

Mr Owens: Good.

Mr Phillips: Just for clarification, I think Mr Owens indicated two weeks ago that he was bringing the amendment in that I think may answer the chamber's concern anyway on who will be eligible to manage the venture funds. It's going to be substantially broadened. You may have anticipated the chamber's concerns, and we'll be bringing that amendment in anyway.

Mr Owens: Not with respect to who controls the levers of power, though.

Mr Phillips: No, the Saskatchewan model I've got here. But you're bringing in the Saskatchewan definition.

Mr Owens: I didn't commit to the Saskatchewan definition. If you look at the Hansard, I wasn't able to commit on a particular model.

Mr Phillips: It should be in the Hansard.

The Chair: Okay, thank you.

The next group to come forward is the United Steelworkers of America and Mr Robin MacKnight.

Mr Sutherland: Just before we begin with their presentation, I was wondering if we could do one procedural thing, and that is get a clarification as to what we'll be doing next week and next Thursday. I believe there was some request that after all the presentations we could have staff come back in for some more questions, so some sense of maybe doing that next Thursday morning and then possibly in the afternoon looking at the specific amendments.

Mr Phillips: When will we see the amendments, by the way?

Mr Sutherland: They've already been presented, have they not?

Mr Phillips: No, the one that Mr Owens was referring to.

Mr Sutherland: I don't know about that one.

Mr Owens: I indicated at the last committee meeting that the wording is still being worked on. There are some difficulties to overcome, but as soon as the amendment is ready it will be provided to you, Mr Phillips, and your other colleagues in opposition.

To your point with respect to the Saskatchewan process, I point you to page F42 of the Hansard of May 14 of this year. It clearly indicates that I made no such commitment with respect to the Saskatchewan amendments.

The Chair: Okay, Mr Owens, would there be any amendments before Thursday?

Mr Owens: We're certainly hoping so. As I say, there are some difficulties that were in the process.

The Chair: But any that are going to be brought forward on Thursday, so that as soon as possible the members of the committee—

Mr Owens: Chair, if we have amendments, you will certainly see them and our colleagues in opposition will certainly have them. It's our intention to do that as expeditiously as possible.

The Chair: I think it would be very important.

Mr Phillips: Does that mean before next Thursday?

The Chair: This is what I'm asking Mr Owens for if at all possible, so that when staff are here, members of the committee can ask questions on the amendments.

Mr Owens: "If at all possible" is the preface I would use. If it's possible to have them here, we will have them here.

Mr Phillips: I'm sorry to take the time from the Steelworkers; maybe we can run a little bit late. But the other area that our caucus is quite interested in is the budget and just having an opportunity before we break in July or August, whenever we break, to review some of the questions that we have about the budget. If the amendments are not going to be ready for next Thursday, it may be possible—

Mr Sutherland: Are you looking at the Treasurer or the treasury staff?

Mr Phillips: Ideally, the Treasurer. You may want to talk to him. We've got three or four questions we'd like to—

Mr Sutherland: Okay, we'll do some follow-up and see whether he's willing to appear, and if not, maybe add some treasury staff then. Okay?

Mr Phillips: Great.

Mr Owens: Just a quick comment. Because of the newness of the issue here in Ontario, we want to make sure the correct wording and the best language available are coming out. So as I say, as soon as we can get the amendments here we'll certainly be pleased to provide them to you. Thank you, Chair.

The Chair: Okay, Mr Phillips, you're satisfied?

Mr Phillips: Yes, I'm happy.

1740

UNITED STEELWORKERS OF AMERICA

The Chair: Mr MacKnight, welcome to the standing committee on finance and economic affairs on Bill 150. We have a half-hour. We didn't use up any of your time there. Mr Phillips said he's going to sit until 10 after 6, so no problem. If you want to begin, leave some time at the end of your presentation for questions from the committee.

Mr Robin MacKnight: First of all, let me apologize. I have a terrible cold, and if I break down into a coughing fit it's because I've been trying to nurse this for the last several days.

My name is Robin MacKnight. I'm a partner with the law firm of Gowling, Strathy and Henderson and I've been asked to appear before this committee this evening to represent certain of the interests of the United Steelworkers of America.

I have handed to the clerk of the committee a copy of a letter which Leo Gerard, the national director of the Steelworkers, sent to the Chair of this committee this morning—I understand the original either has been delivered to you or is on its way—to express the disappointment of the Steelworkers that they were not consulted earlier in this process. In fact, we did not get the invitation to attend tonight until Tuesday, and unfortunately this week, starting yesterday and going until tomorrow, is the national policy conference of the Steelworkers and all the senior members of the union are down in Hamilton attending that conference.

Mr Phillips: I would be personally happy to invite the Steelworkers to come participate next week, if that would be helpful. I agree with Mr Gerard's letter. I think probably no one in the country has been more involved in this than Mr Gerard.

The Chair: I've just been handed the letter now from the clerk, so I haven't had a chance to read it.

Mr MacKnight: Thank you, Mr Phillips. I'm sure the Steelworkers would be happy to comply with your request, if invited again. I understand I'm the last person making a presentation tonight. I guess it's sort of appropriate that the Steelworkers make the last presentation since they were one of the first people who were not only interested in but actively promoting the concept of worker ownership about a year ago and some kind of government assistance to promote worker ownership in the Algoma Steel restructuring and worker buyout.

What I've also handed out to the clerk is a copy of the submission which the Steelworkers presented to the government back in September during the early consultative phases of this legislation. That submission was based upon the green paper draft legislation which pre-dated the introduction of Bill 150. I'm happy to report that a number of the issues raised in that submission have been addressed in ongoing consultations between the Steelworkers and various ministries in the government. Unfortunately there are still a few significant issues which have not been addressed or which do not seem to have been resolved in a practicable fashion, and I would like to address four of those this evening.

The four key points are: first, the issue of ministerial discretion; second, the operation of the advisory board; third, the type of disclosure and investor protection required for employee ownership companies under part II of the bill; and fourth, labour-sponsored investment funds under part III of the bill, and in particular the mechanics. I note that in the gallery we have representatives of a number of the ministries, and I'm sure my comments may seem repetitious to certain of them. However, we'll try them one more time.

Dealing first with the issue of ministerial discretion, the committee is undoubtedly aware that many industries in Ontario are export-oriented, and because they are export-oriented they are very concerned about the reactions of their foreign competitors. In particular in the United States many foreign competitors of Canadian industries and Ontario industries are quick to bring trade action over perceived subsidies and government interventions.

The concern the Steelworkers have is that if Bill 150 is passed in its current incarnation there is a perception that there is too much discretion vested in the hands of the minister, and there is a considerable perception of government intervention in the marketplace. In particular, there is concern that companies that try to adopt Bill 150 and use the tax credits to promote worker ownership will be exposed to trade retaliation. At least, in the context of certain transactions the Steelworkers are interested in, we have consulted trade lawyers in the US who have commented that the ministerial discretion provisions of Bill 150 could give rise to countervail action in the United States. That is a serious concern for any export industry in this province.

As is pointed out in the submission you have been given, there are a number of specific areas of Bill 150 that give the minister discretion. I understand from reading Hansard of a couple of weeks ago, the comments made by some of the staff members, that the ultimate approval process for tax credits under Bill 150 will be a cabinet order in council. When we raised the concept of a cabinet order in council being the final decision generating a tax credit, we almost had to peel our trade lawyers in Washington off the ceiling. In their view, there could not be anything clearer than a cabinet order in council as an indication that there is some kind of government intervention in the marketplace here, and that means countervails, and that means a lot of the companies who probably need worker ownership and need the assistance of this bill will not be able to access it simply because their foreign competition will take them to whatever trade tribunals are appropriate in the foreign countries. That is a serious problem with this bill, and I can't overemphasize that point.

Turning to the second point, and this one may be related to the first one, the operation of the advisory board: The view of the Steelworkers is that the advisory board should have its scope of activities limited either by the act—preferably by the act—or at least by the regulations. One of the main concerns with the operation of the advisory board is that it should not have the power to second-guess the people who are actually putting their money on the line. The advisory board should act as a compliance board. It should act to ensure that the spirit and intent of the legislation is satisfied—just in passing, I note that there is no definition of what the spirit and intent of this legislation is in the bill; that's a point that's in the submission—but the advisory board should not go beyond that. It should not have the right or the power to put its decision on whether a business plan is feasible ahead of what the investors think is feasible.

We suggest that the regulations make it clear that any business plan put forward by an employee group should be presumed to be commercially viable and that the onus on the advisory board should be to show that the assumptions underlying the business plan are not supportable, taken as a whole, and that unless they can show that those assumptions are just clearly unsupportable and clearly uneconomic, the employee proposal should be allowed to proceed.

I notice there was some commentary among members of the committee in Hansard a couple of weeks ago about why the government should have the right to approve certain businesses which may ultimately fail, and yet they could prevent investments in other businesses where the advisory board feels for its own purposes that the conditions in the act are not satisfied.

Turning to the third issue, the investor protection code, which is something that we understand is relatively controversial—that may be an understatement—the basic concern of the Steelworkers, and I suspect this has been echoed by a number of other people who have made submissions to this committee, is please don't make the system so cumbersome that it can't be made to work; please don't impose such a high level of disclosure on small companies that they can't possibly afford the professional fees to go through the process to get the employee approval.

I must say that a number of us read with some dismay the comments in Hansard a couple of weeks ago which explained the concept of a disclosure document that would have to be sent to the Ontario Securities Commission, reviewed by the Ontario Securities Commission for a full, true and plain disclosure, and ultimately receipted by the Ontario Securities Commission. To a number of us, that sure sounded like prospectus-level disclosure. Let me tell you that when you're looking at some of the small operating companies the Steelworkers have interests in or in which they're considering implementing this legislation to promote employee buyouts, if you're dealing with a small company that has 100 or 150 employees and maybe $5 million or $10 million in annual revenues, you just can't afford $100,000 in professional fees to go through a prospectus clearance process with the Ontario Securities Commission. The company just can't afford the cost of that. So please, when you're going through the regulations, don't impose a standard that is too high.

1750

Also bear in mind that many times, where the investors are the employees of a business, the employees are not ultimately, at the end of the day, making an investment decision, they're not dipping into their RRSP to say, "Where should I invest for my retirement?" Their concern is a lot more immediate than that. Their concern is, "If I don't make this investment, will I have a place to go to work tomorrow?"

Bear in mind that in many cases—hopefully not in all, because this legislation is, after all, designed to support active and profitable companies; it is not designed just strictly for bail-outs and turnarounds. Let me emphasize that the Steelworkers support that concept; they want this to work for all companies, not just turnarounds and bail-outs. But in many cases—and certainly at the implementation stage that we've seen over the last year and in this recessionary economy—where employees will participate in ownership of their employer, they will be asked to make employment decisions, not investment decisions. The disclosure document and the regulatory regime that the employees have to go through to get approval for their business plan should reflect that very basic economic fact. We're not dealing with Bells and Northern Telecoms and Norandas and IBMs here; we're dealing with small and in many cases owner-manager companies, some of them profitable, some of them borderline. They're very keen not to incur unnecessary expenses.

Just looking at the OSC process in the last 12 months, the committee may be aware of the two large transactions we're using Bill 150 for. In the Spruce Falls case they did manage to get an exemption order from the Ontario Securities Commission to approve that transaction. Unfortunately that relief was not available to the Algoma transaction, and you may be aware of two regulations under the Securities Act that had to be approved by cabinet in order to allow the Algoma transaction to proceed. There aren't too many small businesses that can afford the luxury or have the political expertise to go through a process of getting a special regulation under the Securities Act in order to allow their employee buyout to proceed.

Another point on the formal disclosure documents: In one of the proposed buyouts that is referred to in Mr Gerard's letter the employees don't speak English, and any document that is meaningful or legal would have to be sent to those employees and would have to be translated into another language. In this particular case it would have to be Portuguese. You can't mandate that, or that's going to be very difficult to mandate, in any regulation.

Instead of imposing a standard of disclosure that has to fit across the board, maybe consideration should be given to having the advisory board determine what level of disclosure is required and put that in as one of the conditions of its approval, instead of sending it to the securities commission. In the Algoma transaction there was a constant flow of information to all members of the union and to all employees in Sault Ste Marie. There were weekly newsletters, there was a phone-in show and there was a weekly talk show on television. There was a constant flow of bite-sized, meaningful and manageable information made available to the employees. It was much more meaningful and understandable than the 130-page information circular they ultimately had to approve in April. That kind of process of ensuring that meaningful information is given to employees to let them make a reasonable, informed investment decision could be made a condition of the approval process rather than building it into some regulations that don't offer much flexibility.

Finally, turning to labour-sponsored investment funds, one of the concerns the Steelworkers have expressed about labour-sponsored investment funds is who can sell them. Labour-sponsored investment funds could be a good source of venture capital for small businesses, and if the object is to get broad-based worker participation you've got to get access to the workers, you've got to get out in the place where the workers are. They're not at King and Bay. And if you try to get investment dealers to sell labour-sponsored investment funds you will find that they will hit a wall of resistance for the simple reason that the potential investors, people in the workplace, the blue-collar people who make industry work, are not used to dealing with Bay Streeters. They have a natural scepticism for Bay Streeters.

If the requirement is that only registered investment dealers are authorized to sell it, you won't find many of them in Hearst, Timiskaming, Field, Nipissing or Nipigon, but you will find people in the workforce who are creditable and credible and who are believable by the workers. Those are the people we have to access. Those are the people who should be empowered to sell securities and labour-sponsored investment funds.

We understand that in Quebec one of the key factors leading to the success of the solidarity fund is the people who can actually sell units. In Quebec, apparently, people on the shop floor—members of the union, shop stewards and so on—are authorized to sell LSIFs or sell units in the solidarity fund.

The Chair: How about you take 15 seconds and get the cough candy in there and take a sip so you don't lose your voice by the end of the presentation.

Mr MacKnight: Thank you. I'm not entirely certain who the best person is to sell LSIFs. I suggest it's still open and something that should be given consideration, but please don't restrict it to investment dealers, don't restrict it to the people at King and Bay. You won't find a Wood Gundy office or a Richardson Greenshields office in a lot of the small towns, and if you want to access capital from those small towns and if you want to get people in those towns investing in local businesses, you have to get at that capital, you have to get at those people. So please give some consideration to who in the local community should be allowed to sell those. Those are my formal remarks.

The Chair: Thank you. We'll start off with Mr Carr.

Mr Carr: I'll try and be very brief, recognizing your problem there with coughing.

Mr MacKnight: My infirmity.

Mr Carr: I'm surprised by Mr Gerard's letter. We used to have a bit of a standing joke around here that we saw more of him here for a while than we did cabinet ministers. I notice on page 1 he says, "This has left us surprised and angry." I don't know if he underlined that. Are you really saying that, through all those meetings he had with the Premier during this period of time and with the Deputy Minister of Industry, Trade and Technology, somewhere along the line somebody didn't say to him, "As a result of this Algoma situation we're planning to do such-and-such"? Is he really saying in here that he didn't have any consultation whatsoever and that this piece of legislation came in, knowing he spent literally—I saw him, because we had a bit of a joke with Mr Sorbara, who was a Labour minister during that period of time. He's saying there was no discussion. What type of involvement has he had with this piece of legislation?

Mr MacKnight: Let me first of all address the comment. I just have a faxed copy, which is what you have a photocopy of, so I don't know who made the underlining. I think the comment is the fact that the Steelworkers did not find out until Tuesday about hearings and were not invited to hearings today until Tuesday. I think that's the cause of the disappointment.

Certainly the Steelworkers have been active in consulting with the various ministries in the government on Bill 150. That process started a year ago and continued through last summer and last fall and has continued through this spring. If you talk to members of the staff they will say they've probably seen representatives of the Steelworkers almost as often as you've seen Mr Gerard in this area.

So please don't take it that Mr Gerard is disappointed that the Steelworkers have not had the opportunity to be involved in the process. I think it is directed to this particular hearing.

Mr Carr: Someone was saying the reason you didn't call him in is that he's the one who wrote it and it was his piece of legislation. That's why we were laughing.

Mr MacKnight: I don't think Mr Gerard would like to take the credit or the blame for that.

1800

Mr Carr: I understand. The second thing is regarding the situation with the US. You talked about anything that is signed by the cabinet being a trade irritant. I can't believe this government hasn't looked at it, but it's a government that has been opposed to the free trade agreement. One can say that a provincial government that can't stop a federal free trade agreement can, for want of a better word, stir up trouble with pieces of legislation.

Looking at it and knowing that the US will see this as a problem, do you think this particular piece of legislation was introduced as a means of creating some trade irritants between Canada and the US?

Mr MacKnight: I wouldn't like to speculate on that, but I would hope that was not the case. I accept the rationale expressed by the Treasurer last summer when he introduced this legislation. I think this kind of legislation is probably good for this economy. That's my own personal view, that's not any official view.

Mr Carr: Thank you.

Mr Phillips: These hearings are proving far more interesting than we thought. It was myself, I think, who wanted to have them and I thought it would be fairly routine, but so far we're running into an awful lot of major comments. Your comments really struck a responsive chord. We've been talking about the order in council, the implication being that the government is backing it. It's not just the free trade agreement, there's probably some GATT stuff involved in this.

You expressed concern about the advisory council. I'd like you to expand a little bit on that. My concern about the advisory council having the role of reviewing and commenting on and approving business plans is that there's an implication that somehow or other the government has approved the business plans, certified that they are viable, put its stamp of approval on them, and I think in the final analysis reasonable workers would say, if the thing goes sour: "Wait a minute. Six or seven years ago the government signed this thing and said it was okay. What's happened?"

That's my worry about the advisory council. It takes it out of the hands of the workplace partners who have the fundamental responsibility for it and just kind of shovels it all over to an advisory council. That's my worry about it. What's the Steelworkers' worry about the advisory council?

Mr MacKnight: I think one of the concerns—and they're probably better expressed in the submission you have there—is that there is the potential for the advisory board to look at an investment and say, "We don't think this works." That's an interesting comment for a third party to make, considering it has no economic interest in it and probably has no understanding of either the industry or the business.

One of the concerns is that in looking at a particular investment, the advisory board will ask for quite detailed financial information. Unfortunately, the only financial information that will be available will be historical information. One of the key points of worker ownership is that when the workers take control of the company, one hopes they can institute new forms of workplace participation, that they can introduce new forms of production, enhance productivity, reduce expenses and give new life to the company and point it in a new direction so that this historical information is interesting but largely irrelevant.

What the advisory board is forced to look at are the projections. They will be looking at information going forward and in some cases, it is going to be a hope and prayer; in some cases it's going to be well thought out, and in some cases it may even be possible to document some of it based on comparisons: other industries, other companies, other countries. I'm sure that's something MITT is addressing in its guidelines, but our concern is that the requirement that the advisory board focus on future activity rather than past activity be formally built into the regulations; and further that the advisory board, in looking at those projections and that future activity, not have the right to substitute its view of future events for the view of the people who are putting their money on the line.

After all, the people putting their money on the line are involved in the business. They know the business. They know the industry. They know the competitive factors. They know which products are profitable, which are not. They know which strategies work for their companies and which don't. Frankly, the advisory board is detached from that by its very nature; it is detached from any particular industry.

Mr Owens: I was interested in your comments around the investor protection code. I found the issue with respect to the newsletters and the bite-sized information to be an interesting one.

However, my question is, as counsel, what test do you use to determine where you would draw the line between what you call "cumbersome," as you describe it, and protection? My understanding of the proposals we're making through the OSC is that it's simply a well-thought-out disclosure statement, an explicit health warning. I'm not quite sure how that becomes cumbersome.

Mr MacKnight: Let me use the Spruce Falls prospectus as an example. I like to think I'm fairly adept at reading prospectuses and relatively knowledgeable about how this program works. Since I'm a lawyer, I can usually translate legalese into something that at least I can understand, and I had to read that prospectus four times before I figured it out.

A comment made by one representative of the Steelworkers when he saw that prospectus was, "You're asking me to prepare this prospectus and deliver it to somebody on the shop floor at the same time that I'm going to the Ministry of Labour and the Ontario Training and Adjustment Board to try to get funding to improve the literacy of that worker on the shop floor."

You're asking them to create a document that is never going to be read and is not going to be understandable. They're going to look at this document and say, "What does this mean?" They're going to turn around and they're going to look to somebody they deal with and believe in and who they find credible to explain what it means. Those people are going to be their peers in the workforce and whoever the promoter of the employee group is going to be.

Those people, because they're in the workforce, because they're in the community and they're trying to convince people to participate in this, are going to have a relatively significant vested interest in ensuring that their friends, neighbours and coworkers don't come back and say, "You sold me a bill of goods." They're going to try to break down that complicated prospectus and that indigestible lump of information into pieces they can explain to people in the workforce and say, "You know that reference in that document to such-and-such, this is what it means and this is how it applies." That's really what you have to get across.

You want people to make an informed and reasonable decision, but when you ask them to make that kind of a decision, you've got to give them some information they can deal with. There's no point in going through the exercise of hiring lawyers and accountants to generate a huge, beautifully worded in legalese prospectus that nobody's going to read. That doesn't accomplish the goal of the legislation.

The Chair: There are two minutes.

Mr Johnson: Two minutes may just be enough. I want to say thank you very much for coming today, Mr MacKnight, and sharing your views with us.

Mr MacKnight: It's my pleasure.

Mr Johnson: I also want to apologize—and I guess I'm going to apologize certainly on behalf of the government—for the oversight with regard to notification of the United Steelworkers of America and their participation in this process. Certainly I think it's clear that the government has worked closely with the Steelworkers, especially with regard to the Algoma situation, and I think there's no doubt we have a good rapport and certainly a good understanding and relationship.

I think it's very unfortunate that probably the most important participant in this forum, in this venue—because of the experiences that you now have—had not been invited formally to these hearings. I think that's very unfortunate. I hope that you'll take that back to Leo Gerard and let him know we are aware of that oversight.

Mr MacKnight: I'll pass that on to Mr Gerard.

The Chair: Just some direction from the committee here, and maybe you, Mr MacKnight. Mr Phillips had brought up that [inaudible] you feel that you were able to bring across enough today, or would you like to come back another time? I'm looking at the steering committee of this committee also.

Mr Phillips: I'd welcome the chance to talk to Mr Gerard. I think he's the principal in this. Presumably we'll have some time next week.

Mr Sutherland: Sure. If any of the other officials from the Steelworkers would be available next Thursday morning, I guess we start our hearings again at 10 o'clock next Thursday morning. If not, I suppose probably any time in the morning if someone's available I would be more than happy to have them come back.

Mr MacKnight: I'll be speaking with people at the Steelworkers over the next 24 hours, so I'll raise that with them and invite them to contact the clerk of the committee and try to arrange something.

The Chair: That would be fine.

Mr Phillips: I have another question on some of the comments, but I can raise them with them when someone from the Steelworkers is here.

Mr Wiseman: Could I perhaps suggest that the clerk contact Leo Gerard. As well, if you could just inform him that we're going to—

The Chair: The clerk is going to be contacting him.

Mr Wiseman: —his formal presentation with the appropriate contact.

The Chair: I'd like to thank you for appearing before the committee. I guess my apologies too, as the Chair here, that overlooked, oversighted—I know Spruce Falls was supposed to be here. Maybe that was one example we were taking a look at, and they did cancel out. My apologies go out to Mr Gerard and the Steelworkers.

The committee adjourned at 1812.

ERRATUM

No.	Page	Column	Line	Should read:
F-4	F-36	2	11	confidently looking forward to the enactment of the legis-

CONTENTS

Thursday 28 May 1992

Labour Sponsored Venture Capital Corporations Act, 1992, Bill 150	F-47
Canadian Federation of Independent Business	F-47
Linda Ruth Ciglen, director of provincial affairs, Ontario
Bill Parson, director of political action
Ontario Federation of Labour	F-51
Chris Schenk, research director
ESOP (Employee Share Ownership Plan) Association	F-56
Perry Phillips, president
David Clark, director
Ontario Securities Commission	F-60
Robert J. Wright, chair
Catherine Wade, senior counsel
Canadian Auto Workers	F-64
James O'Neil, secretary-treasurer
Sam Gindin, assistant to the president
Investment Dealers Association of Canada	F-68
Michael Mackasey, chairman, Ontario district council
Thomas Dalzell, director, Ontario region
Ontario Chamber of Commerce	F-71
Don N. Eastman, vice-president, policy
Joe Couto, coordinator, economic policy
United Steelworkers of America	F-77
Robin McKnight, legal counsel
Erratum	F-81

STANDING COMMITTEE ON FINANCE AND ECONOMIC AFFAIRS

- Chair / Président: Hansen, Ron (Lincoln ND)
- Vice-Chair / Vice-Président: Sutherland, Kimble (Oxford ND)
- *Caplan, Elinor (Oriole L)
- *Carr, Gary (Oakville South/-Sud PC)
- Christopherson, David (Hamilton Centre ND)
- *Jamison, Norm (Norfolk ND)
- *Kwinter, Monte (Wilson Heights L)
- *Phillips, Gerry (Scarborough-Agincourt L)
- *Sterling, Norman W. (Carleton PC)
- *Ward, Brad (Brantford ND)
- Ward, Margery (Don Mills ND)
- *Wiseman, Jim (Durham West/-Ouest ND)

Substitutions / Membres remplaçants:

- *Johnson, Paul R. (Prince Edward-Lennox-South Hastings/Prince Edward-Lennox-Hastings-Sud ND) for Ms Ward
- *Owens, Stephen (Scarborough Centre ND) for Mr Christopherson

*In attendance / présents

Also taking part / Autres participants et participantes:

Evans, Jim, executive director, revenue services and operations division, Ministry of Revenue

Clerk / Greffier: Decker, Todd

Staff / Personnel: Campbell, Elaine, research officer, Legislative Research Service

CA20N
XC25
-F31

ISSN 1180-4386

Legislative Assembly of Ontario

Second session, 35th Parliament

Assemblée législative de l'Ontario

Deuxième session, 35^e législature

Official Report of Debates (Hansard)

Thursday 4 June 1992

Journal des débats (Hansard)

Jeudi 4 juin 1992

Standing committee on finance and economic affairs

Labour Sponsored Venture
Capital Corporations Act, 1992

Comité permanent des finances et des affaires économiques

Loi de 1992 sur les corporations
à capital de risque de travailleurs

Chair: Ron Hansen
Clerk: Todd Decker

Président : Ron Hansen
Greffier : Todd Decker

Table of Contents

Table of Contents for proceedings reported in this issue appears on the outside back cover, together with a list of committee members and others taking part.

Index inquiries

Reference to a cumulative index of previous issues may be obtained by calling the Hansard Reporting Service indexing staff at (416) 325-7410 or 325-7411.

Numbering of committee reports

Effective with the opening of the Second Session of the 35th Parliament, committee reports and pages are numbered according to session, rather than calendar year as before.

Subscriptions

Subscription information may be obtained from: Sessional Subscription Service, Publications Ontario, Ministry of Government Services, 5th Floor, 880 Bay Street, Toronto, Ontario, M7A 1N8. Phone (416) 326-5310, 326-5311 or toll-free 1 (800) 668-9938.

Table des matières

La table des matières des séances rapportées dans ce numéro se trouve sur la couverture à l'arrière de ce fascicule, ainsi qu'une liste des membres du comité et d'autres personnes ayant participé.

Renseignements sur l'index

Il existe un index cumulatif des numéros précédents. Les renseignements qu'il contient sont à votre disposition par téléphone auprès des employés de l'index du Journal des débats au (416) 325-7410 ou 325-7411.

Numérotation des rapports de comités

A partir du début de la deuxième session de la 35^e législature, les pages et les numéros des rapports de comités sont numérotés par session et non plus par l'année civile.

Abonnements

Pour les abonnements, veuillez prendre contact avec le Service d'abonnement parlementaire, Publications Ontario, ministère des Services gouvernementaux, 5^e étage, 880, rue Bay, Toronto (Ontario) M7A 1N8. Par téléphone : (416) 326-5310, 326-5311 ou, sans frais : 1 (800) 668-9938.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

STANDING COMMITTEE ON FINANCE AND ECONOMIC AFFAIRS

Thursday 4 June 1992

The committee met at 1014 in committee room 1.

LABOUR SPONSORED VENTURE CAPITAL CORPORATIONS ACT, 1992

LOI DE 1992 SUR LES CORPORATIONS À CAPITAL DE RISQUE DE TRAVAILLEURS

Consideration of Bill 150, An Act to provide for the Creation and Registration of Labour Sponsored Venture Capital Corporations to Invest in Eligible Ontario Businesses and to make certain other amendments / Loi prévoyant la création et l'inscription de corporations à capital de risque de travailleurs aux fins d'investissement dans des entreprises ontariennes admissibles et apportant des modifications corrélatives.

The Chair (Mr Ron Hansen): The standing committee on finance and economic affairs will be looking at Bill 150, an Act to provide for the Creation and Registration of Labour Sponsored Venture Capital Corporations to Invest in Eligible Ontario Businesses and to make certain other amendments.

Last Thursday we heard from witnesses before this committee and our research officer has before you a copy of a summary of recommendations on Bill 150.

Also, Mr Gerard of the United Steelworkers of America sent a letter to the clerk here stating that the brief that was put forward by their lawyer was sufficient and that he felt it wasn't necessary to appear before this committee this morning.

Also in front of you are three amendments from the Liberals. If you take a look at the third page, it says, "government motion." Would you cross out "government motion" at the top, because this is a recommendation from the Liberal Party. It was just a typing error.

Also in front of you, marked "no. 2" with Bill 150, Labour Sponsored Venture Capital Corporations Act, government motions—there are a few more motions in here, so perhaps you can disregard number one on there and refer to number two for any amendments to the bill.

There was a lot of confusion on some of the recommendations that came from the presenters last week, and to get some clarification it was decided by the committee to have a question period by the three parties with ministry staff. It looks like we will have approximately 35 minutes for each party. What we can do is start off with the Conservatives, go to the Liberals and then to the government body. If you wind up using 20 minutes, I'll keep that 15 minutes to the end, or whatever the case may be, because sometimes you might run out of questions in the 35 minutes. Mr Kwinter, it looks like you're not going to run out.

Mr Kimble Sutherland (Oxford): When has an opposition party ever run out?

Mr Monte Kwinter (Wilson Heights): I have no idea what you're talking about. I don't understand the questions we're asking.

The Chair: There were questions of the different presenters, there were some questions on their presentations, that I believe there was clarification. We can start off with Mr Sterling. Could we have the ministry staff come up here from the ministries of Industry, Trade and Technology and Treasury and Economics? For the purposes of Hansard, would you identify yourself please?

Mr Bob Marrs: Bob Marrs from MITT.

Mr Norman W. Sterling (Carleton): Mr Chairman, this is the first time we have seen these amendments, correct?

The Chair: There are some revised amendments, I believe, at the end there.

Mr Sterling: At the end?

The Chair: Maybe, Mr Evans, you could fill us in on the additional ones?

Mr Sterling: How many amendments do we have here?

Mr Jim Evans: I believe last time there were 42. There are 48 now.

Mr Sterling: Is it your proposal to proceed by just asking questions about these particular amendments? This is the first time I've seen these amendments. Maybe I should have received them before, or I have received them in the mail but they were not brought to my attention. When did we first get these amendments?

The Chair: The original ones, on the number one copy, were a couple of weeks ago. These additional amendments just came out today.

Mr Sterling: How many additional amendments are there?

The Chair: Six amendments.

Mr Sterling: I am not prepared, quite frankly, to cross-examine—

The Chair: We're not going clause by clause on the amendments.

Mr Sterling: No, I realize that. I would prefer if the government people would just briefly go through the more significant amendments and then I would be able to ask some questions.

The Chair: That would be fine.

Mr Joe Lambert: I'm Joe Lambert. I'm with the Ministry of Revenue. I'll go over the amendments, relying on a summary of the amendments we've prepared as part of a package for use by the various ministry staff members.

The first major amendment has to do with amendments related to the formal vote of employees on proposed investment, as to whether they want to form an employee ownership labour-sponsored venture capital corporation to take an ownership position in their employer's corporation. Section 4 is the basic section. There are a number of sections. There are over half a dozen sections that are being amended as a consequence of the basic policy-related amendment.

The proposed amendment is to provide for a formal vote by the eligible employees of the business on whether to register an employee ownership labour-sponsored venture capital corporation under part II of the bill and to make the proposed investment in the employer corporation. The vote will be conducted by the Ontario Labour Relations Board after the following have occurred:

First, there has to be a review of the proposed investment by the Employee Ownership Advisory Board. Second, there has to be a preparation and distribution to the eligible employees of disclosure documents setting out particulars of the proposed investment and the business plan, investment plan and human resources plan. Third, there has to be advice provided by an independent adviser on the proposed investment.

1020

Due to the proposed voting procedures, the formal certification of the employee group that represents the employees under the act will no longer be needed, and amendments are being proposed which will delete references in the bill to "employee group." That's the cause of about six or seven amendments. They're basically filtering through the bill to delete references to "employee group."

The basic amendment that precipitates these consequential technical administrative amendments is the change to the voting procedures, which is section 4, so I would refer you to section 4 in relation to the basic amendment.

Mr Sterling: I think we had raised an objection, first, with regard to who could vote and who couldn't vote. I would assume eligible employees would include every employee of the business?

Mr Lambert: Yes. Every employee who is eligible would be entitled to vote, according to the definition provided in the act as to what eligible is.

Mr Sterling: Does that exclude anybody?

Mr Lambert: They'd have to be permanent employees, basically.

Mr Sterling: Okay. It doesn't matter whether they're management, not management, etc?

Mr Lambert: No, it doesn't matter whether they're union members or not.

Mr Sterling: They're part of the union or not part of the union?

Mr Lambert: No, it doesn't.

Mr Sterling: Was it before that they had to be part of the union?

Mr Lambert: No, it wasn't a requirement before. The basic difference, the change we've made, is that previously the way section 4 was drafted, when the vote actually occurred, all that was required was that if a majority of the union members who turned up for the vote voted in favour of the buyout, then the buyout would proceed. The amendment now requires a simple majority of all those who are present at the vote. The amendment was made to provide for a more democratic voting process.

Mr Sterling: I don't have all the questions at this point.

The Chair: Okay. Government side.

Mr Paul R. Johnson (Prince Edward-Lennox-South Hastings): We're not dealing strictly with amendments right now, are we?

Interjection.

Mr Johnson: Okay. Fair enough. I would like to just speak to the point Mr Kwinter raised in the House recently.

Mr Sterling: Could we just go through the bill or the amendments and ask questions about the particular sections?

The Chair: I understood there were just questions this morning on any parts of the bill and this afternoon it will be clause-by-clause.

Mr Sterling: It makes more sense to me to go through it.

Mr Sutherland: For the purposes of procedure, if there are specific questions on the amendments or the new amendments and we want to go through them first and then leave whatever time is left to comment on any of the issues that were raised last week, that's fine too.

Mr Kwinter: Mr Chairman, I'm sorry. As I say, it's been confusing to me as to what you are trying to do. If you're looking for general questions, I certainly have some I want to discuss, and I prefer to discuss them before the government responds. Then you can respond to my concern. When we started out I thought we were going through the various amendments and having questions on that.

The Chair: I understood that was Mr Sterling's request, to ask on some of these amendments, but I took it that it was open questions here this morning.

Mr Kwinter: The question I want to ask is the one I asked in the House, and I want to clarify that I have no particular problem with this bill. It came forward. It was supposedly a labour-backed initiative. We have three amendments, which indicates how little concern we have with it, and we were quite prepared to move these amendments and hopefully get support for them.

Where my concern is—quite frankly, I was stunned sitting here the other day when the Ontario Federation of Labour came in and the Canadian Auto Workers came in and announced that this bill is not going to have their support, that it does not address the intent of their initiative. I was the minister at the time when they came in to see me. They told me that they wanted to get the support of the government for a fund to address social matters, to be sponsored and backed by labour. I said I had no problem with that and, "If you can go out and get it organized, great," and they went ahead and did it.

Somewhere along the line—when I spoke to Mr Gindin and I said to him, "Where did this go wrong?" He said, "I don't know where it went wrong, but it has absolutely gone wrong." We have a bill that is supposed to be sponsored by labour and benefit labour and two of the largest constituencies in the labour group are saying, "Not only are we not going to support it, but we are going to actively encourage our members not to support it." If these two large groups, the Ontario Federation of Labour and the CAW, are not supporting it—there has been some discussion that they are not supporting one aspect of it but they are supporting the other. I have read through their testimony to this committee and there is no question in my mind that, by and large, they are not going to be supporting either part, the establishment of the fund and the provisions for worker investment in their companies.

So my question is, if it's supposed to be a labour-sponsored initiative and labour is not supporting it, why bother? It's no secret that when I asked the question in the House and the Premier responded, he got the impression that for some reason or other I was against this bill in principle. I sent him a note saying I have absolutely no axe to grind with this bill. If it goes forward, if labour is supporting it and it does what it's supposed to do, good luck to them. It's my own personal view that this bill is not going to accomplish what it sets out to do, but that's fine. Let them do it and if they can get the support of workers and investors, good luck to them. I wish them well.

would like to see a bill that at least provides some protection for the people who are participating, but where I have a serious concern is how you can possibly expect this initiative to succeed when the people it's supposed to benefit and the people who are supposed to be sponsoring it are saying, "We don't see any benefits and we're not going to support it."

My question to the government members is, if that is the case—and this isn't an opinion on my part, I'm just reporting what happened here in committee. I've gone through the transcripts and there's no ambiguity. This is exactly what was said. If that is the case, it would be my suggestion that this bill should be withdrawn and reworked. Get labour in and ask them, "Okay, what's wrong with this bill and what can we do to get you to support it?" and then come back and present it again. To me it is absolutely absurd that we are imposing a bill on a group that is not going to support it.

What is the purpose? This isn't a make-work project for committees. This is supposed to answer a concern and to provide a vehicle whereby labour organizations can create a venture capital fund and make provisions for their employees to buy into companies with a certain amount of protection and stability. Certainly it is meant to address their concerns and needs. If they are not supportive, and not only not supportive but are saying, "We are actively going to discourage our members from participating," again I ask the question, why bother? Let's get something that is going to serve a purpose. That, Mr Chairman, is my question.

1030

Mr Johnson: In response to what Mr Kwinter said, first of all you're premising most of your comments on an assumption that—what was it you said? You said this is labour-backed and—

Mr Kwinter: "Labour-sponsored" is the term.

Mr Johnson: Okay, labour-sponsored, and that this a labour initiative. Well, let's get one thing straight. This is not a labour initiative; this is a government initiative, and it allows an opportunity for more than just those people who are labour or unionized to invest—

Mr Kwinter: On a point of order, Chair: The title of the bill says "An Act to provide for the Creation and Registration of Labour Sponsored Venture Capital Corporations." It's not my interpretation.

Mr Stephen Owens (Scarborough Centre): It is more than just a person who carries a union card. A worker is a worker is a worker, whether he's unionized or not.

The Chair: Okay. Let Mr Johnson reply to it.

Mr Johnson: I understand what the title is. The title in itself could be open to interpretation, but what in fact the bill says is something else. We've had the CAW and the OFL come in here with some concerns certainly, but their concerns may be based on the fact that they expected that labour would have more involvement than in fact it has.

I'm saying that the LSIFs are opportunities for more than just labour to invest in business. It allows people outside of what you're suggesting to invest in business. Some of their concerns suggest that maybe this legislation doesn't go far enough, based on their assumptions of what this legislation should be. Obviously it's something different from what they think it should be and that's why they have some concerns, but the OFL supports the employee ownership labour-sponsored venture capital corporations; they have some concerns with the LSIF part. The United Steelworkers support the concepts of worker ownership in Bill 150. I think that was clear from their presentation.

For you to come before this committee and say that labour is opposed to this, holus-bolus, I think is wrong. That's not how I heard it. I certainly did hear some concerns. I can't refute that, but I think there is a lot of support from labour, and I think the focus of this bill isn't on labour. This is not a labour bill. This is a bill that allows for investment in small and medium-sized businesses in the province, and not investment from just labour but from people who have capital they would like to invest. To suggest that it's exclusive to labour and that it was a labour initiative is wrong.

Mr Kwinter: I think your whole statement is absurd. If that is the case, then I would suggest you change the title, because I can read as well as you can and the title says it is labour-sponsored.

Interjection.

Mr Kwinter: Just a second. It's a labour-sponsored fund. If two of the largest components in the labour movement are not going to support it, how do you expect an outsider to support it? To suggest that this isn't just a labour-sponsored bill—then I suggest to you that you change the title of it, because to any uninformed potential investor looking at this it says "labour-sponsored."

You can give me all the interpretations you want. To say to me it doesn't necessarily mean it's labour-sponsored even though it says it is labour-sponsored is absurd. It's either labour-sponsored, which it says in the title of the bill, or it isn't. It would seem to me that it's a non-starter if the bill says right in its title that it is labour-sponsored and labour says—not all of labour: "We are not going to sponsor it, and we're going to discourage our members from participating." I think you have a problem.

I want to reiterate that I have no axe to grind. If that hadn't happened, if they had come forward and said, "We think this is great, we are supportive of it and we would encourage all committee members to support it," I would have said, "Wonderful." But that isn't what they said. My concern is that this thing is going to happen from a legislative point of view, but it's not going to happen from a practical, economical point of view because it's not going to get the support of labour. If labour isn't supporting it, again I say, why bother?

Mr Johnson: I hear what Mr Kwinter says, and I just have to say I disagree with him. I know there were some presentations made by labour here, and I think it's clear they had some concerns, and indeed that's what you're suggesting. I don't think that all labour or all labour representatives are opposed to this. I think even those who are opposed see some merit in some aspects of this bill. To suggest that this be withdrawn in its entirety I think is inappropriate. I think it has a lot of merit and I think it has a lot of support within the labour movement, quite frankly.

Mr Sutherland: I don't believe we had the Canadian Federation of Labour in but certainly we had the working capital ventures fund, which I believe is the arm they've set up to deal with the issue; if I'm wrong please correct me. Certainly there's some sense that members of the Canadian Federation of Labour and their Ontario components have some support for this bill.

If I go back to the comments from the Steelworkers, I didn't think the Steelworkers expressed strong disapproval of it. They had some ideas where there should be some changes. Certainly the Steelworkers, also a significant union and labour group in this province, have expressed support for the initiative of labour-sponsored ventures and employee ownership. So there are elements that did express some concerns, that they weren't as supportive because, as Mr Johnson said, it didn't go as far as they want it to. But there are certainly some other significant elements out there that are supportive.

Mr Bernard Grandmaitre (Ottawa East): If I can follow up on my colleague's concern, if the two largest unions in this province are not supportive of this legislation, can we find out from the government who supports this type of legislation? How many groups or individuals were part of the creation of this bill?

The Chair: We'll go back to Mr Sutherland again.

Mr Sutherland: I just said some of the people who are supportive of it. The OFL as an overall umbrella group made its comments that it has some concerns because it doesn't deal with the question of democratizing the workplace. To suggest that all its affiliates will follow that is not necessarily the case, given the fact that the Steelworkers have said they're supportive of this type of initiative; they're an affiliate of the OFL as well. So there are some elements that are supportive and there are other elements that don't see how they can benefit from it.

Mr Sterling: Can I get on a different tack and ask some other questions here?

The Chair: Yes.

Mr Sterling: Do you want to stay on that?

Mr Johnson: I have just one point to make to follow up on some of the comments and arguments. In response to Mr Kwinter's concern, I want to say too that Mr Kwinter did say this was supposedly labour-backed. Those were his words.

I also wanted to say that there's also been some concern about only labour having been the sponsor of this. In the amendments I think you will see that worker cooperatives are also being viewed as a group that will have an opportunity to be a sponsor of this program under this bill. I just want to make that point so it isn't lost or so it isn't missed.

The Chair: We have one reply from Mr Sutherland.

Mr Sutherland: No, I want to ask a couple questions of staff members.

The Chair: Do you want Mr Sutherland to go first, or would you like to ask your question first, Mr Sterling?

Mr Sutherland: We've got lots of time. Go ahead.

Mr Sterling: Thanks, Mr Sutherland. I understand there would be a little embarrassment on the part of the government because of its close affiliation with the trade union movement, but I don't know whether that's totally irrelevant to whether this investment vehicle is offered.

At any rate, during some of the presentations, particularly by the Ontario Securities Commission, and a number of other submissions, I raised the point as to the backstop for the investor in terms of the employee ownership labour-sponsored venture capital corporations; in other words, where there's a buyout. If Spruce Falls doesn't work, if Algoma doesn't work, my concern was, when we have the government putting the stamp of approval on the investment—in fact, I think there has to be an order in council passed in order to indicate that approval—is there anything in the act that I'm missing which outlines the obligation of the government on failure?

Mr Marrs: I think the regulations or the disclosure document will have what is called in Securities Act parlance a health warning that will relate to the non-assumption of any liability in relationship to the securities offered.

1040

Mr Sterling: My greatest concern is the plight smaller communities in particular will be put into in terms of the plight of the worker, who will not only be encouraged to invest but will now be enticed to invest because we are giving him or her some financial incentives to invest. The OSC, if I recall correctly, said there should be a clear indication in the legislation what the obligation of the government was; in other words, there should be a clear indication in here that if the investment fails, the investor cannot come to the government and look for compensation.

Have you considered that kind of section? I think it's key to this whole legislation. Mr Wiseman, who was here at the last hearings when we discussed this, indicated he considered it caveat emptor. I want it emphasized totally as to what the obligations of the government are. I don't think whether my party was in or their party was in or any other party that they would let the thing fall completely apart; I think that's a political decision. But if we're dealing with investment decisions then I think the investor should know what the legal obligations are. There is no legal obligation in here for the government to bail out if it goes down?

Mr Marrs: No, there's nothing specifically in the draft.

Mr Sterling: So no obligation, no section in here indicating that.

Mr Marrs: No. I think where that gets addressed, to the extent it gets addressed, will be in the disclosure document and the health warning.

Mr Sterling: Can I ask another question?

The Chair: Ms Farrell might be able to respond to your question a little bit better.

Ms Julie-Luce B. Farrell: You know we are currently working on draft regulations; they haven't been tabled and what not, so we're developing this as we're going along. As far as I understand, the health warnings that are currently being developed go much more to the risks. It's a warning as to the risk these investments carry. There's nothing, as far as I know, going to the government's liability or lack thereof, so far. Nothing has been provided in terms of direction to us to draft this.

Mr Sterling: I'd be interested to hear from the parliamentary assistant. Is there any consideration in a policy point as to whether or not there should be some statement of obligation or understanding with the investor what this stamp of approval by the government means.

Mr Johnson: There isn't anything specific, but I think we have to stress, as with any investment, that it's as you said: caveat emptor, buyer beware. That goes along with any kind of investment one might make. With the Ontario Securities Commission, when you're dealing with that kind of investment, within the act there is an avenue or there is a way people can get a health warning on how their investments might be affected. Within this legislation, within Bill 150, that would be the place to put any substantive regulation that would guarantee that, but there is no expectation that the government is liable for any of these investments. I think it becomes just an issue of buyer beware. But maybe Joe Lambert or—

Ms Farrell: I could read into the record the proposed health warning, and that would give you some indication of how this is going to be structured. The statement is supposed to be in bold print, and it will read something similar to: "No securities commission or other securities regulatory authority in Canada has in any way passed on the merits of the securities offered in this disclosure document, and any representation to the contrary is an offence. Neither the Ontario Securities Commission, the Employee Ownership Advisory Board under the Labour Sponsored Venture Capital Corporations Act, nor any other department or agency of the government of Ontario assumes any liability or obligation to any person proposing to purchase the securities offered hereunder."

This is not settled language, but that's the direction in which we are aiming in the proposed code.

Mr Owens: In terms of the regulations the OSC is working hard to prepare, I think that draft language answers your concern. I think the problem we're struggling with as members of the committee is, what is the process that's going to lead up through the valuation process and the kinds of tests that are going to be applied? I gather it will be the Ministry of Industry, Trade and Technology putting together the valuation process. To me, that would be where the question would lay as to what tests of viability are going to be employed.

I think we've all recognized, especially with the employee ownership option within this bill, that we're not just talking about somebody investing in Maple Leaf Gardens or whatever. We're talking about communities, we're talking about homes, we're talking about people's entire savings, so I think perhaps we should be taking a look at the process prior to where the OSC kicks in. The OSC can draft the regulation and the health warning with respect to the caveat emptor provision, but I think before we get to that point there needs to be a fairly clear and precise process of valuation. I certainly have a question with respect to that as to where we are on that.

Mr Sterling: With regard to Mr Johnson's trying to paint a similarity with the present OSC dealing with a normal prospectus on companies, there's a major, major difference here. A person promoting a company doesn't have the strength when he's promoting that company of saying, "The Ontario government has given this a stamp of approval." As I see it, the way these shares are going to be marketed is on the basis of there's a prospectus, "And in addition to the prospectus we're giving you something else. We're giving you the stamp of approval of the Ontario government through its employee ownership board." That's the way it's going to be seen, Paul, regardless of whether you like it or not. There's going to be a government regulation through order in council saying that this is a good investment.

Second, when you're dealing with a prospectus in terms of a normally marketed corporation, in general you are dealing with people who have invested in other shares as well. If you want to call it more sophisticated with regard to the risks, they've probably won on some and lost on some, and therefore they view it as a caveat emptor kind of situation; in other words, "I put my money into this new corporation. I've won on some and I've lost on some, and therefore I may lose on this one."

Third, you're dealing with an emotional decision on the part of the investor as well as a financial decision.

All of those point to an investor putting in the money on the basis of other than an experienced financier putting his money up and expecting a return. Therefore I think it's incumbent, in terms of the legislation, to protect that investment to the realities of what he or she is doing.

1050

Mr Owens: Don't underestimate the sophistication of the person who might be involved with this within a company.

Mr Sterling: I guess I'm trying now to protect the weakest of them all.

Mr Owens: There may be issues with respect to language and things like that, but that's an issue we're looking at dealing with. But we shouldn't undermine or underestimate the sophistication of individuals who are out there in the workforce. If we reflect on some of the recent spectacular business failures of the sophisticated investor that we've seen, I think there's good reason to be concerned about that as well.

Mr Sterling: I only have the experience of going through the Re-Mor/Astra Trust fiasco where people put up their life savings without asking the very basic questions, "Where is this money going?" and "What guarantees do I have?"

Mr Owens: In terms of the kinds of commonsense questions one would ask, how does one legislate common sense? This is again where I make my comments on the valuation process. It's my opinion that that process is the linchpin in the whole bill in terms of developing the viability. I'm confident in what the Ontario Securities Commission has developed as a regulation and as a health warning. But the linchpin is valuation, and the people who are marketing particularly the LSIFs are acquainted with the process and are able to communicate those processes to the potential purchasers.

The employee ownership stuff, as you quite accurately point out, is a whole different ball game. There's a whole different process that needs to take place around that.

Mr Sterling: I think the OSC was very skittish about it. They don't want anything to do with this if they can get away from it. I think that's the bottom line of all this. We're co-opting them into it. We're saying, "You're not only going to have a prospectus, Mr Investor; you're going to have a prospectus plus this," which is a stamp of approval. If you say that to the investor, then I think the warning to the investor, in fairness, has to be more than the normal warning you would have on the front of a prospectus when you're reading.

Mr Evans: I think the Ministry of Revenue does have some operational experience in relation to these issues. They derive from the administration of the Small Business Development Corporations Act from the early 1980s. In that case, we paid grants to the investors. In this case, it is a question of tax credits. But the communications plans for the small business development corporation administration and for the worker ownership administration will both emphasize that the intent here is that the government is sharing the risk with the individual investors and is not making its own investment in the corporation. So it is directly to the investors. The purpose of the grants and the payment is limited to that point.

We've been working within that framework now for some 10 years. Although there are obviously examples where people have lost considerable amounts of money and they inquire of the ministry, the position of the government has always been in relation to the administration of both grants and tax credits that we are sharing the risk and we are making payments directly to investors to do so. We're not doing it into the company as a question of defending or underwriting liability of the company.

Mr Sterling: I think the analogy is that there are significant distinctions to be made in terms of the type of investment we're talking about in these two vehicles.

The Chair: We'll go on to Mr Sutherland.

Mr Sutherland: Mr Sterling said that, you know, you're saying it's a good investment. I think what you're saying is that it's a calculated risk; that it's met some basic criteria but there's always still that risk element there and it's not an outright endorsement or a guaranteed return on the type of investment that's going on here.

If I could change tack for one minute, I want to ask some questions, or at least one question, about some of the testimony we heard last week, particularly the Canadian Federation of Independent Business testimony. They indicated to us in their presentation that they thought it was—I think they used "almost deceptive" to say this could benefit small and medium-sized business. They seem to think that because of the way it was set up and the different processes you had to go through, it would not be feasible for small business. I'm not sure what definitions they're using for small business.

I was wondering if you could comment. If we used the MITT model, which I believe is 100 employees or less, as the definition of a small business, how would you respond to their claim that small business will not be able to take advantage of this?

Mr Lambert: The purpose of this vehicle is basically as a venture capital vehicle and venture capital investment principles are going to apply. It's not true venture capitalism because of the element of tax credits and government incentives being provided in that manner, but venture capitalist investing principles are going to apply and commercial investment principles are going to apply.

When a labour-sponsored investment fund type of venture capital corporation is investigating whether or not a particular small business is a viable target, it may indeed preclude consideration of some of the small businesses that are members of that federation, the 80,000 to 90,000 members.

Just by the nature of the investment style of venture capital corporations, the size of the investment they have to make to make it worthwhile, to make it commercially viable for them to get the kinds of returns they want, a lot of the small businesses simply are going to be too small and won't warrant consideration. The average investment by venture capital corporations is somewhat in excess of $500,000. If you measure small businesses in terms of just simply employees or if you measure small businesses in terms of the size of the capital that's already there, $500,000 investments from venture capital companies are going to preclude a lot of them from being considered.

We don't have a stratification of the small businesses that make up the CFIB, but there's no denying that a labour-sponsored investment fund with a particular kind—it depends on the investment strategies they develop. There may very well be labour-sponsored investment funds that have a strategy which entails investing in companies that do indeed penetrate down to the level of the much smaller small businesses that form part of the CFIB. That remains to be seen. Where we could anticipate different kinds of labour-sponsored investment funds that will have varying kinds of investment strategies, that may very well indeed penetrate those lower levels, those smaller businesses.

Mr Sutherland: But if you take the MITT definition, is there a potential for a company with fewer than 100 employees to take advantage of this and still be somewhat viable to go through this process?

Mr Marrs: The only point I'd make of the Working Ventures target companies—I think there were two there and Joe would have the details—but my recollection is that those were at the small end of the scale. They were nowhere near the $50 million in total assets and weren't anywhere near the 500 people, but I don't have the exact numbers on it.

1100

Mr Evans: As further amplification of what my colleagues are describing, we are not able to influence the objectives of the venture capital funds themselves. What is important in the structure of the act is that we don't provide structural impediments, within the act and within the regulations pursuant to the act, that actually prevent or make it less attractive for a labour-sponsored investment fund to make an investment in any particular part of the segment.

I believe, in terms of the description of the regulations or the investment code, that it is the intention to be sufficiently flexible so that the protection that is provided is appropriate to the size of the company or the sector of the industry involved. We are going to be most careful not to introduce structural impediments but that does leave, as my colleagues have shared, the question of the investment objectives of the individual funds.

The Chair: Mr Lambert, did you want to reply to that?

Mr Lambert: No.

The Chair: I thought someone else was going to have a reply down there.

Mr Lambert: I was reading.

The Chair: Oh, okay. I was just looking to the left and I thought it was Mr Lambert who had a reply. Yes, sir.

Mr John Whitehead: I'm John Whitehead from Treasury. I might just add to Jim Evans's comments that there are a good many small businesses, by our understanding, that may well be members of the CFIB that are two-, three-, four- or five-person operations, often in the retail sector. One of the major policy objectives of this program was of course to generate funds to permit businesses to restructure and reinvest and preserve and create jobs.

A good many businesses probably won't be seen as viable targets by venture capital investment funds, but there will be a good many small businesses that will. I suspect they will be in small manufacturing or processing operations, specialized fabricating and things like that perhaps as opposed to retail, which does compose a good chunk of the small business sector. But as Jim said, there is no structural impediment. They can invest in whatever they see as appropriate.

Mr Kwinter: I want to get back to Mr Sterling's comments about a recourse statement. He mentioned the same case that I mentioned in previous hearings that is sort of etched indelibly in my memory because I suffered with it for a couple of years. That was several years after it happened and it just didn't go away. I was picketed everywhere I went.

The Ombudsman even took up the case and made a recommendation that cabinet should in fact compensate these investors. Cabinet refused to do so and then the Ombudsman, in one of the rare opportunities, tabled it in the House.

What happened is that these people felt they had invested in a trust company that had been regulated by the Ministry of Financial Institutions. They felt that the Ministry of Financial Institutions had an obligation to make sure that company stayed viable. When it failed they felt that the government was responsible. The Canadian Commercial Bank in Alberta had exactly the same thing and the federal government bailed that one out to the tune of $1 billion.

When Robert Wright, the chairman of the Ontario Securities Commission, was here, he said, and I quote: "I do not want to be taken as saying that I see a need for recourse for the investors, because I think that is very much a matter for the people who set the policy and who pass the legislation to decide. All I meant to say was that I think it should be clear whether or not there is recourse."

I suggest to you, given the unique situation where the investment is going to be scrutinized by an advisory committee, it's going to go to a vote and then it's going to go to the cabinet for official approval, just that act of having every single one of these proposed venture capital investments or employee buyouts go to the cabinet for approval is going to present a potential problem, because there are going to be unsophisticated people out there who, through peer pressure, whatever happens, are going to be convinced that this is a way for them to save their jobs or this is a way for them to do something.

They are going to invest their hard-earned savings, and—God forbid, and I don't wish any of these to fail—if it should fail, you are immediately going to be confronted by someone saying: "What's going on here? I invested my hard-earned money. The government approved it. I was under the impression, and I don't care what you tell me about the fine print, that I was going to be protected."

I think the general health provision disclaimer is not good enough. I think there should be a specific reference to the fact that notwithstanding cabinet approval, notwithstanding all these things, there is no obligation on the part of the government as to the long-term viability and the financial security, so at least some poor minister in the future will be able to take the thing out and say: "Look, there was a specific provision that says we have no obligation. I feel very badly that you lost your money, but we as a government have no obligation."

As I say, for someone who lives through it—it was a decision not of my making, but I still had to suffer the thing and I'm just trying to prevent that from happening in the future. We've got an amendment we're putting forward, but I would like to get your comments as to where the problem is with that.

Mr Whitehead: I'd like to focus on one aspect of the process. I'm not familiar with the case you're discussing, I think thankfully, but the Employee Ownership Advisory Board is there not just to help the government make a decision about its propensity to provide a tax credit in respect of a specific situation, it's there as well to provide a process for employees to have to go through to learn exactly what they're getting into. The provision of human resources investment and financial plans for the proposed takeover is going to be quite a rigorous exercise, we expect, and one that may well turn a number of people off early in the game.

Early in the process of coming up to the decision about whether to invest one's money or not, a number of people may look at this and say: "Gee, you know, it's going to be awful tough. It looks awful risky." Part of the hope of the Employee Ownership Advisory Board is that people will be well aware going in, because of the demands that board will place on them, of the difficulties they may face in concluding a deal.

The other thing I think I would point out is that these deals could go forward anyway. The only real thing at issue here is whether a tax credit is provided in respect of the investments made. The government is not proposing to say, "You may not conclude this particular deal." The government is saying only, "You may conclude this deal with the benefit of a tax credit," or without. In that sense I think it's different than the kind of situation you were talking about.

The Vice-Chair (Mr Kimble Sutherland): Any additional comments from any of the other staff members?

Mr Marrs: In terms of the process, I can talk to that a little bit. I wouldn't want to minimize the fact that a government body passes on it. Certainly the concern you raise is valid. The board or the minister would not intend to communicate directly to the employees as part of this process, and I guess it would be a misrepresentation, an offence, for the promoter group, the insiders of the employee group, to represent that it had passed. But clearly the language will be there in the event of a failure, and if you were the employees who lost and you were looking for a recourse you might well look to government if you thought you could make a case.

1110

Mr Sterling: Can I just have one more comment? I guess one of the reasons I feel so strongly on this is that, as I see it, it's a fairly complicated process. You're going to involve large deals, but basically they're going to be, as I see it, not where employees are taking over a really profitable corporation but where corporations are in trouble. I would like it to be otherwise, but there's going to be an impetus for those people to be first in line.

So you add all of these things up and you say: "Gee, there's got to be some additional warning or understanding to the investor that the government's part is the 20% incentive that it's giving. That is our risk. If you lose your 80%, don't come looking to the government."

That's a harsh statement to say, but whether it's in bold red—I'm not sure how you do it—or the minister phones every investor or just what, but there's got to be some method of going above and beyond what we normally have seen on prospectuses in terms of risk. I don't know if you have any other suggestions as to how you could—

Mr Marrs: That's a fair comment. I guess I would add that there is a provision for an independent adviser who will, independently of us and independently of the promoting group, meet with the employee investors before they make an investment decision. That will be after there's a receipted disclosure document. It will be their job, to the best of their abilities, to make sure the deal is well understood and the risks are well understood.

Mr Gerry Phillips (Scarborough-Agincourt): I will pursue that same line. I thought the Steelworkers made a very good presentation to us last week. Their strong advice to us incorporated a couple of things. One is that they said it's wrong to set up this advisory board. The role of the advisory board is to register an opinion that the proposal is reasonably commercially viable over the period covered by the proposal and is equitable to the employees in the circumstances. The Steelworkers said that's wrong; that shouldn't be done by a government advisory group.

The second thing the Steelworkers told us was that we are setting a trap for disputes with other governments by having orders in council approve these employee purchases. Their lawyers in the US have already gone to whatever the appropriate US federal authority is and have been told that if, for example, the Algoma arrangement had been signed by an order in council, it would be subject to various trade restrictions. I'm wondering why we wouldn't take the advice of the Steelworkers, who I think perhaps have the most experience with this, and rethink this particular proposal.

Mr Marrs: There are two points there, the establishment or non-establishment of the board, and I think Mr Kwinter made that point a couple of weeks ago. I interpret the Steelworkers to say there should be a board but they shouldn't turn anything down. That was my interpretation of their position.

Mr Phillips: No, that isn't what they said.

Mr Marrs: Those were my notes. I guess that was a decision made by cabinet—and maybe others can speak to it—but certainly I'm sure that decision of a board or no board came up and probably it turned on the issue of the unique nature of these investments.

Mr Phillips: And the second point?

Mr Marrs: On the countervail issue, I think they had a legal opinion from a law firm in the United States that clearly pointed to the order-in-council section of this act. I'm not an expert, but I'm not sure that's any different from what the development corporations do in terms of getting approval for a number of their loans. They get orders in council. I think, in terms of countervail, the issue it turns on, the first was: Was there a benefit given? Clearly if the Steelworkers or other groups got tax credits, they received a benefit. Second, is somebody harmed and does he lodge an action? So I think it's wrong to think you somehow escape the countervail because you have ministerial discretion or you don't, if a factor's of significant benefit in the case of Algoma.

Mr Phillips: So you have a legal opinion that says the Steelworkers are wrong?

Mr Marrs: I do not have a legal opinion.

Mr Phillips: The government does, though?

Mr Marrs: Not that I'm aware of.

Mr Lambert: I think Mr Marrs's suggestion was that the Steelworkers had the legal opinion from a firm in the United States, a countervail specialist.

Mr Phillips: Yes, but I'm just assuming that the government has developed a similar legal opinion that says they're wrong.

Mr Lambert: I don't know that we specifically addressed their legal opinion.

Mr Phillips: But surely an important element of this is, will we be subject to countervail by the government?

Mr Lambert: The principle of whether something's subject to countervail revolves around how focused the government assistance is. In this case the government assistance is generally available to any group of employees in any kind of business that decides to pursue an employee buyout. It's not sector-targeted, it's not industry-specific, it's not firm-specific; it's generally available. My understanding at the time the policy was being formulated with respect to that particular issue was that as long as you're dealing with incentives that are generally available there's less likelihood countervail will be a problem. But there's also the consideration that regardless of whether there's specific government assistance being provided to an industry or to a business or whether there's just a perception of government support, countervail will occur anyway. In other words, an action will be taken first and the facts will be ascertained later. In a lot of cases the facts aren't necessarily relevant; it's the perception.

To summarize here, I think the Steelworkers were particularly sensitive to the threat of countervail because they're in an industry which is very sensitive to that sort of thing, so they had particular concerns. But as I said, if countervail revolves around government support of a general nature, then that's what we have here. It's a tax credit that's available to employees in any business or industry who decide to pursue a buyout. That would be the defence. We would rely on that principle and we would suggest that we had fulfilled that principle in that respect. It's a generally available program that has general application.

Mr Phillips: Can I pursue this, Mr Chairman? The steel people, who, to repeat myself, have more experience, say, "Listen, we want to use this vehicle for additional employee buyouts, and this"—I think these are the words they used—"is a serious problem with the bill." Why we would want to proceed to incorporate a serious problem without having a legal opinion that says it's not a serious problem perplexes me.

The second thing is that I think they were saying that the role of the advisory group shouldn't be to approve everything but that it should be different from this advisory group. I don't think there's any doubt that if I were an employee and I'd exercised the right to buy my company and five years from now I got these minutes that said, "What was the role of the advisory group," and it was to determine that it was commercially viable and equitable to the employees in the circumstances, I wouldn't hesitate. Again, I would welcome what legal opinion we've had on what protection the government has, but I would say: "Listen, you put your stamp of approval on this thing as being commercially viable. It's gone down the tubes and I've lost all my money. I'm holding you accountable for it."

1120

Mr Lambert: That stamp of approval, as you put it, isn't really a stamp of approval in that sense. All that's happening is that a group of representatives from three sectors of the province—labour, business and government—are looking at an investment proposal based largely on projections, suppositions and assumptions and, relying on that and their knowledge of the industry that particular business happens to be in, are trying to arrive at a conclusion as to whether or not there's commercial viability. That's not necessarily an approval and not necessarily implicit of a guarantee that in the event the business fails the government is liable to replace the investments.

It seems to me that whether or not this program is there, whether or not there's an explicit liability, if a business fails, with this program being in place or not, the government has liabilities that are existent anyway. The employees would be able to avail themselves of that general government support.

Mr Phillips: Of course.

Mr Lambert: I just wanted to make that point, and while I'm on a roll here, I just wanted to suggest that one of the points of the program, particularly on the employee ownership side, was to try to encourage more worker participation.

Also, because of the nature of the program, there's a certain amount of capitalist principle involved. If the employees don't have a real financial commitment to the investment, that will affect their decision. Employees going into one of these deals know they're on the line, net of the tax credits that are being provided, net of the incentive that's being provided, and that will hopefully encourage them to perform the due diligence that any capitalist would undergo in deciding whether or not to make the investment. Therein lies the essence of the decision. If you impose a government guarantee or an explicit government liability if the investment fails, it seems to me it'll distort the investment decision.

Mr Phillips: You don't have to sell me on the importance of employee—I ran companies and all the employees owned them. I had a small position, and all of my employees, all the people who worked with me, owned it. I'm committed to it, I believe in it, but in my opinion, as the Steelworkers said, let the employees figure out whether it's viable or not. In my opinion, don't have a government agency that is going to be the overseer of this thing and say whether it's viable or not. There will be degrees of viability, and I have complete confidence that employees have the wherewithal to understand the risk they're taking. There may be some instances where a third party would say, "Frankly, we've got some concerns about whether that is commercially viable or not," but the employees may say, "We can make it go."

It's not a question of convincing me of the importance of employee ownership; it's who should have the responsibility. I'm just saying I think the Steelworkers made a fine presentation of saying, "You should put the onus on the workplace partners to make that determination, not some bureaucracy at Queen's Park that is going to make that determination."

I think the Steelworkers said there should be somebody who says they have met the criteria of the regulations so that they've fulfilled it, there's been complete disclosure to the employees, they understand exactly what's happening. But to put a stamp on this as commercially viable by somebody outside the workplace, I just have real questions.

The government has the votes, the thing is going to proceed, and it's probably a bill that one has difficulty opposing, but I thought—I'm repeating myself, Mr Chairman—the Steelworkers, who know this stuff, make good points, and we've chosen to go against the recommendations.

The Chair: Mr Sutherland.

Mr Sutherland: I'm sorry; I don't have a question right now.

Mr Johnson: I'd just like to add a few comments with regard to the investor protection question. I know Mr Kwinter made a quote from Mr Wright of the Ontario Securities Commission some time ago, and I'd like to quote Mr Wright again. It's with regard to employee ownership and investing in companies and protection features:

"They are investor protection features and I would go so far as to say that in my view, and this is a personal view, they are more appropriate and better than the requirements in the existing Securities Act when applied to these kinds of purchases of securities."

I think he would be an expert in securities and investor protection and I think that comment has some merit. He's suggesting that within this bill there are a number of features that would amount to significant investor protection leading up to that point in time when the decision is made whether the particular company is expected to be, with reasonable expectation, commercially viable.

Of course, I just want to reiterate that a part of what offsets the risk, and it's only a part, is the tax credit and I think that's already been mentioned.

I recognize that some of my colleagues in the opposition have been around here longer than I have and undoubtedly have more experience. I've heard what Mr Kwinter has had to say and I respect his experience and the situations he's been in within his ministry when he was minister. I recognize that there have been some problems in the past and it may be that in the past there wasn't the significant protection that was required to ensure investments were secured and there was adequate protection.

The Small Business Development Corporations Act, I guess it was from 1979, certainly has allowed for investments that have gone awry, I might say, and presented some problems with regard to securities of investments.

I think also that as we've been speaking about the guarantees or protection one should have under the circumstances, I believe you've been talking about some of your concerns that have to do with funds on deposit and depositors in institutions. What we're talking about now is equity positions and I think there's a difference there. All the avenues this bill has made available with regard to the research: the fact that there is a business plan, a human resources plan, a feasibility study; there are independent advisers; MITT has an advisory board and review board; the Ministry of Revenue has some involvement; the Ontario Securities Commission will administer provisions of Bill 150; there's a health warning.

I think after all these are taken into consideration, surely if something did not have a reasonable expectation of being commercially viable, it wouldn't go forward. It wouldn't get that stamp of approval, I would think, so it wouldn't become a problem. It wouldn't become problematic at some point later on. Those things that appear to have a marginal, or whatever, expectation of success, I guess, may get that stamp of approval. What I hear is, you're suggesting that every single company is going to get the stamp of approval and that would suggest that even companies that can't be expected to be successful will get cabinet approval and I think that's wrong. I think that—

Mr Sterling: You just proved our case. You've absolutely just proven our case, Paul, by saying—

Mr Johnson: Absolutely?

Mr Sterling: Yes. What you have said is that they won't give approval to anything that could fail. That's what we're arguing; that's how the guy in the street is going to interpret it. You've interpreted exactly—

Mr Johnson: No, in my opinion, you're misinterpreting what I'm saying. I'm saying that the things that appear to have the best opportunity for success would be approved, once it's taken through this complete scenario that I've just laid out for you.

Mr Sutherland: If you remember the comments earlier about "a good risk," I think that's the way—you need to keep in mind—it's a good risk based on some commonly accepted process; the evaluation processes and those types of things. But again, no guarantee.

1130

Mr Kwinter: I really think you've missed the point. I have no quarrel with all of that. What I'm saying is that once it's all done and the matter—it could be the greatest investment going and then it fails after all of this. Then somewhere along the line there is going to be some disgruntled investor who is going to say: "All these wonderful things that you've just told me were in place and failed. You didn't do your due diligence, because why did it fail?" I can tell you that in the environment we're living with right now, six months ago if anyone had suggested Olympia and York was going to be in trouble, it would have been unheard of. All I'm saying is here's an opportunity to put a provision in this bill that just makes sure the government isn't liable.

But I want to get back to another thing, because I now have found the transcript. We are talking about labour support. You and a couple of the members on the government side were saying they didn't approve of some things, but generally they were in support. Mr Gindin said, when he was asked about this, that he was "more interested in stopping it and getting it changed." This is the bill. This is the assistant to Bob White, the president of CAW, who says that his interest in this bill is stopping it and getting it changed.

Right after him, Mr O'Neil, who is the secretary-treasurer of the Canadian Auto Workers, said: "If you're asking whether, if this happens to pass, we will encourage, in fact we'll discourage workers and will lay out what we think are the consequences of investing in this program. So we will not be supportive; there's no question that at the end of the day we will not be supportive of this bill if it gets passed."

That isn't sort of maybe on the one hand and maybe on the other hand. They're saying, "We are not going to support it; we are not going to encourage our members to participate." That surely has to send out some kind of signal that maybe we should take a look at this thing and do something to get the support of the people who were supposed to be sponsoring it and who are supposed to be the major beneficiaries.

The Chair: Mr Owens, you had your hand up for a response. Or did you have a question?

Mr Owens: In terms of the liability issue, frankly I don't think we'll ever be able to protect or keep that one disgruntled or group of disgruntled former shareholders from claiming they have been misrepresented or that they felt they were investing in something that was viable and then failed and that it's the responsibility of the pedlar of the security or the person doing the valuation. I just cannot think of any way you could possibly do that in any investment. You're a person who has been in business for a long time and the Minister of Financial Institutions. I think you clearly understand that in terms of that person who feels he or she has been wronged, you're never going to be able to prevent that.

I think in terms of the language again, with respect to the warning that Julie read earlier from the OSC, it says clearly, "No securities commission or other securities regulatory authority in Canada has in any way passed on the merits of the securities offered in this disclosure document and any representation" etc." That's draft. That's looking to be strengthened.

On the next draft is the suitability for investment: "The securities offered hereunder may be highly speculative in nature and may not be a suitable investment, applying the usual investment criteria and having regard to income, net worth, age and source of investment funds of the investor." How much plainer can you get?

Mr Johnson: I would just like to make a point. Maybe we could conclude the back-and-forth bantering we have over this concern and tell Mr Kwinter and Mr Phillips that the government is prepared to accept your first amendment to section 6, which would, I think, alleviate some of your concerns.

Mr Phillips: That's a start, and that's fine. I'm just saying that the Steelworkers came in here last week and made a strong pitch. You've chosen to ignore it, and all of what you've said earlier just reinforces our concern.

Somebody five years from now will get the Hansard out and say: "When was that hearing? It was assured that MITT would look at the commercial viability, the advisory board would look at the commercial viability etc." The Steelworkers are saying to us: "Listen. That's not the right approach. You should put the responsibility in the hands of the workplace parties to do that, not in the hands of some bureaucracy down in Toronto to do that. We're going to be handcuffed if we want to work with one of our locals on buying out one of our operations, because if it's got to meet all those criteria, it ain't going to meet it."

We're all prepared to take a risk. It may not be commercially viable. We're prepared to take a risk, and they're telling us, "You're going to handcuff us." I'm just saying that if you want to do that, you've got the power to do that, but you may undermine what I think the Steelworkers saw as the objective.

Mr Sterling: Could I move to another one of the amendments of the Liberals? I'm not even sure in accepting the amendment that's going to—I mean, that says something in the statute, but I'd really like some warning bells to the investor. But let's go on to something else.

Under one of their amendments, the last amendment, which I consider to be the most important one and the one I have a great deal of empathy with, that is, the employee organization definition, we have heard that the government is willing to include workers' co-ops. Therefore the previous objection we once heard in this committee with regard to the fact that the federal government had not agreed to give its 20% to any expanded definition of an employee organization falls by the wayside, because worker co-ops are not included within the federal program. Therefore we're creating two stages here of labour-sponsored venture capital plans. On the one hand, if it's put forward by a union, the investor gets 40%. If the workers' co-op puts it forward, we get 20%. I think those were the old figures. I don't know if those are the same figures now or not.

The Liberals have put forward an amendment which I understand comes from the Saskatchewan legislation, which includes three kinds of groups that may participate, a trade union, an association of trade unions or an association of employees that is not a trade union but that is recognized by the employer of the employees as a representative of the employees. I would assume that the third one would include workers' co-ops, as I would read it. What is the objection to the expanded definition?

The Chair: I think Mr Evans can answer that.

Mr Evans: I'm not sure I can answer that question directly, but I can provide some amplification of the question of the 20%. The 20% is the provincial tax credit. The question of whether there is a matching 20% federal tax credit remains untested at this time. There are other provinces with definitions that provide for investment co-ops or co-ops of some kind or another to establish investment funds, but to the best of my knowledge, none of those has yet has been instituted or carried forward so we would understand whether in fact the federal government would provide a 20% matching credit. It's simply unknown to us at this time.

Mr Sterling: That's fine. I hope they can get the extra 20%, but I assume that the inclusion of the word "co-ops" is done on a basis that it's not assured that you're going to get the 20%.

1140

Mr Evans: Broadly speaking, we believe that using the definition of "worker co-op" within Bill 150 at least has some parallels as to the spirit and intent of the legislation. It would be our hope that the federal government would consider the matching credit and we think that "worker co-op" broadly describes a position that is not inconsistent with the original bill.

Mr Sterling: I now have the corrected Liberal motion—

Mr Phillips: The latest version.

Mr Sterling: —the latest version, which includes the trade union association non-profit corporation—I guess there are two additional here—"all of whose shareholders are employees of the same employer; or any other association of employees or class of association of employees that is prescribed in the regulations." What's the objection?

Mr Sutherland: At this time I'm not sure exactly what they are. Maybe Mr Owens can comment. If not, maybe we can get back to you this afternoon and give you some more response to that, okay?

Mr Owens: I would appreciate that. I don't even have a copy of the newest version of your amendment. Perhaps I could get a copy.

Mr Phillips: Neither of them are dated, so I apologize for that, but it's essentially the Saskatchewan model that—

Mr Owens: The quick response is that in terms of the tax credits, they're apparently for the expanded version that you folks are putting forward. There are no matching tax credits available. I'll double-check that and we can discuss it this afternoon.

Mr Sterling: We know that. What we're saying is, why be bothered with that. What's the difference?

Mr Owens: If we bothered with—

Mr Sterling: No. Why is it matching? What's so pervasive about the argument that there have to be matching federal—we don't know it for sure in terms of worker co-ops, which you've already agreed to.

Interjection: It makes it more attractive.

Mr Sterling: It makes it more attractive for the investor, but if somebody can set one up with less financial attractiveness to the investor why not let him?

Mr Johnson: It's an interesting comment that Mr Sterling raises. I think that if a worker cooperative were to set up some kind of LSVCC, then not being as attractive may suggest that there wouldn't be the interest to invest. Part of the risk, again, is offset by the tax credit, whether it be an Ontario credit or a combination of both. I recognize your point as a valid point but we'll get back to you with regard to that.

Mr Phillips: I want to make sure everybody has the right copy, so before I leave here—

The Chair: Is that the one that says "government motion" on the top?

Mr Phillips: Not yet.

The Chair: No, there was a typing mistake. I asked everybody to strike out "government motion."

Mr Phillips: Okay, and just by way of background, this is essentially the one that's in Saskatchewan, which was one of the earlier groups. Originally there was some objection by the government, I gather, to include anybody who didn't currently qualify for the federal matching tax credits. But as my colleague said, it's fairly clear now that this is not going to be restricted because the co-ops, as I understand it, currently don't necessarily qualify and that the government's said that's no longer necessary.

What's heightened our sense of urgency on it, I guess, is that the Premier has talked about this as being an important tool in the economic renewal, although there was some confusion the other day in the House. I don't think the Premier understood this bill as well as some others do. But now that the Ontario Federation of Labour has said it won't participate in it, it seems we're going to be fairly restrictive in terms of the numbers of organizations that will manage the venture capital funds. So it seems, as I say, that the sense of urgency may have been heightened a little bit in not restricting it just to unions to be able to run the venture capital funds. There may be some other employee groups that would want to step in and fill the breach.

Mr Sutherland: He's making a comment, in terms of the Premier saying it's an important plank. I think what we've said is that it is a plank of economic renewal. It's one of the tools that make it more available. You've wondered about the restrictions on those who haven't tax credits, and we've said that we will take that and try to get back this afternoon with some more additional comments as to whether there are further objections still.

The Chair: Any more questions?

Mr Sterling: Just on the other Liberal amendment, is there any comment that you'd like to make on it at this point in time?

Interjection.

Mr Sterling: Okay. Fine.

The Chair: Fine. The committee will adjourn until—

Mr Sutherland: Mr Chairman, just before we do that, on another point of business, Mr Phillips last week requested to see whether the Treasurer would be able to appear before this committee before the end of June. Since Mr Christopherson was away last week, I took the initiative and talked to the Treasurer. He verbally has given some indication that he'll try to make an appearance here. That may be on the last day that the House and the committee are sitting.

Mr Phillips: You mean the end of July or early August?

Mr Sutherland: I'm going on the basis of the schedule of June 25.

Mr David Christopherson (Hamilton Centre): Dreaming.

Mr Sutherland: He's given verbal assurance, if we can work it around his schedule, that he would be willing to appear before the committee.

The Chair: Okay. This committee is adjourned until 3:30 and we'll be going through the clause-by-clause.

The committee adjourned at 1147.

CONTENTS

Thursday 4 June 1992

Labour Sponsored Venture Capital Corporations Act, 1992, Bill 150 F-83

STANDING COMMITTEE ON FINANCE AND ECONOMIC AFFAIRS

- Chair / Président: Hansen, Ron (Lincoln ND)
- Vice-Chair / Vice-Président: Sutherland, Kimble (Oxford ND)
 - Caplan, Elinor (Oriole L)
- *Carr, Gary (Oakville South/-Sud PC)
- *Christopherson, David (Hamilton Centre ND)
- *Jamison, Norm (Norfolk ND)
- *Kwinter, Monte (Wilson Heights L)
- *Phillips, Gerry (Scarborough-Agincourt L)
- *Sterling, Norman W. (Carleton PC)
 - Ward, Brad (Brantford ND)
 - Ward, Margery (Don Mills ND)
- *Wiseman, Jim (Durham West/-Ouest ND)

Substitutions / Membres remplaçants:

- *Johnson, Paul R. (Prince Edward-Lennox-South Hastings/Prince Edward-Lennox-Hastings-Sud ND) for Ms Ward
- *Owens, Stephen (Scarborough Centre ND) for Mr Ward
- *Grandmaître, Bernard (Ottawa East/-Est L) for Mrs Caplan

*In attendance / présents

Also taking part / Autres participants et participantes:

Evans, Jim, executive director, revenue services and operations division, Ministry of Revenue
Farrell, Julie-Luce B., senior policy analyst, policy and planning branch, Ministry of Financial Institutions
Lambert, Joe, legislative specialist, small business development corporations program, Ministry of Revenue
Marrs, Bob, manager, employee ownership, Ministry of Industry, Trade and Technology
Whitehead, John, senior budget adviser, Ministry of Treasury and Economics

Clerk / Greffier: Decker, Todd

Staff / Personnel: Campbell, Elaine, research officer, Legislative Research Service

F-7

F-7

ISSN 1180-4386

Legislative Assembly of Ontario

Second session, 35th Parliament

Assemblée législative de l'Ontario

Deuxième session, 35^e législature

Official Report of Debates (Hansard)

Thursday 11 June 1992

Journal des débats (Hansard)

Jeudi 11 juin 1992

Standing committee on finance and economic affairs

Labour Sponsored Venture
Capital Corporations Act, 1992

Comité permanent des finances et des affaires économiques

Loi de 1992 sur les corporations
à capital de risque de travailleurs

Chair: Ron Hansen
Clerk: Todd Decker

Président : Ron Hansen
Greffier : Todd Decker

Published by the Legislative Assembly of Ontario
Editor of Debates: Don Cameron

Publié par l'Assemblée législative de l'Ontario
Éditeur des débats : Don Cameron

Table of Contents

Table of Contents for proceedings reported in this issue appears on the outside back cover, together with a list of committee members and others taking part.

Index inquiries

Reference to a cumulative index of previous issues may be obtained by calling the Hansard Reporting Service indexing staff at (416) 325-7410 or 325-7411.

Numbering of committee reports

Effective with the opening of the Second Session of the 35th Parliament, committee reports and pages are numbered according to session, rather than calendar year as before.

Subscriptions

Subscription information may be obtained from: Sessional Subscription Service, Publications Ontario, Ministry of Government Services, 5th Floor, 880 Bay Street, Toronto, Ontario, M7A 1N8. Phone (416) 326-5310, 326-5311 or toll-free 1 (800) 668-9938.

Table des matières

La table des matières des séances rapportées dans ce numéro se trouve sur la couverture à l'arrière de ce fascicule, ainsi qu'une liste des membres du comité et d'autres personnes ayant participé.

Renseignements sur l'index

Il existe un index cumulatif des numéros précédents. Les renseignements qu'il contient sont à votre disposition par téléphone auprès des employés de l'index du Journal des débats au (416) 325-7410 ou 325-7411.

Numérotation des rapports de comités

A partir du début de la deuxième session de la 35^e législature, les pages et les numéros des rapports de comités sont numérotés par session et non plus par l'année civile.

Abonnements

Pour les abonnements, veuillez prendre contact avec le Service d'abonnement parlementaire, Publications Ontario, ministère des Services gouvernementaux, 5^e étage, 880, rue Bay, Toronto (Ontario) M7A 1N8. Par téléphone : (416) 326-5310, 326-5311 ou, sans frais : 1 (800) 668-9938.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

STANDING COMMITTEE ON FINANCE AND ECONOMIC AFFAIRS

Thursday 11 June 1992

The committee met at 1009 in committee room 1.

LABOUR SPONSORED VENTURE CAPITAL CORPORATIONS ACT, 1992

LOI DE 1992 SUR LES CORPORATIONS À CAPITAL DE RISQUE DE TRAVAILLEURS

Consideration of Bill 150, An Act to provide for the Creation and Registration of Labour Sponsored Venture Capital Corporations to Invest in Eligible Ontario Businesses and to make certain other amendments / Loi prévoyant la création et l'inscription de corporations à capital de risque de travailleurs aux fins d'investissement dans des entreprises ontariennes admissibles et apportant des modifications corrélatives.

The Chair (Mr Ron Hansen): This morning's business will be amendments to Bill 150, An Act to provide for the Creation and Registration of Labour Sponsored Venture Capital Corporations to Invest in Eligible Ontario Businesses and to make certain other amendments.

MINISTRY OF REVENUE

The Chair: This morning we have the minister, the Honourable Shelley Wark-Martyn, starting off. She has until 10:30. She has another engagement and will be leaving us at 10:30. Would you like to make your comments, Minister?

Hon Shelley Wark-Martyn (Minister of Revenue): I am pleased to be given the opportunity this morning to reflect on the public submissions we have heard so far and to move into clause-by-clause consideration of Bill 150.

I would like to begin by saying that I have monitored the committee process with interest. A number of insightful and interesting comments have been raised by both presenters and committee members. Although there have been some criticisms of parts of the bill, on the whole comments have been useful and positive. Some of the suggestions put forward have been adopted and are reflected in amendments which will be considered during clause-by-clause. One such example has been the decision to allow worker cooperatives to form labour-sponsored investment funds.

Before we go on, I would like to respond briefly to a few points which have been raised.

In relation to the question of support for the bill which was raised by Mr Kwinter in the House, I would like to make note of the strong support from labour for the concept of worker ownership and venture capital investment contained in Bill 150.

The United Steelworkers of America union in particular has been very much in favour of the concept and, with the restructuring of Algoma Steel in Sault Ste Marie, is embarking on one of the largest and most innovative experiments in worker ownership in North America.

The Canadian Federation of Labour is very supportive of this bill. The CFL, as you know, has sponsored the Working Ventures Canadian Fund, a nationwide venture capital fund which in Ontario alone raised over $28 million in new capital for investment in Ontario business. It is my hope that their investments, and others, will help to encourage good ideas and new businesses in our economy.

A number of presenters that have appeared before this committee, including the Ontario Federation of Labour and the Canadian Auto Workers, have expressed some reservations about the labour-sponsored investment fund side of the bill while supporting the concept of worker ownership. Both the CAW and the OFL endorse a rather different type of worker investment than that contained in Bill 150.

I would also like to emphasize, in response to some comments that have come forward, that the labour-sponsored investment funds were designed not just to benefit or encourage the participation of organized labour. The LSIFs will be sponsored by labour; they are designed for the participation of all working people and all Ontarians in the economic regeneration of our province.

I would finally like to address concerns that have been expressed, particularly by members of the opposition, that persons investing either in their own company or a labour-sponsored investment fund will feel that because it is a government-sponsored program the government is guaranteeing the investment. There is of course no such thing as a guaranteed investment in these situations, and this must be recognized, especially by investors. The government's responsibility, as members have noted, is to protect the investors to the maximum extent possible while at the same time disclosing the very real risks investors are taking.

I believe both of these imperatives are well served by the many checks and balances in the investor protection regime in this bill. Both LSIFs and worker ownership ventures will be required to undergo a rigorous process of approval and will have to fulfil ongoing disclosure requirements. Most important, the risks investors are taking will be fully described to them.

In fact, the substantial tax credits are offered as a partial offset against the risks investors take in these types of investments. On the LSIF side of the bill, units in the funds will be sold by registered dealers who are required to point out to clients that investment in funds providing venture capital is considered a risky investment. On the worker ownership side of the bill, so-called "health warnings," or large, upfront warnings, about the investment are a requirement under the investor protection regime.

The bill has been carefully constructed to help foster the process of economic development in this province. The bill is not a bailout program and it is not an ill-conceived bonus scheme. For each government dollar spent on tax credits, $4 of individuals' money will be invested. I believe that is good value, and the money will be going where it is needed in the economy.

It is important to recall that this bill is not a cure-all for all the ills of our economy but will be very useful in certain situations and sectors of the economy. It is one of this government's first initiatives designed to encourage economic renewal and it is an example of this government's commitment to developing real partnerships among business, labour and government. This strategy will help the province to emerge from the current recession in a strong and more competitive position to respond to the economic challenges of the 1990s and beyond.

Mrs Elinor Caplan (Oriole): You mentioned Algoma in your opening remarks. It's my understanding and belief that this bill does not reflect the Algoma model at all. I was surprised that you would use the Algoma worker ownership plan as an example of organized labour support for this bill. Could you explain why you would have done that?

Hon Ms Wark-Martyn: The Algoma Steel workers and the union people were very much a part of why this bill was created and a part of our economy that was missing for workers who wanted to get involved in the workplace. So although they are not now using this plan, they are still very supportive and were very much a part of the concept of having this sort of plan in Ontario's economy.

Mrs Caplan: Given some of the negative comments from some of the organized labour union leadership about this model—we've had some of them say they would not recommend this to their membership. I think the fact that the Algoma solution is not the solution at all suggests that perhaps you've got a different picture from the one you've tried to present to us this morning. If this is such a good model, why was this not the model that Algoma chose to use?

Hon Ms Wark-Martyn: I think you're referring to some of the comments that were made by some of the presenters as they came forward to the committee. My understanding from talking to them was that there was one part of the bill, the labour-sponsored investment funds or LSIFs, which they did not agree with, and at this time they have no reason to need or to have access to that part of the bill, but they were in favour of the worker ownership part of the bill, of which they are very supportive. Hence, that's why their comments were made. We still feel and I still feel that it's a bill that can be used by companies if they need to use it, and it's accessible for them now to use it.

Mrs Caplan: I was also pleased to hear your comments regarding the opportunity for participation, and I'm assuming that what you've said has implied that you will be supporting the amendment we're putting forward regarding the definition of employee organization. I note that the government amendment you have tabled still includes other organizations of employees or class associations of employees that are not either co-op or worker ownership, and I'm hopeful that perhaps you've reconsidered and will allow the amendment to go forward that would include other organizations and associations that are capable of sponsoring this kind of plan, so that they're not excluded.

Hon Ms Wark-Martyn: We've decided not to allow that amendment, and maybe, Jim, you can explain the technical reasons for that.

Mrs Caplan: No. I don't want the technical reasons; I want the policy reasons. The minister's here and I'd like the minister to explain why this is only going to be available to organized labour and co-ops.

Originally the policy pronouncement we heard from the government was so that it would be compatible with the federal government. We know that what's in place in Saskatchewan and British Columbia is a broader definition. We're very supportive of worker ownership and believe the sponsorship of these plans should be available to organizations who have the capability. There may be many that are not within the definition of co-op and worker ownership, and I don't understand why, from a policy point of view, you're excluding them. I'd like you to explain that.

Hon Ms Wark-Martyn: The decision not to include them would be the Treasurer's under the policy. My role is to implement the policy as set out by the Treasurer.

Mrs Caplan: Minister, you are a member of the cabinet that made the policy decision here at committee. As you defend your legislation, I'd like you to explain your policy decision to us. It's the government's policy decision, not the Treasurer's, and you're a member of the government.

Mr Kimble Sutherland (Oxford): I don't know whether the member for Oriole would like an answer or not. We're going to have an answer provided and—

Mrs Caplan: Yes, I would like an answer, Mr Sutherland, from the minister as to the policy of the government. I don't want a technical, bureaucratic analysis of the bill. What I want to hear from the minister is defence of her policy.

Hon Ms Wark-Martyn: The decision was made that worker co-ops and unions could have a different interest than when you get into associations. You don't know what you're getting into for associations. They can have broader mandates. They could have different interests within an association; hence, the decision was made that we would accept worker co-ops and unions into this legislation. That was the policy decision and that was the reason for that decision.

Mrs Caplan: Were you aware of the experiences in Saskatchewan, where this is open and available to other organizations?

Hon Ms Wark-Martyn: My understanding is that there was no experience of that sort in Saskatchewan.

1020

Mrs Caplan: Given the fact that that is the situation there, it seems to me that the policy decision, which is exclusionary, is not in the public interest in Ontario. I'm wondering whether you felt there might be some benefit for Ontario to have a compatible definition with other jurisdictions such as Saskatchewan.

Hon Ms Wark-Martyn: My understanding is that Saskatchewan does not also have that definition you are describing, and the advice of my staff agrees. If you have different information and places where you see it's been tested and worked and is part of legislation, we can deal with it then, but our understanding is that it has not been tested and used in Saskatchewan.

Mrs Caplan: I believe the amendment that has been put forward would make this legislation compatible with other legislation in other jurisdictions in Canada. The opportunity for other associations or organizations of employees or class of associations that could prove they were able to provide the infrastructure to participate in this legislation it seems to me would be in the public interest and not as exclusionary as your policy decision seems to be. If you're really committed to worker ownership and participation and there is an association of employees or a class association and this is going to further enhance their opportunity, I have some difficulty understanding your policy development process that would exclude. I would think you'd want to make it as broad as possible.

Hon Ms Wark-Martyn: No, you don't want to make it as broad as possible, especially if you know it hasn't been used or experienced in any other place in the country. You want to go with some of the programs you know have worked with unions and cooperatives, rather than expanding a program into all areas without knowing and being able to consult with anybody else across the country who has had experience with associations becoming part of the process. That hasn't happened. Therefore, if it does happen we will then be looking at it, but we're not going to jump in with both feet knowing that experience is not there anywhere else in the country.

Mrs Caplan: Again, I would argue that in fact the opportunity is there in other plans. In other words, this amendment is permissive and would allow for that development, whereas in order for that to happen in the future under your legislation would require a legislative amendment and change, which would hamper that kind of development. Ontario has always taken positions of leadership in this country and, as I say, there are other jurisdictions where legislation is in place which is permissive and would allow for that, in my view, appropriate development to move ahead. It seems to me very short-sighted of your government to not at least have that opportunity available in the legislation without the future cumbersome process of requiring legislative change.

Hon Ms Wark-Martyn: We're not prepared to include that amendment. From talking with the other provinces, they've stated yes, it is there, but no one is coming forward or is asking to use it, so there is no need for it. They also could not tell us the impact that would have on the rest of our programs if we allowed smaller entities to become involved.

Mrs Caplan: I think it's very short-sighted of the government at a time when you're moving forward with the kind of legislation that may—as this is new anyway in the province of Ontario—may enhance opportunities which have not been available to this point in time. To make it exclusionary, only for organized labour, only for big unions, only for those who have the ear of the government, and for co-op workers—I am pleased that at least you have opened it that far—I think is a misguided public policy and not in the interests of the people of the province of Ontario. Many other organizations—associations of employees and class associations—may have an interest in this at some point in the future, and you've placed a barrier and a roadblock to their participation by requiring legislative amendment before that could even be considered. It seems to me to run contrary to Ontario's policy development position in this country, and I'm very disappointed that you've taken that misguided and short-sighted point of view.

Hon Ms Wark-Martyn: I must clarify. Under the employee ownership part of the bill, any group of employees can become involved. They don't have to be unionized or part of a union organization. Any group of employees can become involved.

Mrs Caplan: But they must do it through a labour-sponsored plan, a union-sponsored plan.

Hon Ms Wark-Martyn: Not under employee ownership, no. Only under the labour-sponsored investment fund, yes. Under the employee ownership part of the bill, no.

Mrs Caplan: And the labour-sponsored investment fund is the part you are excluding: any other organization or association. You are saying only unions and only co-ops.

Hon Ms Wark-Martyn: That is so we could get the same credits the federal government also gives to the unions and the co-ops. That's why we have done that. We also feel that to expand it to allow anybody, we'd then be getting the criticism from the opposition that we are allowing anybody to make investments and get the tax credits, and we can't afford to do that as a province. Going into this kind of economic initiative, we feel we are going to go along with other jurisdictions and with the federal government on the tax credits.

Mrs Caplan: Thank you, Mr Chair.

The Chair: Any other questions of the minister? I would like to thank you for coming to the committee this morning.

Hon Ms Wark-Martyn: Thank you.

The Chair: I guess we're ready for clause-by-clause. Mr Kwinter.

Mr Monte Kwinter (Wilson Heights): No. I wouldn't mind repeating the question I asked yesterday. I was waiting for the minister to be in the House for the last couple of days and she unfortunately wasn't there, so I didn't get a chance to ask her.

I've had this discussion with the Premier and I had it with the Minister of Labour. I want to emphasize that I am not in any way trying to be critical, obstreperous or anything else in this bill. I came into this committee quite prepared to support it because I felt that labour was supporting it. You can see that we as a caucus have put forward three amendments, relatively few amendments. Most of the amendments are government amendments.

I ask the same question: If this bill, which is called a labour-sponsored venture capital bill, does not have the support of the Ontario Federation of Labour in one of its aspects, does not have the support of the Canadian Auto Workers in both of its aspects, we now have the then-president or still president of the CAW becoming the president of the Canadian Labour Congress saying, "Not only are we not supportive of this bill, but we will actively discourage our members from participating."

So my question is this: If this bill is intended to be labour-sponsored and to be for the benefit of labour members and they are not supportive of it in their organized institutions, how can you possibly expect that this thing is going to have any takeup? We have quotes from the CAW saying that hard-earned money of workers should not be put at risk in these kinds of proposals. We have the Ontario Federation of Labour saying in convention, "We do not support this." If this is meant to be for their benefit and they are not supportive of it, then surely there's got to be something wrong with the vehicle, and we've got to go back and redesign it. Surely there has to be a move to say, "How can we get labour to buy into this thing?" because if they don't buy in, who is going to buy in? It's a labour initiative, and organized labour is saying: "We don't want any part of it. It's not what we wanted. It's not going to serve our purposes and we're going to discourage our members from participating." I would be very interested in hearing what the minister has to say about that.

Hon Ms Wark-Martyn: The Canadian Federation of Labour, the only large labour organization to have actually set up an LSIF, is very much in favour of the legislation.

Mr Kwinter: That was under the old president. There is a new president who is opposed.

1030

Hon Ms Wark-Martyn: Their fund, Working Ventures, has been extremely successful and raised over $28 million in Ontario during the last RRSP season, as I believe the committee heard when they presented here. The worker cooperative movement is very much in favour of the LSIF concept and plans to make use of it as indicated by John Brouwer to the committee. The Canadian Federation of Independent Business' own statistics indicate that access to capital is deemed to be a serious problem by almost a quarter of its members, and these members do not include the many people with innovative and potentially viable business ideas who were not able to enter the economy because of lack of access to venture capital.

The structure of the labour-sponsored investment fund was largely dictated by existing federal legislation in order to receive matching tax credits. The motivation for offering tax credits is both to make the investment more attractive and to better offset the risks to investors.

The OFL and the CAW are certainly entitled to their views, but it should be noted that their proposal for a social investment fund has rather different objectives than LSIFs. The LSIF program is one of general application, not designed to benefit any sector in particular but to assist Ontarians to invest in all emergent sectors of the economy. Any Ontarian can invest in LSIFs and claim the tax benefits while participating in Ontario's economic development.

Mr Kwinter: Can I make another observation before we leave this?

The Chair: We have one problem. The minister has to leave right at 10:30 sharp. I said that at 10:05; that's why we started.

Mr Kwinter: Maybe the minister can leave and I'll just make my comments to the committee.

The Chair: Fine.

Mr Kwinter: One of the problems I have with this concept is that if it doesn't have the wholehearted support of labour, what it becomes is a vehicle for evading taxes as opposed to a vehicle for creating a labour fund.

We had a similar situation when the federal government brought in its fund to provide incentives to invest in research. Immediately the accountants and the lawyers got hold of it and said, "Here's an opportunity for us to set up deals that in effect will give you some tax credits." What happened was that we found there were many proposals, many vehicles registered as research-driven funds, but no research got done. The only benefit was that people got tax credits. What you had was a whole series of—the only word I can use to describe them is "vehicles" because they weren't actual companies—these dummy corporations that were set up, their purpose being to invest in research. The people got tax credits for them, no research was conducted, and finally the federal government just scrapped the whole thing and said it was a scam.

My concern is that that is exactly what can happen in this; that if you're saying, "Labour doesn't have to participate, anybody can," the first thing that's going to happen is that the accountants and lawyers are going to get together and say: "Hey, here's an opportunity for you to shelter some income. Here's an opportunity for you to get some tax breaks. We are going to set up some kind of vehicle, we'll go through all of the motions getting it approved and everything else, but nothing is going to happen with it."

To my mind, the key ingredient is that it's got to have the basic support of labour. They're the ones who are going to have to initiate this thing in the real sense. If it's just going to be sham projects put together by people just to get the tax breaks, we're going to have some problems.

Again, I want to emphasize that I have no criticism at all with this initiative. I just have a concern when I hear that labour's not supporting it. I would suggest that there might be some merit in sitting down and saying to them, "How can we make this thing so that it's attractive and we can get your wholehearted support?" Because it's going to need it. The government is not going to be able to go out there and stimulate this investment; labour's going to have to do it. I think it's very important that that happen.

The Chair: Maybe Mr Evans could make some remarks. I think we had in committee last time, if I remember right, that where the investment was coming from or how much was invested—if you invested $5,000 what it's worth after eight years, and if people bought Canada savings bonds how much they would have after eight years; that the length of time you stay in here was sort of a credit up front, in order that over the period of time it would be a safe investment and you wouldn't actually lose money. If you don't mind, Mr Evans, I think there was one—

Mr Jim Evans: That was part of the CAW presentation, as I remember it. They had a crossover point where, beyond eight years, it was their belief that the yield from the other traditional instruments would be equal to or possibly better than. But within the eight-year period—and the redemption under the act is a five-year period—then there was a benefit to the labour-sponsored investment strategy. We have not proofed those tables, but on the surface they do appear to be reasonable.

The Chair: I don't know if that's answered your question, Mr Kwinter.

Mr Kwinter: No. That just highlights my concern that accountants will look at these various programs and say, "If you stay in this thing for five years, you'll get a better return on it from the tax break point of view than you would if you went into a traditional investment instrument." My concern is that this legislation could be used to drive tax breaks as opposed to doing what it's supposed to do, that the whole raison d'être of the thing gets totally distorted and the only people who are using it are people who look upon it as a vehicle for getting some tax breaks as opposed to doing what it's supposed to do.

Mr Evans: There's a very challenging design feature that we have to address, and I think it has been addressed in part from your colleague this morning.

If the question of eligibility in terms of sponsorship is broadened and we do not have a basis of experience in operation, then there is a risk that as administrators we are faced with the issues you're describing. One of the benefits of maintaining a relatively narrow base of eligibility is that if there are so-called operators out there who want to create imaginative schemes that are going to have the tax credit as their primary beneficiary, then they are going to have to find a sponsoring group which is an association or federation of cooperatives or labour organizations before they can in fact bring forward that proposal. It is the sponsoring group that has to bring forward the proposal.

The possibility of broadened eligibility does allow for other smaller, relatively ad hoc groups being formed, ostensibly for other purposes but primarily for the purpose of benefiting from the tax credit.

Our desire is to have an administrative structure, at least until we've gained some experience with the administration of the act, which avoids those issues, and the relatively narrow definition does help in that respect.

Mr Stephen Owens (Scarborough Centre): I appreciate the comments of Mr Evans, because I think they provide, along with Mr Kwinter's comments, a perfect counterargument for the expansion of the definition as was requested by the member for Oriole. I would agree with Mr Kwinter that the scientific tax credit scheme was an unmitigated disaster and that little or no research and development was actually carried out, and ultimately the taxpayer was shafted.

However, I don't think there's a basis for comparison between this program and the scientific tax credit fiasco, and I think we've discussed this during the time I've been substituting on this committee. The difference is when people are looking at investing their life savings and weighing: "Will we lose our homes now, will we lose our livelihoods now? Or can we somehow save the plant"—as was done in Kapuskasing and in Sault Ste Marie—"or are we going to let it die?"

1040

In terms of the labour support, I'd like to make an observation: Knowing what we know about the plant in St Catharines and perhaps what may happen in Oshawa and what will happen at the Scarborough van plant, I seriously doubt that, should this legislation become law and the workers at any of the plants I've described decide they want to pursue an employee ownership buyout, the CAW will stand in their way. I have my serious doubts about that.

The OFL has some reasonable concerns with respect to social and labour screens, but I think in terms of the LSIF portion it's up to the administrators of the fund to ensure that these types of principles are held intact. I think that ultimately it's the drivers of the LSIF who should maintain their trade union principles and not invest in businesses that go out of their way—I know Gary Carr is going to have a stroke—to conduct anti-worker or anti-democratic campaigns against their workforce.

I can't see the comparison between the scientific tax credit fiasco as I've described it and this program. I think your concerns provide a perfect counter at this time to the argument that we should expand the definition. We share some of those concerns, and until we have a level of experience to draw from, we're interested in the best deal possible for all parties with the maximum amount of protection that can be afforded under this rather unique investment process.

The Chair: Mr Carr, do you have any comments at this point?

Mr Gary Carr (Oakville South): No.

The Chair: I thought you were working out your income tax for next year if you bought Working Ventures.

Mr Carr: I wish I was. MPP LSIF.

The Chair: Mr Kwinter, any more comments?

Mr Kwinter: Yes. I'm a little unhappy that my comments have been construed as support for not including what we consider to be a reasonable addition to the list of what are considered employee organizations. It would seem to me that if a group of employees or an organization does not fall into the category of a trade union or an association or federation of trade unions or a non-profit corporation or cooperative, it is being excluded arbitrarily, really arbitrarily.

I mean, where does the province of Ontario come off deciding that unless you belong to a trade union or some organization that can be loosely described as falling under that umbrella, you cannot participate in benefits everybody should be entitled if they fall into that general category? It would seem to me that employees of a company that is not organized in a formal way or affiliated in a formal way but have every other qualification in that they are a group of employees, they have the same concerns and the same interest for their jobs, why should they be arbitrarily excluded? It's as simple as that.

It highlights my original concern. Is this an organized labour bill that is being put forward by organized labour and supported by this government? We have the contrary evidence of that, in that the OFL and the CAW—and, as I say, I predict the Canadian Labour Congress, now that Bob

White is going to be the president, will not be actively supporting this, notwithstanding that it may have an internal conflict and that at the federal level it does have a plan. But they will not be actively supporting it.

Why would a group that is in every other way in exactly the same position: the same concern about saving their jobs, the same concern about investing in a fund, doing all of these things—the only thing they haven't got going for them is that they are not formally affiliated in some group that is recognized as a trade union or a cooperative. I don't see why they should be excluded. I don't see any rationale for that.

The Chair: Mr Johnson, didn't you answer that last week?

Mr Paul R. Johnson (Prince Edward-Lennox-South Hastings): Yes, in fact I believe I did answer that. Mr Kwinter keeps revisiting this question. I've answered it once. I out and out disagree with what he says.

The Chair: Maybe you could, because we haven't got Hansard in front of us, revisit last week very quickly.

Mr Johnson: I couldn't quote what I said verbatim, but we have to be clear that when we're talking about LSIFs and LSVCCs they're certainly two different things. Here they're talking about labour-sponsored venture capital corporations and that part of the act that would include them. I think it's clear that we have to limit in some way the organizations that can come together to create these corporations under the act. I think some of the arguments made by the members opposite would lend some credence and necessity to that. I don't think it's exclusionary in any way, except that these organizations announced in the act have that opportunity. I just disagree with what Mr Kwinter says. Of course he'll disagree with what I say, but that's where we're different, I guess.

The Chair: Mr Carr had a quick question.

Mr Carr: I did want to point out and talk about the fact that it's my belief there isn't anything we can do to make this bill better. I look at the government's amendments, and it's an embarrassment that we've brought a bill that has to have this many changes come through. I don't blame a lot of people in the ministries because I suspect what happened is that they were told to put something together. They get their instructions; they get changed minute by minute.

My basic feeling is what the CFIB said on page 2 of its brief:

"Our analysis of the program shows that the program is not an appropriate vehicle for encouraging modernization, growth and restructuring in small and medium-sized Ontario companies. It also shows that Ontario taxpayers, including the small business community, will not get good value for their hard-earned tax dollars from this program. A better use of $250 million, which would accomplish the above-noted objective of the program, is to exempt the $400,000 of payroll from the purview of the employer health tax."

That's why I'm going to be voting against all the amendments, because I believe there isn't anything we can do to change this bill. I'll be very brief in all my comments because I think it's an absolute waste of time.

The Chair: I'm going to make one comment here. A lot of the changes in there were changes in about four or five different clauses; like when you change your name you've got to change your licence, your social security and everything else. A lot of them are just small technical changes, not changing the scope of the bill, though.

Mr Carr: Yes, and that's my feeling. It doesn't change the scope of the bill. What you had is people coming before you, small and medium-sized businesses, saying, "This is what you should do." Typically, the government is saying, "No, we know better than you do in spite of the fact that you've been in business, that you're represented by these people." We're not talking about the big Fords and the big GMs. We're talking about small businesses of five to 10 people that are saying: "You're wrong. This isn't what the problems are." But typical of this government, it just pushes it through.

Quite frankly, it's a waste of time. The only thing I hope is that this thing was generated by the government and not by the bureaucrats who put it together, because it will do nothing to help businesses. I'll be voting against every amendment that comes through.

The Chair: You must be a member of the CAW then.

1050

Mr Owens: I have a couple of comments on Mr Carr's observations. Mr Chair, I'm glad you used your fine wisdom to clarify some of the amendments; that in fact we only had three policy changes. The rest were consequential amendments, as you quite accurately pointed out.

In terms of the issue with respect to non-union people being able to access the employee ownership section of this bill, I thought it was very clear this morning. I thought Mr Evans clarified it one more time with feeling. I thought I had spoken quite clearly that these people are eligible in terms of the employee ownership portion of this bill, so we are not excluding people in terms of their ability to access this legislation, if their plant or their office, or whatever their business is involved with, is experiencing difficulty.

In terms of non-union people investing in LSIFs, it's my guess, and I'll ask Mr Evans to either confirm or deny my guess, that if a person wants to invest through a local union, that is possible, so it's not simply restricted to labour groups in terms of the investment portion.

Mr Evans: When I made my initial presentation to this committee as to the objectives of the bill, they were described as to expand the current capital markets; to provide business access to new sources of capital to help them grow and adapt to new technologies and the increasing globalization of the market; to initiate partnerships committed to the development of innovative programs to help Ontario meet the economic challenges of the 1990s; to encourage individuals to invest in Ontario's businesses and facilitate employee growth; to provide labour with a greater opportunity for participation in the decision-making process, and to develop new partnerships between business, labour and government to help Ontario increase productivity, improve labour-management relations and set the groundwork for sustained prosperity and remaining competitive.

In that respect, the role of any labour-sponsored organization establishing an investment fund is in fact a vehicle. I do not think in the context of this bill that a labour-sponsored group, of itself, is intended to be a beneficiary. They're a vehicle whereby everybody gets the opportunity to participate and invest. Those are on the labour-sponsored investment side.

On the employee ownership side, it is quite clear within the bill that any group of employees can be formed for the purpose of taking over or gaining control of its company.

Mr Kwinter: My concern is that the implication is that it isn't labour in the broad sense; it's organized labour. If you're not organized, you're not considered labour. If I was a cynic, and you obviously know I'm not a cynic, I would say this is a wonderful way to encourage people to get organized into unions. If they want to become recognized as a labour organization or as an employee organization, the answer is very simple: Go out and get affiliated. Get yourself accredited as a union and then you can be an employee organization under the act. This is a wonderful opportunity for us to get more people into the union movement. That's if I was a cynic.

All I'm suggesting to you is that when we talk about a labour-sponsored vehicle, if there is a recognized group of employees—and we have suggested in our amendment an association of employees, a group that wants to be considered an employee organization under the act—the act, as it now stands, precludes that from happening. Yes, they can participate in an employee buyout. Yes, they can participate as individuals in investing in a labour-sponsored investment fund, but they cannot initiate one on their own as an employee organization unless they are affiliated or a trade union. That is my concern.

My concern is, why should these people be disadvantaged from doing what anyone else who is in a labour group can do by the mere fact that they are not members of an organized union? They may be a group of employees. It could happen, let's say, that Dofasco, which is non-unionized, would want to get together an employee organization. They can't because they are not a union and they're not affiliated and they're not a co-op. The only way they can do it is to get themselves unionized.

I think that is unreasonable, I think it's draconian and I think there should be a provision that any employee association, whether it has the title that it is a trade union or not, if it is an association of employees, bona fide, representing the employees of a particular company, should have the same rights and privileges as any other employee. I'm not talking about what I talked about earlier, a group of investors on Bay Street who are not employees and who put together a shell company. I'm talking about a bona fide company that just doesn't happen to be unionized but has the same aspirations, goals and requirements as anyone else in Ontario. Why should they be excluded?

The Chair: Mr Evans, perhaps you don't mind commenting on that.

Mr Evans: Very briefly, as pointed out earlier, in terms of parallel legislation in other jurisdictions, this whole issue is untested. Such a group, if it approached an existing association or federation as described by the act to gain sponsorship, could conceivably form such a group, but the sponsor would have to be organized labour. If the act were broadened, based on our experience at the present time, then they would not be treated equitably because the federal government would likely deny the 20% credit from the feds. That is merely from our experience with trying to get the matching 20% federal credit in relation to the EO side, where we have been turned down. That is the framework of the practical experience we have.

Mr Owens: I just want to finish up the comments I made earlier in terms of the remarks made by Mr Carr with respect to the government not listening etc.

I recall that one of the presenters last week—was it last week that the Canadian Federation of Independent Business came in, or about two weeks ago? I recall looking at their chart. I understand that something like 80% of the respondents to their survey said that regulation and taxes were their highest concern. When one examines that particular survey, one discovers that first of all these folks are established businesses, so yes, they would have moved on from the initial stage. But as you look down the chart a little bit further you'll note 23% saying they have had difficulties in obtaining capital. That's fully one quarter of the respondents to the survey who have indicated that they are having difficulty obtaining capital of some sort.

I can tell you that in my riding, when I go out and speak to small businesses, whether they're established or whether they're looking to start or expand or simply stay alive, the biggest problem they have is obtaining money. This bill, whether it's through the EO option or the LSIF, is going to assist small business in this challenge of obtaining money. We in fact are listening to the businesses out there.

I think one has to look fairly closely at some of the studies and statistics coming forward and certainly conduct more than a superficial analysis which is used to simply accuse the government of not listening. That's simply not true. I think one has to look at the subtleties of surveys like that. I suggest that 23% of those surveyed responding that they have had difficulty in obtaining capital is fairly significant. It may be a smaller number than the 80%, but it's still a significant number. This bill, this piece of legislation is clearly a beginning to allow businesses to access pools of capital. It's an opportunity to allow workers to fully participate in the businesses they are employed by. That's the intent and that's the spirit of the bill, and I think we clearly have listened to the parties who are involved in this process.

1100

Mr Kwinter: I just want to make a comment. I think there is a misconception on that business survey. When you talk to the small businessmen, and I speak to them all the time, there is no question that they have a problem. They don't have a problem with getting capital in the sense that we're talking about this venture capital fund. They're having trouble with their banks. They're having trouble going in to their bankers and saying: "Look, I don't have any collateral for you. I'm in a tough situation. Business is bad, I've got debts and I need a greater line of credit."

The bank is saying, "We can't give you any more credit because you're at the end. You've stretched your credit-worthiness." I don't see that this particular project, this bill, is aimed at providing funds for people who are having difficulties at their banks.

I was up in Sault Ste Marie a couple of days ago and I was meeting with a guy who tells me he can't sleep at night because he owes the bank about $8 million and he doesn't know how he is going to resolve that. This is not going to help him. I don't care what happens; if the advisory committee or anyone else looks at it, they are going to say, "That is not our role to put money into a situation that is not economically viable." One of the criteria is that it's got to have some prospect of being viable.

When you talk to the small businessmen, there are hardly any who don't say the banks are being very tough right now and are giving them very little leeway. They are not giving them enough capital so that they can function on a day-to-day basis.

On the other hand, if you take a look at the representations of the Ontario Federation of Labour, if you take a look at some of the other people, they say there is no evidence there is a shortage of venture capital, that if anything, it's the opposite, that there is a shortage of worthy projects in which to put venture capital, so I don't think you can relate one to the other.

When you talk about the list of where it is on that survey, that is a different issue. It's a banking issue. Again, I'm saying to you that any five businessmen whom you talk to who are in a small business will tell you the same story: Given their inventory, given their accounts receivable, given all these things, they are stretched and they are having difficulty getting capital to keep working. But that is not going to be solved by this project because the criteria will not allow these funds to be used in this way.

Mr Owens: The traditional sources of venture capital are just not available at this point. We had a person in on the standing committee on government agencies whom we were looking at for the Ontario Development Corp, and we had a good conversation around not only venture capital but pre-venture capital in terms of developing the plan or developing the business.

This is a good bill to address startup, and as Mr Evans just read to us, the intent of the legislation is to provide growth. It's not simply a bailout process. It's not simply writing cheques to keep failing businesses in some sort of health. The bill is designed to promote growth, it's designed to encourage employee participation, it's designed to allow the business people a greater pool of capital in which to access funds. I disagree strongly that people, in terms of the venture capital, do not find that an issue in terms of accessing to start their business. I disagree with that strongly.

Mr Gerry Phillips (Scarborough-Agincourt): Can I ask a question and then follow up with a comment? On the definition of employee organization, I assume that teachers' organizations would fall under that definition—a trade union.

Mr Evans: I'm not familiar with whether the teachers' organizations are an association or federation of labour-sponsored organizations.

Mr Phillips: Can someone answer the question for me?

Mr Gerald Sholtack: No, they're not.

Mr Phillips: They're not? This makes my point that I'm getting very angry about, which is that originally I was told that the reason why the definition wouldn't be expanded was because of the federal tax credit. That doesn't make any sense to me. Now co-ops don't have access to the federal tax credit, but they're going to be included. So you've violated that principle, and that's fine; we're supportive of the co-ops. I don't know whether they're here or not, but we're very much supportive of them. But we would argue, as we do in our motion, that you've already agreed that it isn't just the tax credit that sets the criteria here. Why in the world you won't agree to any other association of employees—

I can very easily see the teachers' organizations wanting to participate in this. The OFL has already said: "Listen, we don't want to. Count us out of this. We're not going to participate in the venture capital." So who is going to run this? The Canadian Federation of Labour said it would, and that's great, but the OFL probably have three or four times as many members here and it said it's not going to.

Why in the world the government won't accept our amendment is beyond me. As I say, I can see the Ontario Teachers' Federation saying: "Listen, this is something we want to participate in. Why aren't we eligible?"

Mr Owens: I'd ask for a clarification on whether or not the Ontario Secondary School Teachers' Federation or the other teachers' associations are in fact eligible.

Mr Phillips: Fine, but why won't you just accept the amendment? I thought there was agreement here four weeks ago that you were going to bring forward the Saskatchewan model.

Mr Owens: No. As I pointed out to you in the Hansard of a number of weeks ago, and I believe the page was F42 in the Hansard of the day, I clearly indicated that the Saskatchewan model was not the model that was going to be introduced. If we could find the Hansard for that particular day, I'll point it out to you one more time.

Mr Phillips: This is totally ridiculous why we would not accept that model. It doesn't make any sense at all to me. The Premier has said this is one of his big economic planks, and the big player that can run it says it doesn't want to participate in it. Why not give other employee groups a chance?

Mr Sutherland: I think, Mr Phillips, yourself and your colleagues have certainly made your points as to what you see as criticisms of the legislation that is there. I think we've had a great deal of—

Mr Phillips: Give me the reason the government doesn't want to do it.

Mr Sutherland: Wait a minute. We've had a great deal of explanations. We've had staff explanations, we've asked the minister—

Mr Phillips: What is the explanation? Will somebody tell me why they won't?

Mr Sutherland: Do you want one more clarification?

Mr Phillips: Yes, I do.

Mr Evans: On the point of eligibility, I think the point was made that the cooperatives do not qualify for the federal matching credit. That is not a point we know at the present time. That is being clarified with the federal officials. By virtue of the similarity between the present definition and the amended, there is a possibility the co-ops will receive a matching credit, and we expect to have that advice from the federal government very shortly.

Beyond that, using again our employee ownership model, we know other employee associations definitely will not attract the federal credit.

1110

Mr Phillips: Say that again. You have asked the federal government whether the Saskatchewan model would qualify for—

Mr Evans: We have sought clarification from the federal government as to whether the amendment that has been introduced by this government to the bill would qualify for the 20% matching credits on the grounds of its similarity with the existing bill which they had reviewed and had agreed they would administer and would match on the labour-sponsored investment fund.

We know from our own direct negotiation with the federal government on the employee ownership side that it does not accept that broader definition. So as to where the boundary is, our belief at the present time is that the boundary may include both working co-ops and the association or federation of labour-sponsored organizations as both receiving 20% matching credits. We expect to have confirmation of that within a short period of time.

Mr Phillips: Have you asked the question whether the Saskatchewan model would qualify?

Mr Evans: We have not. The only people who could answer that would be the treasury officials who've been negotiating directly.

Mr Phillips: I'm getting the runaround here.

The Chair: Do we have anyone from treasury? Could you please come forward to a mike. Do you have the answer in this particular question of Mr Phillips?

Ms Diana Wright: Would you repeat the question, please?

The Chair: Could you please identify yourself, also, for Hansard.

Ms Wright: My name is Diana Wright from treasury.

Mr Phillips: The question is, has the government asked the federal government whether the Saskatchewan model would qualify for matching tax grants or not?

Ms Wright: Maybe I'm not the best one from treasury to—I wasn't involved in the earlier discussions. I came on fairly late. Can we get back—

Mr Sutherland: If I can just make a process suggestion, we've had the minister back in again this morning. We've been running back and forth. Maybe we could ask treasury to provide us with a clarification or to try to find out whether it did ask about the Saskatchewan model.

In the meantime, my concern is that I'd like to know when we're going to maybe move on and start getting into actual clause-by-clause vote. If it's a question of that actual issue being resolved and we need to come back to that issue, fine, once we get a clarification as to whether we have asked that specific question that Mr Phillips raises, but I do think we have discussed a lot of the other issues around and around, both during presentation time and during other times last week as well, when we had staff back in. I would think that we should be looking at moving into our voting process pretty soon.

The Chair: I don't know whether Mr Phillips has got an answer there as yet.

Mr Phillips: I think we're putting the bureaucracy in a totally untenable position.

The Chair: Can I get a question from Mr Carr while we're waiting for Mr Phillips's answer?

Mr Carr: I'll be very brief because, like Kimble said, I'd like to move on. I appreciate Mr Owens's and Mr Evans's comments and their intentions. You have good intentions to help small and medium business, as does Mr Evans, as does Mr Kwinter. The only point I want to make is what the chamber said: "Unfortunately, we do not believe that the proposed legislation moves us forward on these very legitimate objectives." What I'm saying is that the Canadian Federation of Independent Business said the program is not an appropriate vehicle.

You have very good intentions, as Mr Evans's intentions were. All of us here want to help small and medium-sized businesses. What I'm saying—it'll be the last point and then I'll let us get into clause-by-clause—is you have good intentions, but the CFIB, which represents—and they've listed in here the people saying you're not going to achieve that objective. The Ontario Chamber of Commerce, which represents 88,000 small businesses, says that you're not going to achieve your objectives.

So the bottom line is, in spite of the good intentions of all of us in the room, we are not going to achieve our objective. I'm saying to the people of this province: Don't listen to me, don't listen to Mr Owens, don't listen to Mr Evans; listen to the people who are involved, who are saying it will not work.

I'm prepared now to go on to clause-by-clause and I'll save all the rest of my debates to when we get into the House. That's all I'm saying.

The Chair: Mr Whitehead, are you able to answer Mr Phillips's question at this time, or would you like to get back to the committee?

Mr John Whitehead: If I understand the question correctly, it is, did we ask the federal government if, were we to have a definition similar to Saskatchewan's, it would match it and prescribe it. Is that an accurate rendition?

Mr Phillips: That's correct.

Mr Whitehead: We've approached the federal government on this program a couple of different times, early in the design stages and specifically again on the employee ownership side. They've been quite solid thus far—if they're going to be involved in administering the program and matching it, they want us to be as close to their model as possible.

With respect to the specific question asked, the answer is no, we didn't ask that for the time being. We didn't ask that because the government had a view that extending it to worker cooperatives would be an appropriate action on the basis of worker cooperatives being similar to trade unions in many respects. As Mr Evans has pointed out several times this morning, this is a new program for Ontario. There's no experience rating on the other kinds of employee organizations across the country, as far as we know. We felt it would be prudent to stay with a beginning point which was tried and known.

That's not to say that something couldn't happen at another time, but I must say that in talking with the federal government—and we don't yet have an official answer on whether it'll even parallel our worker cooperative amendment—the feeling I have from the federal government is, it's starting to look hard at the other provincial acts as well. Seeing a variety of different kinds of definitions growing out of different provincial acts, I think the federal government is starting to reassess its own position there.

Mr Phillips: If I might comment on that: The reason I'm getting very frustrated is, we went to the briefing, we asked, "Why aren't co-ops in here?" and we were told: "It's because we can't get the federal matching tax credit. We're only including ones in here that we can get the federal matching tax credit." I said, "I don't agree with that, but I understand that."

Then, several weeks later, a co-op movement comes in and says—and I support the co-op movement, but now I say, if that's the case, we don't have any assurance of it, why don't we include any other employee, as the Saskatchewan model does? So it's the inconsistency of the message. I say the civil servants are being put in an intolerable position here because I know what—

Mr Sutherland: Sorry, Mr Phillips. But in terms of the explanations that have been given this morning, that inconsistency is not likely to exist.

Mr Phillips: Have you asked the federal government whether it will?

Mr Sutherland: No. If I heard correctly, Mr Evans indicated that the federal government has now given some indications that the worker co-ops and the association of co-ops may be eligible for that tax grant.

Mr Phillips: So you've asked the question, yes.

Mr Sutherland: That was my sense of what Mr Evans had said this morning.

Mr Phillips: But I said, why not ask the question the other way?

Mr Sutherland: So that makes it consistent with the others. However, at the same time they have indicated here this morning that the federal government has given them the indication that it's not moving in other areas in terms of broadening it up.

Mr Phillips: Is that the case, what he just said?

Mr Whitehead: The federal government hasn't announced any formal review or anything, but my understanding from federal colleagues is that in fact it is looking at all the provincial acts at this point to determine exactly how wide these things are and the appropriateness of its matching them.

Mr Phillips: I'd like to see that in writing, then.

The Chair: Okay, fine.

Mr Kwinter: Can I get a clarification? Has anyone gone to the trouble of asking the Saskatchewan government whether its employee organization definition is acceptable to the federal government?

Ms Wright: Officially they're in the Income Tax Act as being prescribed to receive matching federal credits. There have been no employee organizations as defined set up, and I understand that administratively the Saskatchewan government is reluctant to actually prescribe any employee groups that match its definition right now. So there are no foreseeable employee groups that will be taking advantage of that particular definition at this point.

The Vice-Chair: Mr Owens.

Mr Kwinter: I'm not finished.

The Vice-Chair: All right. One more and then we'll go to Mr Owens.

1120

Mr Kwinter: My question is to the government members. Is your objection to including the definition of other employee groups because they are not members of organized labour, or is the objection to the fact that they will not be eligible for matching federal participation? Can anyone answer that?

The Vice-Chair: I can give you my comments, but I don't think it's appropriate, being in the chair right now.

Mr Johnson: I would think it was the latter comment you made.

Mr Kwinter: If we can get verification that in Saskatchewan, even though the government hasn't encouraged any one, or no one has come forward in that category, they have an understanding or they have a ruling from the federal government—and it would seem to me that they would have—I can't imagine that they would have all these definitions of employee organizations and one of them would not be subject to the same availability of matching funds as all the others. I just assume that's the case. If we can get assurance of that, would there be any objection to including it?

Mr Johnson: Personally, I would like to check with the minister directly. I don't know that that presents any great problem, but I don't know what the results of the investigation are going to show, whether they're going to show specifically yes or no if there's going to be some other implications that aren't immediately evident until we hear from the federal government.

Mr Owens: I don't want to get into a debate with Mr Carr over the issue, but in terms of his reliance on the Ontario chamber's presentation as a source for quotations, I find that interesting. It's my recollection that presentation was technically flawed and that in fact Mr Evans, out of consideration for time and courtesy, requested that he work with the presenter outside to correct some of the inaccurate information that was contained in that presentation. We're talking about technical information as opposed to a philosophical difference, so in terms of relying on that particular presentation as a way to turn your argument that this bill is going to be non-functional, I'm not sure that's absolutely effective at all.

The Vice-Chair: Mr Wiseman.

Mr Jim Wiseman (Durham West): No questions.

The Vice-Chair: If there are no other comments at this time, I guess maybe what we can do, or hopefully do, is start the process of going through some clause-by-clause here. I believe the package we were dealing with is the one that was distributed this morning.

I just want to get a sense as to how we want to proceed on the clause-by-clause. My understanding is that there are some substantive amendments, and then some of the other amendments are wording changes throughout as a result of those substantive ones. I guess if we make changes to some of them, we may have to go back and make changes to the others.

Let's maybe then just start. I guess we need to go through this process. Officially, we will need to have the amendments read into the record. We could go through each one and then have a vote on it, and if somewhere along the line there should be a change and we need to come back and make a wording change, we'll have to do that. But we'll rely on the folks at hand to get that done. I think we're ready to go into clause-by-clause voting.

Section 1:

The Chair: Mr Johnson, the first amendment, subsection 1(1).

Mr Johnson: You'd like me to read it into the record now?

The Chair: Into the record, please.

Mr Johnson moves that subsection 1(1) of the bill be amended

“(a) by striking out the definition of ‘employee group’; and

“(b) by adding the following definitions:

“‘commission,’ ‘director,’ ‘material fact,’ ‘misrepresentation’ and ‘reporting issuer’ have the meanings specified in the Securities Act;

“‘disclosure document’ means a document that contains prescribed material relating to a specified employee ownership corporation;

“‘distribution’ has the meaning specified in the Securities Act and ‘distribute,’ ‘distributed’ and ‘distributing’ have corresponding meanings;

“‘specified employee ownership corporation’ means a corporation that has notified the minister under subsection 4(2) of its intention to apply for registration as an employee ownership labour sponsored venture capital corporation;

“‘trade’ or ‘trading’ includes the meaning specified in the Securities Act.”

The Chair: Would you give an explanation of the amendment?

Mr Johnson: Yes, Mr Chair. The amendments are consequential upon the proposed amendments to sections 4 and 5, which eliminate the concept of a certified employee group in part II, and add definitions required for the proposed amendments relating to investor protection.

The Chair: Any comment or debate? Is the committee ready for a vote? All those in favour? Opposed?

Motion agreed to.

The Chair: Mr Johnson moves that subsection 1(1) of the bill be amended by adding the following definition:

“‘worker cooperative’ has the same meaning as in the Co-operative Corporations Act.”

Mr Johnson: An explanatory note: The amendment adds the definition of a “worker cooperative” for the purposes of the proposed amendment to the definition of “employee organization.”

The Chair: Any comments or debate? The committee is ready for a vote? All in favour? All opposed?

Motion agreed to.

The Chair: Mr Phillips moves that the definition of “employee organization” in subsection 1(1) of the bill be struck out and the following substituted:

“‘employee organization’ means,

“(a) a trade union;

“(b) an association or federation of trade unions;

“(c) a non-profit corporation all of whose shareholders are employees of the same employer;

“(d) a cooperative incorporated pursuant to the Co-operative Corporations Act, that has as one of its principal objects, as stated in its articles of incorporation, the investment of its equity capital in accordance with the act, and all of whose members are employees of the same employer; or

“(e) any other association of employees or class of association of employees that is prescribed in the regulations.”

Mr Phillips: By way of explanation, this is the model that's used in Saskatchewan. It would permit a much broader number of employees in this province to participate and would overcome what I think's going to be a fundamental flaw in the bill as it's currently developed by the government, and that is that most of the employee organizations that can participate under the government's act don't want to.

This would broaden it. Also, it would ensure that the teachers are eligible. I haven't yet heard whether the teachers are regarded under the current act as eligible, but this would make certain that they were.

The Chair: Any comments or debate?

Mr Carr: My feeling is that if groups are going to turn the government down in terms of participation, we should let as many as want to be eligible to turn them down. This would do that, broaden it, clarify it. So this I will support.

The Chair: Any other comments or debate? Is the committee ready for the vote? All in favour of the motion? We have three. Opposed?

Motion negatived.

1130

The Chair: Mr Johnson moves that the definition of “employee organization” in subsection 1(1) of the bill be struck out and the following substituted:

“‘Employee organization’ means,

“(a) a trade union,

“(b) an association or federation of trade unions, or

“(c) an association or federation of worker cooperatives.”

Mr Johnson: Explanatory note: The amendment expands the list of organizations that may sponsor a labour-sponsored investment fund corporation to include an association or federation of worker cooperatives.

The Chair: Comments or debate.

Mr Carr: Obviously the government has said all along that its intention was to expand the number of groups. This certainly will not do it. Their definition leaves out some of the groups. It obviously relates to the last one, which would have included the other ones. My feeling is if you're not going to include as many groups as possible, I cannot support the government motion and will be voting against it.

The Chair: Any more comments or debate?

Mr Phillips: Can we have a clarification on the teacher situation?

Mr Sutherland: It would appear we can't get that clarification for you right now.

The Chair: Is anyone making any telephone calls from the ministry to—

Mr Phillips: I'm not.

The Chair: No, I'm talking about staff here.

Mr Sutherland: I thought Mr Johnson had indicated earlier that we were working on getting a more definite statement on it, if possible.

Mr Phillips: Tried to get hold of Jim Head but he's in a meeting.

The Chair: Maybe we could have an answer at 3:30 this afternoon. We'll try for that.

Mr Sutherland: In terms of the definition issue and employee organizations, I know the opposition has concerns. They think it should be expanded right now. We've tried to make the case as to what some of the concerns and some of the issues are. I don't think that rules out the possibility that once the program is up and operational and they've had some experience in terms of dealing with these, some practical experience in how things work out, at a later date the definition may be broadened.

I think certainly some would say, “Well, why don't you start it out?” But remember, this is a bit of a new area that we're going into and may be we should start out and get some of the bugs worked out of it from practical application. Then I would think that at some point that will obviously be one of the key issues, that any review of the legislation that would take place would deal with that issue, once they had seen how it works in the current state.

Mr Carr: But let's be fair. If we were going to do that, we would do that now. Let's not hold a carrot out and say that somewhere down the road it may be changed if things work out. I know it isn't your intention to try to be unfair on that, but let's be upfront with people. Let's say you don't want them included, for whatever reason, but let's not hold a carrot and stick out and say it might be somewhere down the road. If you're going to do it, it should be included now. If you're not, then don't do it. But let's not hold out a little bit of a carrot and say, “Well, maybe we will change it and broaden it.”

My suggestion on this particular one is that if Mr Phillips has some concerns and needs a clarification, we maybe stand this one down and come back to it after we get some clarification. Certainly I can respect that for whatever reasons you're going to make a change and not include whatever groups, but let's not lead these groups to believe it will be broadened at a later date, because obviously if you were intending to do it you would do it now.

Mr Sutherland: Mr Carr has suggested that we stand this one down for the time being. If we can get some more clarification for this afternoon, and that's agreeable to Mr Phillips, then I think that's a reasonable request.

The Chair: How does the committee feel about this one being put off until this afternoon? Agreed? Okay. You agree with Mr Carr on that one.

Mr Johnson moves that section 1 of the bill be amended by adding the following subsections:

“Specified employee ownership corporation

“(8) A corporation ceases to be a specified employee-ownership corporation if one of the following occurs:

“1. The corporation withdraws its notification given to the minister under subsection 4(2).

“2. The corporation is refused registration under part II and the refusal is confirmed under section 31.

“3. The registration of the corporation is revoked and the revocation is confirmed under section 31.

“4. A cease trade order has been issued against the corporation, but this paragraph does not apply if the cease trade order has expired or been rescinded.

“5. A receiver, receiver-manager, trustee, liquidator or other person acting in the similar capacity is appointed to assume possession or control of all or a substantial portion of the property and assets of the corporation.

“Idem, application of Securities Act

“(9) Except as specified in this act and the regulations, or either of them, a class A share and any other share of a prescribed class of a specified employer ownership corporation shall be deemed not to be a security for the purposes of the Securities Act until such time as the specified employee ownership corporation becomes a reporting issuer within the meaning of that act.”

Mr Johnson: An explanatory note: The amendments provide technical rules for when a corporation shall cease to be a specified employee ownership corporation. Under this and other related amendments, corporations which propose to register as employee ownership labour-sponsored venture capital corporations will be defined as specified employee ownership corporations. Such corporations, both before registration and while registered as employee ownership labour-sponsored venture capital corporations, will be subject to a separate securities code to be made by regulation under Bill 150 and will not be subject to the Securities Act.

The Chair: Comments or debate?

Mr Phillips: Have we checked out the Steelworkers' concern about opening ourselves and opening the employees up to countervail actions by the minister signing these documents?

Mr Johnson: I think it was clear that we have. In fact, we've given that answer already in this committee, but just to revisit that, if it's an order in council that applies broadly to organizations within Ontario, then it would seem highly unlikely that there would be any concern, especially from the Americans, and that was their concern.

But let's be frank and say that we know too that the United States, whenever it sees any kind of problem with regard to advantages given to—I'm speaking of course of Ontario now—Ontario corporations, it's very likely that under many circumstances, they may take issue with this. We think that this application is broad enough that it shouldn't be seen to be as negative as you might suggest—at least, if not you, certainly the American government.

Mr Phillips: Have we looked at Mr Gerard's suggestion and said, "No we don't want to follow that"?

Mr Johnson: Could you be more specific?

Mr Phillips: He was saying that rather than having the process that's prescribed in the bill, he recommended a different process that didn't lead to ministerial signing of the business plan. But you've looked at that and decided that you don't want to bring forward that amendment.

Mr Johnson: That's right.

The Chair: Any further comments or debate? The committee's ready for a vote. All in favour of the motion? Opposed?

Motion agreed to.

1140

The Chair: Maybe what we can do is we can pass sections 2 and 3, as we're coming back to revisit section 1 this afternoon, subsection 1(1).

Mr Sutherland: Just as a point of process, there are no amendments proposed to sections 2 and 3 but there are amendments coming forward; there may be other ones. Do we want to wait to pass those sections in case there's any possibility of potential wording changes in those specific sections as a result of any other amendments that may come forward that are changed?

Mr Phillips: What other amendments?

Mr Sutherland: I mean, there are some proposed amendments here. I don't know if all the amendments here have any impact on any other wording changes later on in any other sections.

The Chair: On the wording changes, other amendments will automatically change 2 and 3.

Mr Sutherland: All right, that's fine. Thank you.

The Chair: Do we carry sections 2 and 3? All in favour? Against?

Sections 2 and 3 agreed to.

Section 4:

The Chair: We move on to section 4.

Mr Johnson moves that section 4 of the bill be struck out and the following substituted:

"Definition, 'board'

"4(1) In this section, 'board' means the Ontario Labour Relations Board.

"Intention to apply for registration

"(2) A corporation that intends to apply for registration as an employee ownership labour sponsored venture capital corporation shall notify the minister of its intention before making the application.

"Action by minister

"(3) After receipt of a notice under subsection (2), the minister shall direct the board to conduct a vote of the eligible employees of the business in which the proposed applicant corporation intends to invest.

"Condition

"(4) The minister shall not direct the board to conduct a vote in respect of a proposed applicant corporation until the minister is satisfied,

"(a) that the proposed investment has been reviewed by the Employee Ownership Advisory Board;

"(b) that the eligible employees entitled to vote have been provided with a disclosure document; and

"(c) that the eligible employees have been provided with advice relating to the proposed investment by an independent adviser.

"Questions

"(5) The vote shall be conducted to answer the following questions or any prescribed alternative questions and to answer any prescribed additional questions:

"1. Do you support the application for registration of the corporation as an employee ownership labour sponsored venture capital corporation under the Labour Sponsored Venture Capital Corporations Act, 1992?

"2. Do you support the proposed investment in the corporation for the purpose of reinvestment in your employer as outlined in the business, human resources and investment plans to be filed under the Labour Sponsored Venture Capital Corporations Act, 1992?

"Voters re some of eligible business activities

"(6) If the proposed investment in the proposed applicant corporation is in respect of only some of the eligible business activities of the employer, no employee may vote unless the employee is an eligible employee employed in carrying on one or more of those activities.

"Questions

"(7) If a question arises at any time as to whether a person is an eligible employee or is employed in carrying on some of the eligible business activities of the eligible business, the question may be referred to the board and the decision of the board is final and conclusive for all purposes.

"Procedure

"(8) Votes conducted by and proceedings before the board under this section shall be in accordance with its rules, practice and forms, and, for the purpose, sections 104, 105, 108, 110 and 111 of the Labour Relations Act apply with necessary modifications.

"Results

"(9) The board shall provide the minister and the eligible employees with the results of the vote taken under this section."

Mr Johnson: Explanatory note: The new section 4 provides that the eligible employees of the eligible business will have the right to formally vote at a vote to be conducted by the Ontario Labour Relations Board on whether or not to proceed under the act with the proposed investment in the eligible business through an employee ownership labour-sponsored venture capital corporation. The certification of employee groups has been eliminated as no longer administratively necessary.

Other proposed amendments will remove references in other sections of the bill to the employee group.

The Chair: Comments or debate? Mr Phillips.

Mr Phillips: Help me along a little bit in the explanation. Who was going to conduct the vote before this amendment? The same—

Mr Johnson: Counsel tells me that it wasn't provided in the act. It wasn't a formal vote before and now this allows for that to happen.

Mr Phillips: Is this something the Ontario Labour Relations Board normally would do? I know they do it in the collective bargaining process—

The Chair: Please identify yourself for the purposes of Hansard.

Ms Catherine Macnaughton: My name is Catherine Macnaughton, legal services at Revenue. Could you repeat the question please, Mr Phillips?

Mr Phillips: Yes. Is this an action the labour relations board is normally involved in in dealing with non-unionized employee groups?

Ms Macnaughton: It's my understanding not, but that they offer their assistance in ensuring the vote would be done on an independent basis; it would be carefully monitored to ensure that the employees were not in any way coerced into cooperating with the plan, that it would be a secret vote and the other assorted rules that apply for trade union votes would apply.

Mr Phillips: The other problem we have with this is the fundamental concern we have with the Employee Ownership Advisory Board certifying that this is—I think the words are “economically viable,” or words to that effect. I think the Steelworkers made a reasonable point. We have some real concerns about the implications for legal redress and moral redress, as the employee advisory board, as I say, puts its stamp of approval on it.

The reason I mention that is because it's mentioned here. I know it's only a subissue on this particular one, but I once again register our concern about where it's going. The government, I think, has acknowledged it is going to accept our amendment, but that probably still doesn't go nearly far enough. Who was it just the other day who was suing government because they felt they weren't properly advised? I can't remember. Those are my comments on it.

The Chair: Any other comments or debate? The committee is ready for a vote.

All in favour of the motion? Opposed?

Motion agreed to.

Section 5:

The Chair: The next amendment is subsection 5(1).

Mr Johnson moves that subsection 5(1) of the bill be struck out and the following substituted:

“Application for registration of corporation

“(1) A corporation may apply for registration as an employee ownership labour sponsored venture capital corporation under this part if, on the vote conducted under section 4, at least 50 per cent of the votes cast were in support of the application and proposed investment.”

Mr Johnson: Explanatory note: The amendment to subsection 5(1) is consequential on the elimination of certified employee groups by proposed amendments to section 4.

The Chair: Comments or debate? The committee is ready to vote.

All in favour of the motion? Opposed?

Motion agreed to.

The Chair: Shall subsections 5(2) through 5(5) carry? Carried.

Mr Johnson moves that clause 5(4)(b) of the bill be amended by striking out “or the employee group” in the sixth and seventh lines.

Mr Johnson: Explanatory note: The amendment is consequential upon amendments to section 4 which eliminate the concept of certified employee group.

The Chair: Comments or debate?

Mr Phillips: What you just said, what does that mean?

1150

Mr Johnson: What does what mean, Mr Phillips?

Mr Phillips: What you just said.

Mr Johnson: I said quite a bit. I moved that clause 5(4)(b)—

Mr Phillips: I understand all that.

Mr Johnson: You mean the explanatory note?

Mr Phillips: Yes. What does it mean?

Ms Macnaughton: All we're doing is removing the reference to the employee group from that provision. The section will read the same as it did in the bill at first reading, but there was a reference in it to the employee group.

Originally, under section 4 in the bill that had first reading the Minister of Revenue would certify an employee group to represent the employees in forming an employee ownership labour-sponsored venture capital corporation. That's gone now that the formal voting provision is in there in section 4, so there are consequential amendments throughout the bill to remove references to the “employee group.”

Mr Phillips: Okay. Thank you.

Section 5, as amended, agreed to.

Section 6:

The Chair: Mr Johnson moves that clause 6(1)(a) of the bill be amended by striking out “the Securities Act” in the sixth line.

Mr Johnson: Explanatory note: The amendment removes the requirement that employee ownership labour-sponsored venture capital corporations comply with the Securities Act and is consequential upon the proposed investor protection amendments which would permit the establishment, by regulation, under this act of a securities code tailored to the circumstances applicable to employee ownership labour-sponsored venture capital corporations.

The Chair: The committee's ready for the vote. All in favour of the motion? Opposed?

Motion agreed to.

The Chair: Mr Johnson moves that paragraphs 1 and 2 of sub-subclause 6(1)(e)(i)(D) of the bill be struck out and the following substituted:

"1. The holder of the share receives an amount on the redemption that does not exceed the amount that would otherwise have been payable on the redemption less an amount equal to the tax credit percentage of the lesser of,

"(i) the amount of equity capital received by the corporation on the original issue of the share, or

"(ii) the amount that would otherwise have been payable on the redemption, and"

"2. The corporation remits to the minister an amount equal to the amount required to be deducted under paragraph 1 in the calculation of the amount receivable by the holder of the share on the redemption."

Mr Johnson: The amendment provides that where the fair market value of class A shares of an employee ownership labour-sponsored venture capital corporation has declined below the issue price of the shares, the recapture of the tax credit from the shareholder on an early redemption of a class A share will be proportionately less than the full amount of the tax credit.

The Chair: All in favour of the motion? Opposed?

Motion agreed to.

The Chair: Mr Johnson moves that subclause 6(1)(e)(iii) of the bill be struck out and the following substituted:

"(iii) the corporation shall not register a transfer by the original purchaser, or by a registered retirement savings plan under which the original purchaser or the original purchaser's spouse is the annuitant of a class A share in respect of which an investment certificate has been issued under this act except if the transfer occurs more than five years after the date on which the share was issued, or the amount if any payable under subsection 27(2) to the minister has been paid, or the corporation is notified in writing that the share is being transferred,

"(A) to be held as an investment of a registered retirement savings plan under which the original purchaser or the original purchaser's spouse is the annuitant,

"(B) as a consequence of the death of the original purchaser,

"(C) at a time when,

"1. the original purchaser has retired from the workforce, or has attained 65 years of age, but the share has been issued and outstanding for at least two years, or

"2. the original purchaser has satisfied the condition in paragraph 2 or 3 of sub-subclause (A) of subclause (i), or

"(D) in accordance with the other prescribed conditions."

Mr Johnson: Explanatory note: The amendment clarifies that a transfer of a class A share of an employee ownership labour-sponsored venture corporation may be registered if any tax credit recapture arising on the transfer has been paid to the minister. A recapture of part or all of the tax credit will normally arise on a transfer of a class A share within the five-year minimum holding period unless: (1) the transfer is to the shareholder's RRSP or a spousal RRSP; (2) the transfer occurs as a result of the death of the shareholder; (3) the transfer occurs when the shareholder has retired or reached age 65 and the share has been issued for at least two years; (4) the shareholder has become permanently disabled; or (5) the shareholder's employment has been involuntarily terminated with the eligible business in which the employee ownership labour-sponsored venture capital corporation has invested.

The Chair: Comments or debate? Mr Carr.

Mr Carr: I just had a question regarding (D). What other ones would be included in there? Does anybody know?

Mr Johnson: Pardon me? I didn't hear the question, Mr Carr.

Mr Carr: What would be included in (D), what other prescribed conditions?

Ms Macnaughton: At the moment I understand there were none proposed.

Mr Carr: None proposed? What do you envision could be one? I'm just wondering why that particular one is in there. What would be the particular reason for it?

Ms Macnaughton: It was put in primarily as a drafting style so that if it should occur that other conditions are the wish of the government, rather than having to amend the act they could be added by regulation.

Mr Carr: So conditions could be thrown in there once the bill passes. Then of course we do it through the regulations, which I think most elected people on all sides are very concerned about but which is happening more frequently in a lot of bills, where basically we pass it through and say, "Trust us with it." That scares me, but it'll pass, I'm sure.

The Chair: Any other comments or debate? The committee is ready to vote. All in favour of the motion? Opposed?

Motion agreed to.

The Chair: The next amendment is clause 6(1)(f).

Mr Johnson moves that clause 6(1)(f) of the bill be struck out and the following substituted:

"(f) the articles of incorporation prohibit the corporation from lending money, guaranteeing a loan or providing other financial assistance to a shareholder of the corporation, to a person related to a shareholder of the corporation or to an employee organization."

Mr Johnson: Explanatory note: The amendment is to eliminate the reference to employee group and is consequential upon the amendments to section 4.

The Chair: Comments or debate? The committee is ready for a vote. All in favour of the motion? Opposed?

Motion agreed to.

The Chair: Next clause, 6(1)(h).

Mr Johnson moves that subsection 6(1) of the bill be amended by striking out clause 6(1)(h).

Mr Johnson: Explanatory note: The amendment strikes out clause 6(1)(h) for administrative simplicity. The clause required an employee ownership labour-sponsored venture capital corporation to contain the term "employee ownership" in the corporation's name.

The Chair: Comments or debate? The committee is ready to vote. All in favour of the motion? Opposed?

Motion agreed to.

The Chair: Shall subsection 6(1), as amended, carry? Carried.

Okay, an amendment to subsection 6(2).

Mr Johnson moves that subsection 6(2) of the bill be struck out and the following substituted:

"Interpretation, tax credit percentage

"(2) For the purposes of clause (1)(e) and section 27, the tax credit percentage means the percentage of the equity capital for which the share was originally issued that is applicable in the determination of any tax credit to which the original holder may be or may have been entitled under section 8 of the Income Tax Act."

Mr Johnson: Explanatory note: The amendment is required to remove reference to a federal tax credit, as the federal government will not provide a matching tax credit on investments in employee ownership labour-sponsored venture capital corporations.

Motion agreed to.

The Chair: Mr Phillips moves that section 6 of the bill be amended by adding the following subsection:

"(4.1) Approval of a business plan, human resource plan and proposed investments of an employee ownership labour sponsored venture capital corporation does not imply that the Lieutenant Governor in Council guarantees the survival of the eligible business or the rate of return of the investments."

Mr Phillips: The explanation is that this is the mildest thing we could propose in terms of trying to ensure that people understand that because this body has put its stamp of approval on its economic viability doesn't mean it's economically viable. We would prefer to go to something like the Steelworkers proposed, but I don't think that's in the cards. So this is, as I say, the mildest thing we think we can get through the government.

The Chair: Comments or debate?

Mr Carr: I was just going to say that the intent obviously seems reasonable. I think it's a valid point, so I'll be supporting it.

The Chair: Mr Owens and then Mr Johnson.

Mr Owens: I'll yield to Mr Johnson.

Mr Johnson: I just wanted to say that I don't think there's anything implicit that the government would be responsible, even as the bill was presented, but we feel that in order to appease the Liberals and to allow for this notion that there is indeed some extra protection here, we will support this.

The Chair: In other words, you're saying it's more clarification in the bill. Is the committee ready for the vote?

Motion agreed to.

The Chair: Shall subsections 6(3) through 6(6) carry? Carried.

Section 6, as amended, agreed to.

The Chair: This committee will adjourn until 3:30 this afternoon.

The committee recessed at 1204.

AFTERNOON SITTING

The committee resumed at 1551.

The Chair: We resume clause-by-clause of Bill 150. We'll go back for some clarification on the Ontario Teachers' Federation. Could you give us some clarification, sir, on the definition if it's within the scope of this bill?

Mr Sholtack: We've looked at this issue, we've discussed it with legal counsel at the Ministry of Education and the Ministry of Labour and the answer is, we're not sure. As a lawyer, I could say on the one hand and on the other hand. They're not at all covered by the Ontario Labour Relations Act, which generally regulates activities of trade unions. However, we feel they do the same sorts of things as trade unions and come within the purpose and intent of the legislation. So in answer to your question, we will ensure that they do in fact qualify, possibly through a regulation clarifying the matter.

The Chair: Are the committee members satisfied with the answer?

Mr Phillips: I used the teachers as one example. I believe there are lots of other groups out there. I just want to make sure that groups like teachers are covered by the legislation.

Mr Sholtack: We have to look at the whole area to make sure they all come within. Different organizations are there for different purposes. From our review of the statute that covers the teachers' federation, the School Boards and Teachers Collective Negotiations Act, it's the same sort of legislation as the OLRA, authorizing the federation and the affiliates to do the same sorts of things, bargain with school boards. As such, we consider the provincial level association of teachers similar to trade unions.

Mr Carr: If I'm a particular organization, who do I go to now to get clarification? It's obviously a policy decision. What ministry do I go to? Are you going to decide through the regulation? Who is going to have the final decision on this if I'm Mr Joe Blow out there who says, "My group qualifies"? Where does the buck stop?

Mr Sholtack: The Minister of Revenue is charged with the administration of the statute. However, policy is made at treasury. The minister, in consultation with treasury, will give a ruling to particular organizations.

Mr Carr: Are there going to be any formal procedures towards that? How do you see it working and how would one proceed with that?

The Chair: Are you talking—

Mr Carr: It was a question. I think we got a handoff, but it got fumbled.

The Chair: Are you finished your question?

Mr Carr: Yes. I'll ask it again. My question was, who—

The Chair: I thought you were looking for me to answer it. I was listening.

Mr Carr: I see them looking at each other. I didn't mean to be so difficult.

Mr Sholtack: Maybe Mr Evans would like to set out the administrative approach.

Mr Carr: The question was, I'm an organization that now may or may not be covered. It's up to treasury and the Ministry of Revenue. Who do I go to and what's the formal process?

Mr Evans: You will go to the Ministry of Revenue. The Ministry of Revenue, within the framework of the legislation, will have guidelines it will operate under. In the event that the application is clear in relation to the guidelines, we would make a recommendation to the Minister of Revenue.

In the event that we had a situation that was not clear within those guidelines in the regulations, we would take that, as Mr Sholtack has described, to the Minister of Revenue and to treasury to seek clarification. You may have an extension of the regulations through the experiences we have, but essentially it will be within the domain of the Minister of Revenue to provide a response to the applicants as to whether they qualify or not.

Mr Carr: Briefly, what guidelines would you be looking for, what criteria? Could you just lay them out?

Mr Evans: The criteria we will be dealing with will be those that render the application of the act, the achievement of the goals and the intent of the act practical—they will therefore probably relate to the size of the organization so that they have a prospect of creating the appropriate size of capital pool—and whether they are in fact bona fide organizations for purposes that are similar to labour organizations and established trade unions. What we would be looking for is to avoid organizations that appear to have been created for the specific purposes of attracting tax credits for the proposal. So we'll be looking for the extent to which they are bona fide organizations of a similar nature.

Mr Carr: So the minister is going to interpret it rather broadly, other than the fact that somebody who's in it just to get tax credits and beat the system obviously will not. But in terms of legitimate groups, what you're saying is it will be interpreted widely.

Mr Evans: We will have to interpret it consistent with our expectation of what the federal legislation will also allow. That will be one of the guidelines, because we do have federal administration of this bill and we must be sensitive to that fact as well.

Mr Sutherland: I think it might be important to clarify here. Mr Phillips, you brought up the example of teachers. When you asked that, my impression was you were asking for those similar labour organizations that may not fit specifically under the definition of "union" but are really labour organizations, such as the the teachers' federation. In your definition, though, when you talk about other organizations, you're still referring to those that are within a labour framework such as teachers' federations and not just broad organizations in general?

Mr Phillips: All of this is just, I guess, reinforcement. My feeling is it would be in everyone's interest to approve the amendment we proposed, because what I just heard was that you will use the regulation process to identify other associations of employees that may qualify for this.

When I had the original briefing with the staff, they said, "We can only go by"—I think they said—"the federal definition of a trade union." Now I'm hearing something different, that is, that the government's prepared to accept trade unions or other organizations as prescribed in the regulations.

I just wonder why we don't make it easier on all of us by giving the government the latitude to be able to do that in regulation rather than handcuffing the government by the employee organization being only those kinds of very formal definitions that are in the government motion. I don't know why we wouldn't try and get around this problem—regulations are going to have to be put out anyway for the teachers' organizations—by just going back to our original motion.

Mr Johnson: If I could just give some additional background to the reasons why we wouldn't agree to the motion to expand the eligibility of employee organization, let's start with the Treasurer has deemed that broadening the eligibility parameters to establish labour-sponsored investment fund corporations is inadvisable at this time because this is a new type of program. We do not know how popular it will be or what the takeup will be. Broadening it greatly at the onset could result in a proliferation of very small LSIFs without enough funds. Of course, if they are too small, they wouldn't be viable for investors or for the business to meet the program's objectives, which are to create new sources of equity funding for small and medium-sized businesses in Ontario.

1600

Another point is that the government would also like to maintain control of the size of the program and the level of revenue involved. Broadening it greatly would make this impossible. Of course, there are risks. Established long-term and large entities sponsoring and managing LSIFs will reduce risk to investors of failure of the fund.

The opposition mentions often that they want to know why or whether we should adopt the Saskatchewan approach and simply let virtually any employee organization establish an LSIF. There are some reasons why we don't want to do that. The government has elected to restrict the meaning of employee organization with respect to the LSIF component of Bill 150 for several reasons. These include the newness of the program for Ontario. There is a need to establish a body of experience on the administration of this program before any substantive expansion is undertaken.

The government also views worker cooperatives, or teachers' federations for example, as being very similar to trade unions in many respects and therefore they do not represent an inconsistent expansion of the original legislative provision.

From the perspective of the original policy objectives for this program, allowing the creation of a potentially wide range of very small investment funds may actually be counterproductive and the risks to investors of fund dissolution will be minimized by restricting the creation of these investment funds to establish long-term entities.

I understand that we have received today preliminary advice from Finance Canada that the federal government will be prepared to match and prescribe worker cooperatives as proposed under the amendments to Bill 150. I would also, however, note that this is still subject to formal written confirmation.

I note, for the committee's reference, that looking to Saskatchewan or other provinces as a precedent for federal-Ontario tax policy arrangements is not always relevant. Ontario has a history, perhaps because of its size, of being treated somewhat differently from other provinces in federal-provincial matters. A case in point would be in 1988, when Ontario sought the federal government's approval to introduce a flat tax identical in structure to flat taxes in place at the time in Saskatchewan and Manitoba. When it was Ontario asking, the answer was no. In fact a moratorium was imposed by the federal government on the introduction of any new flat taxes.

The government is therefore satisfied that the proposed definition of employee organization for LSIF purposes is both reasonable and prudent for the time being. The government does not, however, preclude at some future point, after some necessary experience on this program has been gained, a wider range of employee organizations which may establish LSIFs.

Mr Phillips: I don't know whether you think we're stupid, but we're not, and what staff just said was that you're going to include teachers in this, for example. If they are not deemed legally to be a trade union, I don't know how you're going to include them, other than through regulation.

Mr Johnson: But I think—

Mr Phillips: Let me finish. As I see this, you don't have the authority to do that. All I'm suggesting is that you give yourself the authority to do it. I'm getting frustrated about this. We have sent out a letter to the federal government about the co-ops. I want to be assured, because Mr Sutherland said you've had an opinion about the Saskatchewan thing. I'd like that in writing, as I said before, and I hope we will get it.

If teachers aren't a trade union, an association or federation of trade unions or an association or federation of worker co-ops, the way I read the legislation, you don't have the authority to include them. I'm saying, "Why don't you give yourself the authority?"

Mr Sutherland: I stand to be corrected, but my understanding of the interpretation was that there is potential for the teachers to be included, possibly under regulation. I assume too, though, that again it would be subject, as Mr Evans has pointed out, to what the federal government is willing to allow and concede. So it may be subject to that as well, whether they would accept that as a definition as they have on the basis of the worker co-ops.

The Chair: Mr Owens, did you have something to add to that?

Mr Owens: I'm just sitting here looking at groups like the Ontario Secondary School Teachers' Federation, the Ontario English Catholic Teachers' Association and others, confused as to why they wouldn't be captured by the definition that currently exists in this proposed piece of legislation. I suppose the question could then be ventured, what about a group like the Ontario Medical Association that is now applying the Rand formula to its members? Are they now classed as being eligible under this particular bill? I don't think so.

In terms of how the teachers' unions, as I've always addressed them as, function in terms of their responsibilities and the ability to access the grievance arbitration process, which is clearly covered by the Labour Relations Act, it's my humble opinion that these groups are captured. I don't think I've heard yet a definitive opinion that no, they're not eligible for this particular bill.

Mr Phillips: I think the staff said they don't know. That's what they came back and said.

Mr Owens: That's not no.

Mr Phillips: I understand that, but if down the road they are not under the legal definition of a union, then we have to come back and amend the damned bill. Why don't you just give yourself the latitude so that you can by regulation say they are included?

Mr Sholtack: I think what I said was that it isn't clear, and we will ensure that it is clear. If they're clearly not trade unions, then we don't have the authority, as you say. But it's my view that the issue is not clear. There is a certain uncertainty.

Mr Phillips: I agree totally with you.

Mr Sholtack: As such there is authority to clarify, because the cabinet has the authority to define terms and expressions.

Mr Phillips: It has the authority to define who an employee organization is?

Mr Sholtack: No, not an employee organization—that's already defined in the act—but to clarify terms under the definition of trade union.

Mr Phillips: Where is the definition of trade union?

Mr Sholtack: Specifically if I could refer you to the definition of trade union in section 1 of the bill, that is not a proposed amendment; it's set out in the bill itself.

Mr Phillips: Just tell me where it is.

Mr Sholtack: It's on page 5. "Trade union" means, in one of the parts, "a designated or certified provincial employee bargaining agency..." In my view, that term is broad enough to be defined to include the teachers' federation, which is so close to being a trade union that it would not be out of line to do that. But as the member said, it can't be expanded that much to include, for example, the Ontario Medical Association. It's still within the context of what a trade union is, and the teachers' federation does the sorts of things trade unions do.

Mr Owens: I would like to follow up on this question. What would then be the view of Revenue should this bill pass as it is? What would your view be in terms of OSSTF approaching you on Monday or whenever and saying, "We want to set up one of these LSIFs"? Would Revenue be of the view that the enabling language is there?

Mr Evans: Under the section of the act Mr Sholtack has just described, I think the interpretation we would take would cause us to recommend to the minister that it would be eligible.

Mr Brad Ward (Brantford): I think Mr Phillips's concern is to broaden the definition, and he just used the teachers' federation as one example. My colleague Mr Johnson here quite clearly explained why the government would be reluctant to do that at this time. This is a new initiative. We have the Canadian Federation of Labour, which is ready to go under this bill with its fund. I can't think of any other organizations that are as far ahead as the federation of labour.

Since this is a new initiative I think, as Mr Johnson said, we want to take it a little bit slowly and ensure we're doing it properly. There will be room, as the success of this initiative develops, for expanding the definitions in conjunction and cooperation with, I'm assuming, the federal government, at a later date.

1610

Section 1:

The Chair: Are we ready to go on to the amendments, subsection 1(1) of the bill?

Mr Johnson moves that the definition of "employee organization" in subsection 1(1) of the bill be struck out and the following substituted:

"employee organization" means,

"(a) a trade union,

"(b) an association or federation of trade unions, or

"(c) an association or federation of worker cooperatives."

Mr Johnson: I think the explanation is quite clear.

The Chair: Is there any further comment or debate? Mr Owens.

Mr Owens: In terms of the inclusion of the worker cooperative section, I think this is a great step forward for this group. I know they've worked long and hard, especially Mr John Brouwer, the president of the Ontario Worker Co-op Association. I know he's quite pleased to see this amendment and I'm quite pleased to assist him in having this amendment added.

Mr Phillips: This isn't contingent, though, on federal government approval, is it? This stands alone.

Mr Evans: I understand from what Mr Johnson shared with us earlier in response to a question that we have had a communication from the federal government which confirms that it will match the credit. We are merely waiting at this time for the written confirmation of that decision.

Mr Phillips: Good.

The Chair: Okay. Is the committee ready to vote? All in favour of the amendments? Those against?

Section 1, as amended, agreed to.

Section 7:

The Chair: Now we'll be going on to, I believe, section 7, clause 7(1)(b).

Mr Johnson moves that clause 7(1)(b) of the bill be struck out and the following substituted:

"(b) the corporation fails to file the material required by this act or the regulations."

Mr Johnson: Explanatory note: The amendment removes the reference to a certified employee group and is consequential upon the proposed amendments to section 4.

The Chair: Comments or debate. The committee is ready for the vote. All in favour of the amendment? Opposed?

Motion agreed to.

The Chair: Does subsection 7(2) carry? Carried. The next amendment is to subsection 7(3).

Mr Johnson moves that subsection 7(3) of the bill be amended by striking out "the eligible business or the employee group" in the fourth and fifth lines and substituting "or the eligible business."

Mr Johnson: Explanatory note: The amendment removes the reference to an employee group and is consequential upon the proposed amendments to section 4.

The Chair: Comments or debate? The committee is ready to vote. All in favour? Opposed?

Motion agreed to.

Section 7, as amended, agreed to.

Section 8:

The Chair: Mr Johnson moves that section 8 of the bill be amended by striking out "the corporation and the employee group comply" in the first and second lines and substituting "the corporation complies."

Mr Johnson: Explanatory note: The amendment removes the reference to an employee group and is consequential upon the proposed amendments to section 4.

The Chair: Comments or debate? Is the committee ready for the vote? All in favour of the amendment? Opposed?

Motion agreed to.

Section 8, as amended, agreed to.

Sections 9 to 11, inclusive, agreed to.

Section 12:

The Chair: Mr Johnson moves that section 12 of the bill be amended by adding the following definition:

"'qualifying debt obligation' means a debt obligation that, if secured, is secured solely by a floating charge on the assets of the entity or a debt obligation in respect of which a guarantee has been given."

Mr Johnson: Explanatory note: This defines "qualifying debt obligation" for the purposes of determining whether an investment by a labour-sponsored investment fund corporation is an eligible investment under the act. This definition parallels the provisions in the federal LSVCC program.

The Chair: Comments or debate? The committee is ready to vote. All those in favour of the amendment? Opposed?

Motion agreed to.

The Chair: Mr Johnson moves that clause 12(c) of the bill be amended by striking out "$35,000,000" in the fourth line and substituting "$50,000,000."

Mr Johnson: Explanatory note: The amendment will implement the Treasurer's 1992 budget proposal to permit investment by labour-sponsored investment fund corporations and eligible businesses having not more than $50 million in assets. The original limit was $35 million in assets.

The Chair: Comments or debate? The committee is ready to vote. All those in favour of this amendment? Opposed?

Motion agreed to.

Section 12, as amended, agreed to.

Section 13:

The Chair: Mr Johnson moves that subsection 13(1) of the bill be amended by,

(a) adding after "if" in the fifth line "the corporation has a permanent establishment in Ontario and"; and

(b) striking out "and has a permanent establishment in Ontario" in the third and fourth lines of clause (b).

Mr Johnson: Explanatory note: The amendments clarify that every corporation applying for registration as a labour-sponsored investment fund corporation must have a permanent establishment in Ontario.

The Chair: Comments or debate? This committee is ready for the vote. All in favour of the amendment? Opposed?

Motion agreed to.

Section 13, as amended, agreed to.

Section 14:

The Chair: Mr Johnson moves that subclause 14(1)(d)(i) of the bill be struck out and the following substituted:

"(i) assisting the development of eligible businesses, creating, maintaining and protecting jobs by providing financial and managerial advice to eligible businesses and by providing capital to eligible businesses through the acquisition and holding of shares and qualifying debt obligations issued by eligible businesses that are corporations, and ownership interests of and qualifying debt obligations issued by eligible businesses that are Canadian partnerships, as permitted under this act, and."

Mr Johnson: Explanatory note: Changes to the references to voting shares and unsecured debt obligations to shares and qualifying debt obligations for the purposes of describing the types of investments in which a labour-sponsored investment fund corporation may invest. Labour-sponsored investment fund corporations will be able to invest in both voting and non-voting shares of eligible businesses and in the same type of debt obligations of eligible business which are permitted under the federal LSVCC program.

1620

The Chair: Comments or debate? How does the committee vote, in favour of the amendment? Against?

Motion agreed to.

The Chair: Mr Johnson moves that paragraphs 1 and 2 of sub-subclause 14(1)(e)(i)(D) of the bill be struck out and the following substituted:

"1. The holder of the share receives an amount on the redemption that does not exceed the amount that would otherwise have been payable on the redemption less an amount equal to 20% or, if a percentage has been prescribed, the prescribed percentage of the lesser of,

“(a) the amount of equity capital received by the corporation on the original issue of the share, or

“(b) the amount that would otherwise have been payable on the redemption, and

“2. the corporation remits to the minister an amount equal to the amount required to be deducted under paragraph 1 in the calculation of the amount receivable by the holder of the share on the redemption.”

Mr Johnson: Explanatory note: The amendment provides that where the fair market value of the class A shares of a labour-sponsored investment fund corporation has declined below the issue price of the shares, the recapture of the tax credit from the shareholder on a early redemption of a class A share will be proportionately less than the full amount of the tax credit originally paid on the share.

The Chair: Comments or debate? Are we ready for the vote? All in favour of the amendment? Against?

Motion agreed to.

The Chair: Mr Johnson moves that subclause 14(1)(e)(iii) of the bill, exclusive of the sub-subclauses, be struck out and the following substituted:

“(iii) the corporation shall not register a transfer by the original purchaser, or by a registered retirement savings plan under which the original purchaser or the original purchaser's spouse is the annuitant, of a class A share in respect of which an investment certificate has been issued under this act, except if the transfer occurs more than five years after the date on which the share was issued, or the amount if any payable under subsection 27(2) to the minister has been paid, or if the corporation is notified in writing that the share is being transferred.”

Mr Johnson: Explanatory note: The addition of the words, “or the amount if any payable under subsection 27(2) to the minister has been paid,” clarifies that a transfer of a class A share of a labour-sponsored investment fund corporation may be registered if any tax credit recapture arising on the transfer has been paid to the minister.

The Chair: Comments or debate? All those in favour of the amendment? Those opposed?

Motion agreed to.

The Chair: Mr Johnson moves that clause 14(1)(f) of the bill be struck out and the following substituted:

“(f) the articles of incorporation prohibit the corporation from lending money, guaranteeing a loan or providing other financial assistance to a shareholder of the corporation, to a person related to a shareholder of the corporation or to an employee organization.”

Mr Johnson: Explanatory note: The amendment removes the reference to employee groups and is consequential upon the proposed amendments to section 4 which eliminate employee groups.

The Chair: Comments or debate? All in favour of this amendment? Those opposed?

Motion agreed to.

Section 14, as amended, agreed to.

Sections 15 to 17, inclusive, agreed to.

Section 18:

The Chair: Mr Johnson moves that clause 18(1)(b) of the bill be struck out and the following substituted:

“(b) the investment is the purchase from the eligible business by the labour sponsored investment fund corporation of,

“(i) shares or a qualifying debt obligation issued by the eligible business in exchange for a consideration paid in money, if the eligible business is a corporation, or

“(ii) an ownership interest in the eligible business or a qualifying debt obligation issued by the eligible business in exchange for a consideration paid in money, if the eligible business is a Canadian partnership.”

Mr Johnson: Explanatory note: The amendments permit labour-sponsored investment fund corporations to invest in voting and non-voting shares as well as debt obligations issued by an eligible business which are secured by a floating charge or in respect of which a guarantee has been given. As such debt obligations are eligible investments of federally registered labour-sponsored venture capital corporations. The amendment is required in order that corporations may register under and comply with both the federal program and the Ontario program. Without the amendment, only voting shares and unsecured debt obligations would be eligible investments for labour-sponsored investment fund corporations.

The Chair: Comments or debate? How does the committee vote? In favour of the amendment? Against?

Motion agreed to.

The Chair: Mr Johnson moves that clauses 18(1)(c) and (d) of the bill be struck out and the following substituted:

“(c) the labour sponsored investment fund corporation does not control the eligible business after the investment is made.”

Mr Johnson: Explanatory note: The amendment clarifies that a labour-sponsored investment fund corporation will be entitled to own a majority ownership interest in an eligible business as long as it does not have control of the eligible business, as defined in subsection 1(3) of the bill.

The Chair: Comments or debate? Committee votes in favour of the amendment? Against?

Motion agreed to.

The Chair: Mr Johnson moves that subsection 18(5) of the bill be amended by striking out “or (d)” in the fourth line.

Mr Johnson: Explanatory note: The amendment removes the reference to clause 18(1)(d) and is consequential upon the amendment to strike out that clause.

The Chair: Comments or debate? Committee votes in favour of the amendment? Against?

Motion agreed to.

Section 18, as amended, agreed to.

Section 19 agreed to.

Section 20:

The Chair: Mr Johnson moves that subsection 20(2) of the bill be struck out and the following substituted:

"Idem

"(2) A labour sponsored investment fund corporation shall not invest or maintain an investment in a business that is or was at any time an eligible business if,

"(a) the labour sponsored investment fund corporation controls the business; or

"(b) as a result of the investment, the labour sponsored investment fund corporation would have invested more than $10,000,000 in the business."

Mr Johnson: Explanatory note: The amendment clarifies that a labour-sponsored investment fund corporation will be entitled to own a majority interest in an eligible business as long as it does not have control of the eligible business, as defined in subsection 1(3) of the bill.

The Chair: Comments or debate? Committee votes in favour of the amendment? Against?

Motion agreed to.

The Chair: Mr Johnson moves that subsection 20(3) of the bill be amended by striking out "Clause (2)(a), (b) or (c)" in the first line and substituting "Clause 2(a)."

Mr Johnson: Explanatory note: The amendment is consequential upon the amendment to subsection 20(2) which renumbered the clauses in subsection 20(2).

The Chair: Comments or debate? Committee votes in favour of this amendment? Against?

Motion agreed to.

Section 20, as amended, agreed to.

Sections 21 to 24, inclusive, agreed to.

1630

Section 25:

The Chair: Mr Johnson moves that clause 25(4)(b) of the bill be struck out and the following substituted:

"(b) $3,500, if the class A shares were paid for after the 6th day of November, 1991, and before the 1st day of March, 1992, or $5,000, if the class A shares were paid for after the 31st day of December, 1991, with no labour sponsored venture capital corporation tax credit deducted in respect of the shares in the determination of tax payable under the Income Tax Act for the 1991 taxation year."

Mr Johnson: Explanatory note: The amendment would implement the Treasurer's 1992 budget proposal to increase the maximum annual investment in labour sponsored investment fund corporations that is eligible for a tax credit for the year from $3,500 to $5,000 for 1992 and subsequent taxation years.

The Chair: Committee votes for the amendment? Against?

Motion agreed to.

Section 25, as amended, agreed to.

Section 26:

The Chair: Mr Johnson moves that clause 26(1)(c) of the bill be struck out and the following substituted:

"(c) the labour sponsored venture capital corporation is registered under part II and becomes a party to a transaction or a series of transactions that result or would result in a direct or indirect change of control of the labour sponsored venture capital corporation, including an amalgamation, merger, arrangement or winding up of the corporation, unless,

"(i) the date of the transaction or the first transaction in the series of transactions is at least five years after the last date on which a class A share was issued by the corporation, or

"(ii) the action has been approved in advance by the Employee Ownership Advisory Board and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Technology."

Mr Johnson: Explanatory note: The amendment provides that any change in the control of an employee ownership labour-sponsored venture capital corporation within five years of the last issue of shares must be approved by the Employee Ownership Advisory Board and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Technology.

The Chair: All in favour of the amendment? Against?

Motion agreed to.

The Chair: Mr Johnson moves that clause 26(1)(e) of the bill be amended by striking out "or employee group" in the fifth line.

Mr Johnson: Explanatory note: The amendment removes a reference to an employee group and is consequential upon the proposed amendments to section 4.

The Chair: All in favour of the amendment? Against?

Motion agreed to.

Section 26, as amended, agreed to.

Section 27:

The Chair: Mr Johnson moves that clause 27(1)(b) of the bill be amended by striking out "fair value" in the ninth line and substituting "fair market value."

Mr Johnson: Explanatory note: The amendment clarifies that the amount referred to is the fair market value of the class A share.

The Chair: All those in favour of the amendment? Against?

Motion agreed to.

The Chair: Mr Johnson moves that clauses 27(2)(a) and (b) of the bill be struck out and the following substituted:

"(a) if the share was issued by a corporation registered under part II, the tax credit percentage of the lesser of the amount of equity capital for which the share was originally issued or the fair market value of the share at the date of the transfer unless the share is being transferred under circumstances set out in sub-subclause 6(1)(e)(iii)(A), (B), (C) or (D); or

"(b) if the share was issued by a corporation registered under part III, 20 per cent or the prescribed percentage if a percentage has been prescribed, of the lesser of the amount of equity capital for which the share was originally issued or the fair market value of the share at the date of the transfer, unless the share is being transferred under circumstances set out in sub-subclause 14(1)(e)(iii)(A), (B) or (C)."

Mr Johnson: Explanatory note: The amendment provides that where the fair market value of the class A shares of an employee ownership labour-sponsored venture capital corporation or of a labour-sponsored investment fund corporation has declined below the issue price of the shares, any recapture of the tax credit arising by reason of the non-exempt transfer of the share by the shareholder before the expiry of the five-year holding period will be proportionately less than the full amount of the tax credit.

The Chair: All those in favour of the amendment? Against?

Motion agreed to.

The Chair: Mr Johnson moves that subsection 27(4) of the bill be struck out and the following substituted:

"Idem, liability of holder

"(4) If a person as the holder of a class A share issued by a labour sponsored venture capital corporation within the immediately preceding five years receives an amount in respect of the reduction of the stated capital account attributable to the class A shares, other than by way of a redemption of the class A shares, the person shall immediately pay to the minister an amount of money equal to,

"(a) if the share was issued by a corporation registered under part II, the tax credit percentage applied to the amount so received; or

"(b) if the share was issued by a corporation registered under part III, 20% of the amount received or, if a percentage has been prescribed, the prescribed percentage of the amount received."

Mr Johnson: Explanatory note: The amendment clarifies that reductions of stated capital other than by way of share redemptions are contemplated by subsection 27(4), and that any recapture of tax credits from shareholders on such reductions of stated capital will not include any amount representing any federal tax credits provided on the purchase of labour-sponsored investment fund corporation shares.

The Chair: All those in favour? Against?

Motion agreed to.

Section 27, as amended, agreed to.

Section 28:

The Chair: Mr Johnson moves that section 28 of the bill be amended by striking out subsection (2).

Mr Johnson: Explanatory note: The amendment eliminates interest on the refundable penalty imposed on labour-sponsored venture capital corporations which fail to meet the minimum level of eligible investments required under the act.

The Chair: All in favour? Against?

Motion agreed to.

Section 28, as amended, agreed to.

Section 29:

The Chair: Mr Johnson moves that subsection 29(1) of the bill be struck out and the following substituted:

"(1) An amount payable under this act to the minister or the crown by a labour sponsored venture capital corporation or any other corporation shall be deemed to be a tax imposed on the corporation under part II of the Corporations Tax Act, payable on the date the liability arises, for the purposes of collection and enforcement under that act."

Mr Johnson: Explanatory note: The amendment clarifies that no interest is payable on tax credits recaptured under the act and that amounts owing under the act will be deemed to be tax owing under the Corporations Tax Act, only for the purpose of authorizing the minister to use the legal remedies available under that act to enforce collection of the debt.

The Chair: All in favour of the amendments? Against?

Motion agreed to.

Section 29, as amended, agreed to.

Section 30 agreed to.

Section 31:

The Chair: Mr Johnson moves that subsection 31(1) of the bill be amended by striking out clause (a).

Mr Johnson: Explanatory note: The amendment removes provisions relating to employee groups and is consequential upon the proposed amendments to section 4.

The Chair: Everyone in favour of the amendment? Against?

Motion agreed to.

The Chair: Mr Johnson moves that subsection 31(2) of the bill be struck out and the following substituted:

"Service of notice of proposal

"(2) The minister shall serve the notice under subsection (1) upon the corporation in the prescribed manner, together with written reasons for the proposal."

Mr Johnson: Explanatory note: The amendment removes provisions relating to employee groups and is consequential upon the proposed amendments to section 4.

The Chair: All those in favour of the amendment? Against?

Motion agreed to.

Section 31, as amended, agreed to.

Section 32:

The Chair: Mr Johnson moves that section 32 of the bill be amended by adding the following subsection:

"Inquiry by commission or director

"(8) The commission or the director, as the case requires, has all the powers of the commission under parts III and VI of the Securities Act for the purposes of an inquiry by either of them upon being authorized under subsection (4), and for the purpose references to the Securities Act shall be deemed to refer to this act and references in that act to securities shall be deemed to include class A shares and any other shares of a prescribed class of a specified employee ownership corporation."

Mr Johnson: Explanatory note: The amendment provides that where the minister designates the Ontario Securities Commission or the director of the OSC to make inquiries to ensure compliance with the act and regulations, the commission and director will have the same administrative, investigative and enforcement powers that may be exercised under parts III and VI of the Securities Act.

The Chair: Comments or debate? All in favour of the amendment? Against?

Motion agreed to.

Section 32, as amended, agreed to.

Section 33 agreed to.

1640

Section 34:

The Chair: Mr Johnson moves that subsection 34(1) of the bill be amended by striking out "or" at the end of clause (b) and adding the following clauses:

"(d) fails to comply with an order, decision, direction, requirement or demand made under this act or the regulations; or

"(e) contravenes this act or the regulations."

Mr Johnson: Explanatory note: The amendment is consequential upon the amendments to add an investor protection code by regulation under the act in respect of employee ownership labour-sponsored venture capital corporations. The purpose of the amendment is to provide that failure to abide by any order, requirement, decision, direction or demand made under the act or the regulations will be an offence which may be prosecuted under the act.

The Chair: Comments or debate? All in favour of the amendment? Against?

Motion agreed to.

The Chair: Mr Johnson moves that section 34 of the bill be amended by adding the following subsection:

"Penalty, disclosure document

"(2.1) Every person convicted of an offence described in clause (1)(a) in respect of a disclosure document is liable on conviction to a fine of not less than $5,000 and not more than $1,000,000 or to imprisonment for a term of not more than two years, or both such fine and imprisonment, and not as provided in subsection (2)."

Mr Johnson: Explanatory note: The amendment provides for a higher maximum penalty for false or misleading statements in disclosure documents since eligible employees will rely on information provided in disclosure documents in making the decision of whether to proceed to invest in the employee ownership labour-sponsored venture capital corporation.

The Chair: Comments or debate? All those in favour of the amendment? Against?

Motion agreed to.

The Chair: Mr Johnson moves that the bill be amended by adding the following sections:

"Application to court by minister

"34.1(1) The minister may apply to the Ontario Court (General Division) for an order against a person who fails to comply with or contravenes this act or the regulations.

"Nature of order

"(2) An order under subsection (1) may direct the person to comply with, or may restrain the person from contravening, one or more specific provisions of this act or the regulations, or the court may make such further or other order as the court considers appropriate in the circumstances.

"Persons affected by order

"(3) An order under subsection (1) may be directed also to any one or more of,

"(a) the directors and senior officers of the person if the person is a corporation;

"(b) the partners, if the person is a partnership;

"(c) the members who comprise the person, if the person is an unincorporated association, unincorporated syndicate, unincorporated organization or a trust;

"(d) the directors and senior officers of a corporation that is a partner or member mentioned in clause (b) or (c); and

"(e) the partners of a partnership that is a member mentioned in clause (c).

"Effect of other remedy or penalty

"(4) An order may be made under subsection (1) despite any other remedy or penalty under this act or the Securities Act.

"Appeal

"(5) An appeal lies to the Divisional Court from an order under subsection (1).

"Cease trade order

"34.2(1) The minister, in the circumstances specified in subsection (2), may order that trading cease in respect of the class A shares or any of them or any other shares of a prescribed class of an employee ownership labour sponsored venture capital corporation for such a period of time as is specified in the order.

"Conditions precedent

"(2) The minister may make an order under subsection (1) on the recommendation of the director or if the minister is entitled under this act to revoke the corporation's registration under this act.

"Limitations

"(3) An order under subsection (1) may be made subject to such limitations as the minister imposes when making the order.

"Appeal

"(4) An appeal lies to the Divisional Court from an order under subsection (1).

"Designation by minister

"34.3 The minister may designate the commission, the director, or another person to exercise the powers of the minister under sections 34.1 or 34.2.

"Application of part V of Securities Act

"34.4 Part V of the Securities Act applies to a decision of the director in respect of an employee ownership labour sponsored venture capital corporation or the shares of such a corporation in the same manner as for a decision of the director referred to in that part and, for the purpose, a reference to the minister shall be deemed to be a reference to the Minister of Financial Institutions.

"Disclosure document

"34.5(1) A specified employee ownership corporation or selling security holder on whose behalf a distribution of Class A shares or shares of a prescribed class is made shall send a disclosure document by prepaid mail to the purchaser of each such share either before or forthwith after agreeing to sell the share to the purchaser.

"Delivery

"(2) A disclosure document sent by prepaid mail in accordance with subsection (1) shall be deemed conclusively to have been received in the ordinary course by mail by the person to whom it was addressed.

"Civil liability

"34.6 (1) A purchaser of a Class A share of an employee ownership labour sponsored venture capital corporation or of a share of a prescribed class of such corporation who suffers a loss due to misrepresentation in the disclosure document by which the share was offered has a right of action for damages for the loss.

“Reliance on misrepresentation

“(2) For the purposes of subsection (1), the purchaser shall be deemed to have relied on the misrepresentation in purchasing the share.

“Other right

“(3) The right of action under subsection (1) is in addition to and without derogation from any other right the purchaser may have at law other than the right of rescission provided in subsection (6).

“Persons liable

“(4) Subsection (1) applies only if the share was purchased during the prescribed period of distribution of such shares and the misrepresentation was a misrepresentation at the time of purchase of the share.

“Idem

“(5) The right of action under subsection (1) lies against,

“(a) the employee ownership labour sponsored venture capital corporation, or the security holder, on whose behalf the distribution is made;

“(b) every person who was a director of the employee ownership labour sponsored venture capital corporation at the time the disclosure document was filed with the director;

“(c) every person whose consent has been filed with the minister or the commission in compliance with the regulations, but only with respect to any report, opinion or statement made by the person; and

“(d) any other person who signed this disclosure document.

“Rescission

“(6) The purchaser may elect to rescind the purchase of the share, if the share was purchased from the employee ownership labour sponsored venture capital corporation or the security holder on whose behalf the distribution was made, in which case subsection (1) does not apply in respect of the corporation or security holder, but the right of rescission is in addition to and without derogation from any other right the purchaser may have at law.

“Application of Securities Act

“(7) Subsections 130(2) to (9) of the Securities Act apply with necessary modifications in respect of an action under this section and, for the purpose, a reference to a prospectus shall be deemed to be a reference to a disclosure document.

“Time limit, rescission

“(8) No action to rescind the purchase of a share mentioned in this section shall be commenced later than 180 days after the date of the transaction that gave rise to the cause of action.

“Time limit, other

“(9) No action mentioned in this section, other than to rescind the purchase of a share, shall be commenced later than the earlier of,

“(a) 180 days after the plaintiff first had knowledge of the facts giving rise to the cause of action; or “(b) three years after the date of the transaction that gave rise to the cause of action.

“Transitional rule

“(10) This section does not apply in respect of an employee ownership labour sponsored venture capital corporation and each selling security holder of the employee ownership labour sponsored venture capital corporation in respect of sales of securities occurring after the date that the corporation becomes a reporting issuer.”

1650

Mr Johnson: Explanatory note: The proposed amendments implement and support the proposed investor protection provisions.

Section 34.1 authorizes the minister to apply for a court order requiring compliance with the provisions of the act and regulations.

Section 34.2 permits the minister to issue a cease trading order on the recommendation of the director of the OSC or if the registration of the LSVCC may be revoked for non-compliance with the act.

Section 34.3 authorizes the minister to designate the OSC or the director of the OSC to exercise the minister's powers to apply for the court order under section 34.1 or to issue a cease trading order under section 34.2.

Section 34.4 provides for an appeal from an order made by the director of the OSC.

Section 34.5 requires the provision of a disclosure document in respect of shares of employee ownership labour-sponsored venture capital corporations.

Section 34.6 provides legal remedies to an investor in respect of any misrepresentations made in a disclosure document relating to shares of employee ownership labour-sponsored venture capital corporations.

The Vice-Chair: We'll give Mr Johnson a second here to catch his breath after that. I guess we can then see if we're ready to have any debate on these several sections.

Interjections.

The Chair: Any comments or debate?

Mr Phillips: I didn't hear all that. Could we have that read again?

The Chair: I missed it. I was out of the room, Mr Phillips. I'm in the same situation. I guess the committee's ready for the vote. All in favour of the amendments? Against?

Motion agreed to.

Section 34, as amended, agreed to.

Section 35:

The Chair: Mr Kwinter moves that the bill be amended by adding the following section:

“Review

“35.1(1) The minister shall initiate a review of the operation of this act if the amount of tax revenue forgone by Ontario from the issuing of tax credit for investments in employee ownership labour sponsored venture capital corporations and labour sponsored investment fund corporations exceeds $250,000,000 in any year.

“Scope

“(2) The review shall examine,

“(a) whether the cost of the program exceeded the benefits derived;

“(b) the level of the investment credit; and

“(c) the government’s monitoring mechanisms to prevent fraud and misuse of the program.

“Report

“(3) The report of the review may make recommendations to the minister as to any changes to this or any other act to improve compliance by eligible investors and to limit the cost of the program.”

Mr Kwinter: If I can just elaborate, this is in keeping with some of the concerns expressed this morning that if this program should be found by investors who have no interest in the program per se but who use it as a vehicle for avoiding tax—it would seem to me that the government has made a projection as to what the level of the forgoing of taxes will be in order for this program to be implemented and by calling for this review, if it is found that the program in fact has a larger amount of tax forgoance, there is a vehicle whereby someone can take a look at it and make adjustments or cancel the program and do whatever they have to do.

I think it’s important that there be some provision to allow that to happen just in case we have to have a similar program to the scientific research, which turned into a real boondoggle and cost the taxpayers of Canada hundreds of millions of dollars without any benefits.

The Chair: Any comments or debate?

Mr David Christopherson (Hamilton Centre): The government understands the spirit of this proposed amendment. In fact, treasury board was recently established by this government and one of its major ongoing functions is to review the appropriateness and cost-effectiveness of all the government’s programs including tax expenditure programs. For example, treasury board in the past year reviewed over 20 programs.

Therefore, while we agree with the spirit of the proposed amendment, it would be redundant to introduce a special provision in this one bill. It is, in this government’s view, important to review all programs in the context of the government’s priorities and fiscal capacity. We think treasury board is best positioned to undertake these reviews.

The Chair: Any further comments or debate? Mr Kwinter.

Mr Kwinter: Yes, I’d like to respond to that. The concern I have—it’s very much like the Provincial Auditor. The Provincial Auditor does his mandated audit work and then, in the last couple of years, has undertaken an additional responsibility of taking a look at some of the transfer agencies. The auditor goes in, and quite frankly I don’t know how the selection is made, but he will go into a university, a hospital or some of the major transfer agencies and it may take him 10 or 15 years until he gets through all of them.

Notwithstanding that the treasury board is going to look at all programs, my concern is that it may get to this and it may not. It’s like estimates: Some ministries never get to estimates because, for whatever reason, there’s no real interest in pursuing it because it doesn’t appear to be an urgent public interest. My feeling is that if this is provided for in the bill, then there will be that little red flag that says we must continue to monitor this particular program, given the possibility of abuse. That is really the reason for it.

I understand your position that we monitor these things on an ongoing basis. I am concerned that it may be 20 years until they get to this particular one. By that time the horse has been stolen, the barn door is open and you sort of know about it in retrospect and say, “Gee, it’s too bad that happened.” That is really the concern I have.

The Chair: Further comments or debate? Mr Christopherson.

Mr Christopherson: It’s not that this is a bad idea. As I’ve noted, we do have a treasury board and it does review programs, even tax expenditure programs, on a regular basis. The idea of including specific programs in each spending program has merit, but it should be approached on a coordinated basis, not on an ad hoc, bill-by-bill basis.

I also remind the member that the kind of analysis being undertaken by the current treasury board, I suggest, is unlike anything that has happened in terms of its comprehensiveness, the areas it’s covered and the checks and balances that have been built into those reviews so that it’s not just a one-time shot, never to happen again for another couple of decades.

In summary, I would again acknowledge that the principle is not one we have a great deal of difficulty with, it’s the idea of putting it into each bill, one by one, on such an ad hoc basis. We really and sincerely believe that the coordinated approach treasury board can bring to these kinds of reviews is the best one for the government.

The Chair: Further comments? Mr Kwinter.

Mr Kwinter: Obviously, I don’t want to drag this on for ever, but I just want to make an additional comment. I don’t think you can categorize this particular type of bill with the normal bills, that every single bill—we can’t have a specific provision in it for review. We have to have uniformity; we have to have some coordinated effort.

I suggest in all humbleness and candour that this is not an ordinary kind of a bill. This bill is designed to do a specific thing: to encourage investment. In return for that investment, the province is prepared to forgo taxation. It is prepared to give the participants tax breaks. Those tax breaks are an inducement to get people to invest. Because of the very specific nature of this bill, it isn’t just like any other bill, it’s relatively unique. It’s a relatively unique concept where investors who invest their money in these vehicles will get tax benefits.

1700

My concern, spelled out in our amendment, is the cost of the program exceeding the benefits. Are we as taxpayers getting full value for forgoing potentially $250 million? Is it doing what it’s supposed to do? If it isn’t—and surely I don’t have to impress upon anybody in this room that the Treasurer could sorely use that $250 million in many other programs. Because of the very specific intent and the very specific nature of this bill, I think it’s incumbent upon us to monitor it far more closely than we would normal bills or normal activities or normal agencies or normal ministries.

This is a specific initiative to do a specific thing. Everybody acknowledges—and Mr Evans acknowledged earlier today that the reason they didn't want to expand the scope of the participation is because they want to monitor it very closely in case it is being abused. All I'm saying is let's put that in the bill to make sure that happens. I really can't say any more about it.

The Chair: Any further comments?

Mr Christopherson: No, thank you, Mr Chair.

The Chair: Okay, I guess the committee's ready for the vote. All those in favour of the amendment, section 35.1? All those against?

Motion negatived.

The Chair: The next one's a government motion, section 35.1.

Mr Johnson moves that the bill be amended by adding the following sections:

"No action against commission, etc.

"35.1(1) No action or other proceeding for damages shall be instituted against the commission, the director, any member, employee or agent of the commission or any person delegated to carry out any of the minister's duties or powers under this act for any act done in good faith in the execution or intended execution of his or her duty or for any alleged neglect or default in the execution in good faith of his or her duty.

"Liability of crown

"(2) Subsection (1) does not by reason of subsections 5(2) and (4) of the Proceedings Against the Crown Act relieve the crown of liability in respect of a tort committed by a person mentioned in subsection (1) to which it would otherwise be subject, and the crown is liable under the act for any such tort in a like manner as if subsection (1) had not been enacted.

"Immunity re compliance

"35.2 No person has any right or remedy and no proceeding lies or shall be brought against another person for an act or omission of such other person done or omitted in compliance with this act, the regulations or a direction, decision, order, ruling or other requirement made or given under this act or the regulations."

Mr Christopherson: Explanatory note: Section 35.1 extends the immunity provisions already in the bill to the OSC, the director of the OSC and other persons designated by the minister to perform regulatory functions under the bill. Under section 35.2, no person can be held liable for complying with the act or directions, decisions, order etc, given under the act. Sections 35.1 and 35.2 parallel the existing immunity provisions in the Securities Act.

The Chair: Any comments or debate? All those in favour of the amendment? Those against?

Motion agreed to.

Section 35, as amended, agreed to.

Section 36 agreed to.

Section 37:

The Chair: Mr Johnson moves that section 37 of the bill be amended by adding the following subsection:

"(2.1) The Lieutenant Governor in Council, on the recommendation of the Minister of Financial Institutions, may make regulations governing specified employee ownership corporations and the trading of securities of specified employee ownership corporations and, without limiting the generality of the foregoing,

"(a) designating any of the commission, the director or other persons as a person or persons responsible for the administration and enforcement of regulations made under this subsection; prescribing and governing the duties and responsibilities of them or any of them in respect of such designation; and prescribing and governing the discretion that the commission shall exercise in carrying out its duties and responsibilities upon being so designated;

"(b) prescribing rules and procedures that shall govern the preparation, filing, receipt, distribution and delivery of disclosure documents in respect of such corporations;

"(c) prescribing the form and content of disclosure documents or of any type or types of disclosure documents in respect of such corporations;

"(d) prescribing and governing the ongoing disclosure and proxy obligations of such corporations and rules and procedures that shall govern such corporations in relation to such obligations;

"(e) governing or prohibiting transfers of or trading in shares or any class of shares of such corporations;

"(f) governing the timing of distributions of shares or any class of shares of such corporations;

"(g) prohibiting representations or solicitations or both in respect of shares or any class of shares of such corporations;

"(h) governing takeover bids, issuer bids and insider reporting in respect of shares of any class of shares of such corporations;

"(i) prescribing the nature of the advice to be given and the qualifications that must be held by independent advisers who provide advice to employees in respect of proposed applications for registration under this act;

"(j) exempting or permitting the commission or the director to exempt any person or class of persons, or any class of shares, in whole or in part, with or without conditions, from this act, the Business Corporations Act, the Securities Act or a regulation made under any of them, in respect of such corporations, if the Minister of Revenue determines that the person, class of persons or class of shares complies with the intent of this act;

"(k) varying or permitting the commission or the director to vary the application of this act in respect of any person or class of persons, or class of shares, if the Minister of Revenue determines that the person, class of persons or class of shares complies with the intent of this act."

Mr Johnson: Explanatory note: The amendment will authorize the making of regulations to implement the investor protection provisions applicable to employee ownership labour-sponsored venture capital corporations which will apply instead of the Securities Act.

The Chair: Comments or debate? All those in favour of the amendments? All those against?

Motion agreed to.

Section 37, as amended, agreed to.
Sections 38 to 41, inclusive, agreed to.

Section 42:

The Chair: We'll go on to clause 42(1)(a).

Mr Johnson moves that clause 42(1)(a) of the bill be struck out and the following substituted:

"(a) whether a proposal submitted under this act is equitable and reasonably commercially viable over the period covered by the proposal."

Mr Johnson: Explanatory note: The amendment clarifies that the Employee Ownership Advisory Board will review proposals submitted by employee ownership labour-sponsored venture capital corporations to determine if the proposals are equitable and reasonably commercially viable over the contemplated time periods.

The Chair: Comments or questions? All those in favour of the amendment? Against?

Motion agreed to.

Section 42, as amended, agreed to.

Sections 43 to 46, inclusive, agreed to.

Section 47:

The Chair: Mr Johnson moves that subclause 8(8.1)(b)(ii) of the Income Tax Act, set out in subsection 47(3) of the bill, be struck out and the following substituted:

"(ii) $700, if the deduction is made in determining the amount of tax payable under this act for the 1991 taxation year, or $1,000 if the deduction is made in determining the amount of tax payable under this act for the 1992 or a subsequent taxation year."

Mr Johnson: Explanatory note: The amendment would implement the Treasurer's 1992 budget proposal to increase the annual tax credit for investments in labour-sponsored investment fund corporations from $700 to $1,000 for 1992 and subsequent taxation years.

The Chair: Comments or debate? All those in favour of the amendment? Against?

Motion agreed to.

Section 47, as amended, agreed to.

Section 48:

The Chair: Mr Johnson moves that section 48 of the bill be struck out and the following substituted:

"48. Section 143 of the Securities Act is amended by adding the following paragraph:

"38. Regulating labour sponsored investment fund corporations registered under part III of the Labour Sponsored Venture Capital Corporations Act, 1992, and the distribution and trading of the securities of such corporations and varying the application of the Act in respect of such corporations and, without limiting the generality of the foregoing,

"(a) prescribing proficiency requirements or additional proficiency requirements that shall apply in respect of registrants or any class of registrants in respect of such corporations;

"(b) prescribing or prohibiting the use of particular forms or types of offering documents for or in respect of the securities of such corporations;

"(c) prescribing disclosure requirements or additional disclosure requirements for or in respect of the securities of such corporations;

"(d) exempting such corporations from specified requirements or restrictions that ordinarily apply to or in respect of mutual funds;

"(e) prescribing insider reporting requirements for or in respect of such corporations."

Mr Johnson: Explanatory note: The current wording of section 48 of the bill is no longer required as the Securities Act will not apply to employee ownership labour-sponsored venture capital corporations. New proposed section 48 will amend section 143 of the Securities Act to authorize the making of regulations under the Securities Act to implement the proposed investor protection provisions under that act applicable to labour-sponsored investment fund corporations."

The Chair: Comments or debate? All those in favour of the amendment? Against?

Motion agreed to.

Section 48, as amended, agreed to.

Section 49:

The Chair: Mr Johnson moves that section 49 of the bill be amended by adding the following subsection:

"Application, Income Tax Act

"(2) The amendments to the Income Tax Act set out in section 47 apply in respect of 1991 and subsequent taxation years of individuals.

Mr Johnson: Explanatory note: The amendment ensures that for personal income tax purposes, 1991 is the first taxation year for which tax credits may be claimed for investments in labour-sponsored venture capital corporations even though the act is not deemed to have come into force until October 15, 1991.

The Chair: Comments or debate? All those in favour of the amendments? Those against?

Motion agreed to.

Section 49, as amended, agreed to.

Sections 50 and 51 agreed to.

Bill, as amended, ordered to be reported to the House.

Mr Owens: Mr Chairman, just before we adjourn for the day, I would like to, on behalf of the Minister of Financial Institutions, Brian Charlton, and myself as his parliamentary assistant, take the opportunity to thank the other staff from the ministries involved: Revenue, Treasury and of course our Ministry of Financial Institutions.

I would also like to give a special thank you to Julie-Luce Farrell who assisted me on my arrival on this committee. As you are aware, I was a late addition to the committee, and without her assistance the good work we've been able to accomplish here today would not have been possible. Thank you again.

Mr Sutherland: In terms of other business, there had been a request for the Treasurer to come before this committee to talk about the budget. That request has gone in. The Treasurer has indicated that he is willing to attend. We've not got any confirmation as to when his schedule will allow. Given the fact that we don't have anything else on the agenda right now, I believe efforts will be made to have the Treasurer try to attend next week, but I don't make any guarantees because the Treasurer this week is overseas, I believe in Europe, and with his being away for a week he may not be available to make it here for this committee next week. But efforts will be made to get the Treasurer here, if not next week then probably the week after.

The Chair: Thank you, Mr Sutherland. I would like as Chair to thank all the ministry staff for all the help they have given to all committee members on this bill. If it weren't for some of the information meetings that were carried on, I think we would have been stumbling a little bit more through this committee, and I have to say thank you.

Mr Johnson: I too want to thank all the Revenue staff who assisted me and other members of the committee with this particularly difficult legislation. Through all aspects of it, from its inception to all the amendments, your assistance was certainly very much appreciated, especially by myself; and I thank you for crossing all the t's and dotting all the i's.

The committee adjourned at 1715.

CONTENTS

Thursday 11 June 1992

Labour Sponsored Venture Capital Corporations Act, 1992, Bill 150	F-95
Ministry of Revenue	F-95
Hon Shelley Wark-Martyn, minister
Jim Evans, executive director, revenue services and operations division
Gerald Sholtack, director, legal services branch
Catherine Macnaughton, senior solicitor, legal services branch

STANDING COMMITTEE ON FINANCE AND ECONOMIC AFFAIRS

- *Chair / Président: Hansen, Ron (Lincoln ND)
- *Vice-Chair / Vice-Président: Sutherland, Kimble (Oxford ND)
- *Caplan, Elinor (Oriole L)
- *Carr, Gary (Oakville South/-Sud PC)
- *Christopherson, David (Hamilton Centre ND)
Jamison, Norm (Norfolk ND)
- *Kwinter, Monte (Wilson Heights L)
- *Phillips, Gerry (Scarborough-Agincourt L)
Sterling, Norman W. (Carleton PC)
- *Ward, Brad (Brantford ND)
Ward, Margery (Don Mills ND)
- *Wiseman, Jim (Durham West/-Ouest ND)

Substitutions / Membres remplaçants:

- *Johnson, Paul R. (Prince Edward-Lennox-South Hastings/Prince Edward-Lennox-Hastings-Sud ND) for Ms Ward
- *Owens, Stephen (Scarborough Centre ND) for Mr Jamison

*In attendance / présents

Also taking part / Autres participants et participantes:

Whitehead, John, senior budget adviser, Ministry of Treasury and Economics
Wright, Diana, economics specialist, taxation policy branch, Ministry of Treasury and Economics

Clerk / Greffier: Decker, Todd

Staff / Personnel: Tucker, Sidney, deputy chief legislative counsel

CA201
X025
-F31

Gouvernement
Publication

F-8

F-8

ISSN 1180-4386

Legislative Assembly of Ontario

Second session, 35th Parliament

Official Report of Debates (Hansard)

Thursday 25 June 1992

Standing committee on finance and economic affairs

1992 Budget

Assemblée législative de l'Ontario

Deuxième session, 35^e législature

Journal des débats (Hansard)

Jeudi 25 juin 1992

Comité permanent des finances et des affaires économiques

Budget de 1992

Chair: Ron Hansen
Clerk: Todd Decker

Président : Ron Hansen
Greffier : Todd Decker

Published by the Legislative Assembly of Ontario
Editor of Debates: Don Cameron

Publié par l'Assemblée législative de l'Ontario
Éditeur des débats : Don Cameron

Table of Contents

Table of Contents for proceedings reported in this issue appears on the outside back cover, together with a list of committee members and others taking part.

Index inquiries

Reference to a cumulative index of previous issues may be obtained by calling the Hansard Reporting Service indexing staff at (416) 325-7410 or 325-7411.

Numbering of committee reports

Effective with the opening of the Second Session of the 35th Parliament, committee reports and pages are numbered according to session, rather than calendar year as before.

Subscriptions

Subscription information may be obtained from: Sessional Subscription Service, Publications Ontario, Ministry of Government Services, 5th Floor, 880 Bay Street, Toronto, Ontario, M7A 1N8. Phone (416) 326-5310, 326-5311 or toll-free 1 (800) 668-9938.

Table des matières

La table des matières des séances rapportées dans ce numéro se trouve sur la couverture à l'arrière de ce fascicule, ainsi qu'une liste des membres du comité et d'autres personnes ayant participé.

Renseignements sur l'index

Il existe un index cumulatif des numéros précédents. Les renseignements qu'il contient sont à votre disposition par téléphone auprès des employés de l'index du Journal des débats au (416) 325-7410 ou 325-7411.

Numérotation des rapports de comités

A partir du début de la deuxième session de la 35^e législature, les pages et les numéros des rapports de comités sont numérotés par session et non plus par l'année civile.

Abonnements

Pour les abonnements, veuillez prendre contact avec le Service d'abonnement parlementaire, Publications Ontario, ministère des Services gouvernementaux, 5^e étage, 880, rue Bay, Toronto (Ontario) M7A 1N8. Par téléphone : (416) 326-5310, 326-5311 ou, sans frais : 1 (800) 668-9938.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

STANDING COMMITTEE ON FINANCE AND ECONOMIC AFFAIRS

Thursday 25 June 1992

The committee met at 1612 in committee room 1.

1992 BUDGET

Consideration of the 1992 budget.

The Chair (Mr Ron Hansen): I call to order this meeting of the standing committee on finance and economic affairs.

MINISTRY OF TREASURY AND ECONOMICS

The Chair: We have a special guest here today, the Honourable Floyd Laughren, Ontario Treasurer. The Treasurer will start off with a few comments. I believe he has a short brief to present to us. We'll start off with questions from the official opposition for 10 minutes, then go to the third party and then over to the government and rotate as much time as we can get in on questions. You have the floor, Treasurer.

Hon Floyd Laughren (Deputy Premier, Treasurer and Minister of Economics): I appreciate the invitation to attend. I don't get very many friendly invitations. With me is Phyllis Clark, the assistant deputy minister in the office of economic policy, and other people, also enormously talented, who are here to help me when I get into trouble this afternoon.

I received a list and I'll deal with it later. I don't know how you want to handle that. Mr Phillips had some very pointed, focused questions; most appropriate questions, I might add.

The Chair: We can have Mr Phillips ask those questions, the ones he wants to ask.

Hon Mr Laughren: I'm in your hands on that.

I'll just make a couple of opening comments, if I might. I don't want to make a long statement because this is really time for members of the committee.

We have been through a very tough year. In the last two years there has been a little over 300,000 job losses in the province. That's caused all sorts of other problems, not just to the people who were laid off but in a fiscal sense too, with our social assistance case loads and dramatically falling revenues. It's been very, very tough. Anyway, I know members understand that because in their own constituencies that will have been reflected.

We have a sense that things are starting to turn around. If I'd been here a year ago I would have said the same thing, and in fact it didn't turn around a year ago. But even then most experts were saying what they're saying now, that the turnaround was starved and there are some signs out there that the recovery has begun.

Everyone knows it's going to be a slow, painful recovery. Unemployment's going to remain high for the next three years, as we laid out in our medium-term fiscal plan in the budget. We don't like that, but at the same time we have to put in the numbers that we feel are accurate. That problem will stay with us for a while.

This year so far the revenues have been relatively flat and not far off our projections. I used to say "spot on" but—

Mrs Elinor Caplan (Oriole): But you don't say that any more.

Hon Mr Laughren: Well, not as often.

Mrs Caplan: How about "not even close."

Hon Mr Laughren: I wouldn't say that. Anyway, I'm certainly feeling more optimistic than I was six months ago, and I hope things are turning. It's to all our advantage for that to happen.

We prepared in Treasury not a thick document, a fairly lightweight document, called the Ontario Economic Report. It was distributed to the cabinet committee on economic and labour policy. I think that's the only other place it's been. If the clerk wishes, I would table it with the committee. It hasn't been tabled anywhere yet. It is simply a report that's almost like a status quo; where we're at, basically. It deals with current economic conditions, the macroeconomic outlook, labour market performance and outlook, sectoral performance and outlook, and some notes on regional performance and outlook as well. It was really to provide members with a snapshot rather than any hefty analysis, so it doesn't pretend to be that.

Mr Norman W. Sterling (Carleton): Was it lightweight because of the committee it was presented to?

Hon Mr Laughren: I would not talk about this committee that way, Norm. I will stop talking and turn it back to you, Mr Chair, to deal with as you will.

The Chair: I'm pleased that with the short notice we gave your office and your staff that you're able to come forward today. It was the request of Mr Phillips. We didn't know how the House was sitting at that particular time, but we're able to have you here and I'm glad to see you here.

Mr Gerry Phillips (Scarborough-Agincourt): I appreciate the Treasurer being here and I hope the committee might on a fairly regular basis, perhaps quarterly, have a chance to talk with the Treasurer. I find it useful to get updated on where we are. It is virtually at the end of the first quarter now, within a few days, and the message I get from the Treasurer is that things seem to be proceeding, I gather, essentially as you had predicted in the budget.

I have a feeling that I may use up our whole 10 minutes with the three questions I asked. They are side issues, but important issues. Perhaps the Treasurer could just fill us in on those three. I think I've given copies to most people.

Hon Mr Laughren: The first question Mr Phillips asked was:

"I would like to discuss the teachers' pension plan as well as the public service pension plan. For each I would be interested in knowing the following:

"1. What has been the schedule of payments to each plan in each year for the previous three years?

"2. What will be the effect of the delayed payment, and what will be the interest costs payable as a result of the delay?

"3. What are the contribution requirements for the next three years?"

I could deal with each one of those in turn as they're now on the record for Hansard.

The schedule of payments to each plan each year for the previous three years: If we go back to 1989-90 and then deal with 1990-91 and 1991-92, for the public service pension, the matching contribution, the employer's contribution, for the public service in 1989-90 was $176 million. There was a special payments catch-up—if I'm using the wrong language, Mr Puttee or David will correct me—of $22 million, for a total of $198 million. That's the public service 1989-90.

For 1990-91 the matching contribution was $228 million, special payment catch-up—am I using the right language, that it's an actuarial deficiency?

1620

Mr Alan Puttee: My name is Alan Puttee. The special payments are in respect of the unfunded liability, which is being paid off over 40 years.

Hon Mr Laughren: And for 1991-92—did I give you that already?—it is $264 million for the matching contribution and $119 million for special payments, for a total of $383 million.

Mr Phillips: What's the total in 1990-91?

Hon Mr Laughren: Maybe I didn't give it to you. For 1989-90 the total is $198 million, for 1990-91 $319 million, and for 1991-92 $383 million. Just to stick to precisely the first question, it was the schedule of payments.

For the teachers, switching over to them now, for 1989-90 the matching contribution was $420 million, with a special payment of $187 million, for a total of $607 million. For 1990-91 the matching contribution was $408 million, special payment $246 million, for a total of $654 million. For 1991-92 the matching contribution was $596 million, special payment $225 million, for a total of $821 million. That deals with the numbers in the first question.

The second question under pension payments: "What will be the effect of the delayed payment, and what will be the interest cost payable as a result of the delay?" Just so everyone understands the question, because there may be some who would not, we normally pay our public sector pensions every two weeks. For the teachers we normally pay it once a year, which we're continuing to do. For this year, 1992-93, we've decided for both of them that we're making no payment until April 1, which is the beginning of the next fiscal year, 1993-94, and in the case of the public service—let me get my question correct here: the effect of the delayed payment and the interest cost payable.

What that really means is that for 1993-94 the payments will be made in 1993-94, but the $500 million that's been deferred—in the teachers, I'm thinking of now—won't be paid in 1993-94. It will be a lag payment, which will be built into the system. I don't know whether that's the precise word either, but it is a delayed payment which will continue.

For the public service plan, the first quarterly payment will be in April 1993 instead of January. That will have interest of about $600,000. For the teachers' plan, the $500 million doesn't constitute the entire amount. I think the entire amount is $666 million, and we've deferred $500 million of it to the following fiscal year, so that will still leave $166 million to be paid this year out of the total and matching contribution. That payment that will then be made on April 1, 1993, will include the interest we have to pay on that amount for those three months; the teachers aren't that benevolent, that they would give us an interest-free loan for three months. That amount will come to about $13.3 million.

If you consider, because of the deficit and so forth, that if we had paid it out of borrowed money—Mr Phillips and I had this exchange in the Legislature one day—there is a difference in the rate we are paying them, because of the agreement with the teachers, than the amount we would be paying on borrowed money, if I'm making myself clear.

Mr Phillips: Yes. Which is lower?

Hon Mr Laughren: The amount we can borrow ourselves is much lower than the interest we're paying the teachers because of the agreement. I'll read this section because I want to get it right:

"Schedule 1 of the Teachers' Pension Act required that the government use an annual rate of 11.25% to credit interest on the contributions rescheduled from January to April. This is the average rate of the government debentures that have been held by the plan and it is the rate used to credit the government's matching contribution to the plan which are paid with a lag."

So there's no question that there's a price for that deferment of the $500 million. If we look at the cost, the difference is what we really would be talking about, in my mind. The cost would be roughly—and it really does depend on how long a period of time you look at this—about $2 million extra cost on the interest.

That I hope deals with that aspect of the teachers' and the public sector plan.

Mr Phillips: I haven't written down yet the actual payments in the three years of 1992-93, 1993-94 and 1994-95.

Hon Mr Laughren: I'm sorry, I didn't do that. I have it here, though, because that's the next question. For the public service first, for 1992-93, $214 for the matching contributions and $110 for the special payment, to take it up to $324 million. For 1993-94, $299 in matching contribution, $117 in special payment, for a total of $416. These are hundreds of millions; I have to remind myself of that from time to time. It impresses Gary Carr as well. For 1994-95, the matching contribution's $314 and the special payment $123, for a total of $437. I have the next year too if you want it.

Mr Phillips: No.

Hon Mr Laughren: That's okay? For the teachers, the biggie. As I've already indicated, for 1992-93, $166 will still have to be paid in this fiscal year, and then $272 for the special payment for a total of $438.

For 1993-94—this was what Sean Conway was talking about in the House yesterday afternoon and last night, if you recall; we're getting into those kinds of numbers that he was quite accurately depicting—for 1993-94 the matching contribution is $695, special payment is $349, for a total of $1,044. That's $1.044 billion. For 1994-95 the matching contribution is $724, special payment $376, for a total of $1.1 billion.

Those special payments go on and on. The matching contribution, it is obvious, is the employer's side. The special payment is the one that surprised me when I first saw it, when I first started becoming aware of this whole issue of the catch-up and so forth. Anyway, those are the numbers.

Mr Phillips: I realize we may never get through all this, but just to simplify it in my own mind, we're borrowing $500 million from the teachers' pension for ever?

Hon Mr Laughren: I see what you're saying: the lag in there.

Mr Phillips: We've decided to buy $400 million or $500 million that—

Hon Mr Laughren: Unless government decides it would like to make that up in any given year it felt flush.

Mr Phillips: And the premium we pay in interest is 3% or something like that?

1630

Hon Mr Laughren: No, it's more than that. It obviously depends on interest rates. Go ahead, Alan.

Mr Gary Carr (Oakville South): That's what created the problem in the first place.

Mrs Caplan: No, that's not what created the problem.

Mr Puttee: Could I just add one point of clarification? The 11.25 rate that has been mentioned and that the Treasurer mentioned and that will be the rate used to credit the plan for the deferral that is occurring between 1 January 1993 and 1 April 1993 won't happen in subsequent years.

First of all, it's important to understand that that rate is in the act really for another purpose: The government makes its contributions to the teachers' pension plan with a lag, and therefore for administrative reasons there's a lag built in there. Therefore there was a necessity in the act, in schedule 1, to have an interest rate that is used to account for that.

When the question of the three-month deferral was being considered, the legal advice was that the same rate would also apply to that three-month period. However, that's in schedule 1 of the act, which can be changed by the partners. The teachers' pension plan is now subject to a partnership agreement between the government and the teachers, and therefore there's been an agreement between the government and the teachers that the interest rate that will be used in subsequent years, should the government wish to again defer amounts as it has done this year, will be subject to negotiation. It hasn't been determined, but it will not be the 11.25.

Mr Phillips: The way you've structured this you've borrowed $500 million for ever, and there is a premium you pay on that, the difference between what the government can borrow on the market at and what the fund will negotiate. That's all. I understand.

Hon Mr Laughren: That's right. We think the difference if we borrow long-term money is about 1.75% difference. So there's no question it's a difference.

The Chair: Okay, Mr Sterling—oh, you've got another?

Hon Mr Laughren: I'm in your hands because I don't know your time breakdown.

The Chair: We've just gone to 15 minutes. I went past the 10 because I thought you wanted to get as much answered as you could. So we now give the third party 15 minutes, starting off with Mr Sterling. Maybe if we don't have enough time to get back to some of these other questions on here—

Hon Mr Laughren: I'm not adverse to letting Mr Phillips finish his as long there's not a problem with the overall time. I don't care who goes first.

Mr Phillips: It may be of great help to me if there's written material the Treasurer could provide us with and I could just glance at it and then ask questions on it. Would that be better?

Hon Mr Laughren: I only have my copy here, but I could very quickly give you one of the questions while Alan Puttee, who deals with this matter, is here. We could deal with the fiscal stabilization fund very quickly, because I suspect that the third party would be interested in that as well. But it's up to you.

Mr Phillips: Maybe if we can go around, I can get to the asset sales. On the fiscal stabilization, the word in Ottawa is that you've had some communication on it, but I don't know whether that's the case or not.

Hon Mr Laughren: Absolutely. Whether that provides you comfort or not, I don't know.

Mr Phillips: I don't know what the communication is.

Mrs Caplan: What we want to know is if the communication provided you comfort.

Hon Mr Laughren: Yes, well.

Mrs Caplan: I think we've got the answer.

Hon Mr Laughren: I had some interest in this whole matter as well and was checking to see what kind of factors went into the application. I have a list here. The question was, "What is the justification for the two applications for the fiscal stabilization fund?"

There's no question whatsoever on the justification; it's an agreement between the provinces and the federal government. I really tried to say it as clearly as I could. This is not a tin-cup exercise. This is something to which we are entitled and which other provinces have successfully claimed in the past. At no time that I know of—and Alan has been much closer to it than I—has the federal government said: "You might as well go take a hike. You're not entitled to this." I don't think that's ever been indicated, because we are entitled to it. They don't deny it, but it is complex and it does take time. We've been pursuing them and meetings do go on, and I think there was another meeting or is another meeting very shortly.

Mr Puttee: Yes, we have a meeting scheduled before the end of the month with federal officials. This is at the technical level, not with the ministers.

Hon Mr Laughren: Just so all members are sure and thinking the same way on this, when tax levels go down, tax revenues go down because of the economy going down, and provinces can put a claim in for stabilization purposes. What makes it complex is the components or the factors that make it up. It's not as complex now as it used to be because they have taken out some of the more peripheral components, but I'll give you some examples of what goes into it.

The biggies, of course, are the retail sales tax, the personal income tax and the corporate income tax. Those are the three big ones. It would be easy to compute the claim if that was all there was to it, except that the federal government, and I understand this, must take into consideration any tax changes that were brought about by the provinces themselves. In other words, you can't, for example, reduce your sales tax to zero and then put in a stabilization claim because your tax revenues are down. The previous government almost did it with the retail sales tax, but we won't get into that today.

You can't play that kind of game and run around the system. Any tax changes at all at the provincial level have to be factored in as to what would be the claim if we hadn't made that change. That includes the employer health tax; it would include the commercial concentration tax and it would include all tax changes. It doesn't include transfer payments from the feds to us, except that, because of the length between EPF and PIT, that is a factor. So with all those factors involved, we put in a claim.

The amount that we would be entitled to if there wasn't a ceiling was $940 million—I think I've got this right—and for 1991-92, $659 million. However, there is a maximum established, a $60 per capita max where the federal government says, "Hey, we don't care how bad your economy is, there is a maximum here." I understand that as well. So if you apply the maximum amount to which we are entitled, it is $585 million in 1991 and $605 million in 1991-92. We submitted the 1991 one on December 20 and the 1991-92 one on February 24 of this year.

Part of the problem is that the numbers do move because of the lag in the collection of the federal government of our revenues, for example. That's why the federal government can't just sit down in a weekend and respond to us, because the numbers do keep changing.

Those are the two claims that are in there, and they total roughly $1.2 billion. One reason I think there shouldn't be a problem of their paying it is that the claim, if you didn't have the cap, the ceiling in there, is so much greater than our claim that in fact they could probably—especially in 1991; not so much in 1991-92—pay it and not worry that they might be overpaying us, because the claim is so much higher than the maximum that's allowed.

Mr Phillips: Just two quick questions. Do you have copies of the applications?

Hon Mr Laughren: I haven't even seen the application myself, just these components that go into it. I'm not sure. I've felt uneasy from the beginning because the numbers change. As new numbers come in, the claim changes from the federal government's view. For example, with the PIT for 1990-91, they can continue to change the numbers till next March. For the next claim, the one we put in in February for 1991-92, the numbers can keep changing till 1994. I would be uneasy releasing it when the numbers keep changing. It's all part of negotiations with the federal government. It's not because I feel anything else about it. It's no big deal other than that. That's why I've been reluctant to say we should release it, because the numbers keep changing.

Mr Phillips: The budget changes all the time too.

1640

Hon Mr Laughren: Well, it's a little different.

Mr Phillips: Frankly, we're from Missouri. I'd like to think it's coming; I hope it comes, but I've been asking for it.

Hon Mr Laughren: I know you're on our side.

Mr Phillips: I'm on the side, but I wouldn't mind seeing the request. I'd like an answer to the question of whether you have had any communications from the federal government when they expect to deal with it and how much you should be counting on its share.

Hon Mr Laughren: I'll ask Alan if he wants to speak from the officials' end. I haven't had any communication from the minister as to when we can expect an answer, because I have talked to him about it. He said, "Well, whenever the officials get the thing resolved." That's what he said. If I were him, I'd probably say the same thing. When we sort it all out, get the numbers the way they're supposed to be, that's when you'll get it. I don't know whether the officials can say anything more than that either. I don't know.

Mr Puttee: I don't know whether there's too much to add, Treasurer. As you indicated, we submitted the first claim in December 1991 and didn't hear from the federal government for some time. As I indicated before, they have had a chance to review the claim. We thought their first comeback to us would be rather more rapid than it was. In any event, as I say, a meeting has now been scheduled for the end of this month.

Mr Phillips: Next week?

Mr Puttee: Yes.

Hon Mr Laughren: I would be uneasy about releasing them while the negotiations are going on with the feds. If I were them, I wouldn't appreciate it, I can tell you that.

Mr Phillips: In fairness, Mr Chairman, there's another question I'd like an answer on, but it may very well be that they don't get back to us. My colleagues have questions that I can get private or—

Hon Mr Laughren: Yes, we can put this stuff in a more legible form in writing, that's all.

The Chair: Okay. Mr Sterling and then our friend Mr Stockwell, who joined us today.

Mr Sterling: Mr Treasurer, I asked you yesterday, during the debate on Bill 16, what you thought about a deficit of $9.9 billion?

Hon Mr Laughren: About what?

Mr Sterling: What you thought about your deficit of $9.9 billion.

Hon Mr Laughren: That's not what you said.

Mr Sterling: That's what I asked you about.

Hon Mr Laughren: You said, "9,000 million."

Mr Sterling: No, I said, "9,900 million," which is the way I prefer to put it so that people can start to understand what we're talking about here. At any rate, thanks for the correction. Are you spot on?

Hon Mr Laughren: So far we're not off the spot. Mind you, it's early in the year. To be fair, it's very early in the year. The first quarter doesn't even end until the end of June and even then there's a lag on numbers as revenue numbers come in. Early indications were that it doesn't look that bad in terms of revenue.

Mr Sterling: Are you prepared at this time to revise any of your growth factors in your budget?

Hon Mr Laughren: The projected growth figures?

Mr Sterling: Yes.

Hon Mr Laughren: No. Do we have anybody here dealing with growth projections in the budget? Kevin Costante is here.

The Chair: Would you identify yourself for the purpose of Hansard, please.

Mr Kevin Costante: Kevin Costante, Treasury and Economics.

Hon Mr Laughren: The question is, is there any reason to change any of the growth projections that are in the budget document?

Ms Phyllis Clark: Phyllis Clark. Let me address the economic questions. We haven't yet revised our forecasts on the economy. There are quarterly numbers that come out in the gross domestic product, and we're waiting for the Ontario numbers that correspond to the recent release of the national numbers. After that time, we'll do a forecast on the economics side and look at our numbers and see how realistic they are.

When we did do the budget forecast we thought we were conservative, but realistically so. When we redo our numbers we'll do it with the same kind of caution and prudence. There may be some basis for revising the economic forecast, but we just can't tell that yet until we see the Ontario economic numbers, the GDP numbers, for the first quarter.

Based on anything that happens with that, this might feed through into revenue and expenditure changes, but at this time we think it would be unlikely that there would be major changes in the economic forecast.

Mr Sterling: I'm trying to find out about housing starts this year.

Ms Clark: You'll notice that on page 13 in what we handed out to you, there's a small graph that deals with housing starts and talks about housing as leading the recovery. There have been two or three changes that have made a difference in housing affordability. One of them has been the decline in interest rates as well as house prices throughout Ontario. Also, the technical or administrative changes that have to do with the CMHC as well as the ability to withdraw money from retirement savings plans to put into housing we expect will make a difference to housing starts.

We have had some improvements in that area already. I believe the numbers were about 56,000 as compared to 53,000 last year. I would just have to go back and look at my numbers, but that's tracking fairly closely to what we expected would be happening in that area.

Mr Sterling: I just want to talk briefly, before I turn it over to my colleagues, about your attitude towards free trade. The figures are now rolling in about what's been happening. In 1990, exports to the United States were up 4.6%, and I believe that's mostly in manufactured goods. Our surplus has increased in spite of the recession, Ontario being very much a manufacturing centre, and studies by University of Toronto's Institute for Policy Analysis, the Canada West Foundation and the Royal Bank of Canada have all concluded that the free trade agreement has moderated the impact of the recession and has contributed to Canada's economic growth. Do you want to comment?

Hon Mr Laughren: I think it would be hard to extol the virtues of the free trade agreement, given what's happened to the Ontario economy in the last two years. I don't believe that the large numbers of layoffs are unrelated to the free trade agreement either. I don't for a minute think you can pretend that hasn't been a factor. Imports are up as well. It's not as though you can pick out the odd number that will justify your argument and say that free trade is therefore good for Ontario.

I look at the dislocation in the workforce. I look at what's happened in closures and layoffs in manufacturing in the last two years. It is really stark. The number that bothers me the most—and I really don't think you can pretend this isn't partly a free trade agreement problem—is the number of closures that have been permanent as opposed to temporary or recession-caused, such as was the case 10 years ago. I remember the number; it stays in my head. I haven't looked at it in the last couple of months, but 10 years ago the number of layoffs that were deemed to be permanent was 25% of them. The last number I saw in the last little while was that 65% of the layoffs were deemed to be permanent closures.

I do not say that this is all because of the free trade agreement. Obviously, with the global competition thing, there's a restructuring going on out there because of technology and all sorts of things. In the middle of all this, while all this is happening, the free trade agreement is a federal agreement and there's been no adjustment program put in place, which I think Ontario had a right to expect and yet that was never delivered. So I would take issue with you that the free trade agreement has somehow been good for Ontario.

Perhaps if I were sitting here in the middle 1980s and the free trade agreement were brought in, I would have had a little more difficulty putting conviction into my voice, if what had happened in the economy was the opposite of what has happened. But I have no trouble, I hope, putting conviction in my voice in saying that the free trade agreement has not been good for Ontario since it was implemented and that it's been at least partly the cause of a lot of our problems.

1650

Mr Sterling: I don't know how many independent economists are backing you up now, Mr Treasurer. I think one of the problems we hear from you time and time again in the House is about the opposition putting out rhetoric about how bad things are etc. I firmly believe that your willingness to dump problems on the free trade agreement is rhetoric in the wrong way and that probably it's doing more harm than good, and when you have such scanty proof that it's been a major problem.

Hon Mr Laughren: Epidemiological proof.

Mr Sterling: I know it's been a problem for individual industries etc, but some of our industries have flourished under free trade and some of the high-tech industries have flourished under the free trade agreement. Our aerospace industry has flourished under it. Our industrial machine and transportation equipment and chemicals have all increased their exports to the United States dramatically over the last little while.

At any rate, I am going to turn it over to one of my colleagues rather than debate it further.

Hon Mr Laughren: If I could just interject, I do have some compassion for Mr Sterling who is making a valiant effort to make a strong case for the free trade agreement on the heels of what's happened to Ontario in the last two years. I understand the difficulties.

The Chair: I want to intervene here. Mr Treasurer, it's very hard for Hansard to pick up when you're shaking your head, no, and shaking your head, yes.

Mr Chris Stockwell (Etobicoke West): He does that at the same time sometimes. First I'd like to make a comment with respect to the teachers' pension deferral money. I guess to be uncharacteristically blunt, Mr Treasurer, this question was put to you in the House about an extra cost for the deferral of this money. With all due respect, your answer was very different than today.

Hon Mr Laughren: Do you have a copy of my response?

Mr Stockwell: Yes, as a matter of fact it was just brought to me.

Hon Mr Laughren: I was afraid you did.

Mr Stockwell: You were suggesting at that time that borrowing the money from the teachers' pension fund was much the same as borrowing it anywhere else; today we find, not really. There's a service charge involved here. We call that a mortgage broker fee or a service charge of some kind, and the teachers nipped us for $13.5 million additionally. I'd just like to go on the record that on May 12, 1992, when the question was put to you, I think, fairly, that wasn't your response, with all due respect. If you'd like to comment, go ahead, but I don't know what you could possibly say.

Hon Mr Laughren: So much for the answer I'm going to attempt. To be fair about it, and I know you're a fair-minded man from time to time, in the House that question came to me, I think, from your leader, Mr Harris, the member for Nipissing.

Mr Stockwell: Yes, it was.

Mrs Caplan: I'm surprised you remember it.

Hon Mr Laughren: Now, don't be partisan, Mrs Caplan. In the question—maybe you have it there.

Mr Stockwell: Yes, I do.

Hon Mr Laughren: I'd better be careful. What was implied to me in the question was that the total cost of the deferment would be what would be the extra cost, as opposed to building into consideration the cost of borrowed money anyway.

Mr Stockwell: I see. That's an interesting comment because it says "premium." So move on; I think the point was well made.

Hon Mr Laughren: Thank you.

Mr Stockwell: I've got a question on your taxes. I suppose the other rather offensive part I find about this budget is the manipulation of the numbers, and clearly they are—

Hon Mr Laughren: Massaging.

Mr Stockwell: "Massaging" may be a better word—massaging, manipulation—but I really find page 28 of this budget offensive, to be very blunt again, Mr Treasurer.

Hon Mr Laughren: Page?

Mr Stockwell: Page 28 of your budget, where you detail revenue changes. If you read this, you put up at the top "Impact of Personal Income Tax Changes for 1993," which is really odd considering we're talking about a budget that's basically made up in 1992. The question I have is, how did you reconcile in your mind that it was a fair and reasonable budget to, in some cases, triple the decrease the federal government had given to the working poor and the poor, and basically claw back tax hikes from people who are earning $10,000 a year?

Hon Mr Laughren: First of all, there was a very small—we're talking about like $10 a year for somebody. That's not a lot of money. We did bring in improvements in the Ontario tax reduction which protect low-income people from the Ontario tax system. When all the changes are brought in at the federal and provincial level, which don't take place until 1993, then that's not the picture you will get. The picture you will get for 1993 when all the changes are actually brought in is what's on page 28.

Mr Stockwell: So this was actually a conscious effort on your part, not necessarily on your department's or your ministry's part, to bring forward these figures in the 1993 chart.

Hon Mr Laughren: Yes.

Mr Stockwell: It never crossed your mind to maybe them put in the 1992 figures and let the people know exactly what they're going to pay in taxes? Again, the working poor and the poor are having their taxes increased. "Massaging" is the word you use; "manipulative" is the one I use.

Hon Mr Laughren: But the impact of the two budgets, the federal and the provincial, is not complete until 1993, right? That's why it was done that way.

Mr Stockwell: So you don't get the full effect of the reduction until 1993.

Hon Mr Laughren: Right.

Mr Stockwell: Okay. Do I have time for one quick question? Okay, Mr Carr.

Mr Carr: Just along the same lines, we heard during the pre-budget hearings from economists from all the banks and from various independents, and the one thing they said was, "Don't increase any taxes." Lo and behold, what we got was a massive tax hike, a percentage of the personal income tax, the surtax. Of course the people who were in the election campaign didn't think that at $53,000 they were going to be whacked with a surtax, and you know that will impact substantially. The economists said, "Don't raise any taxes," and lo and behold, you did it. What was the rationale? When the economy is down, when all the economists say, "If you take more money out, it's only going to hurt the economy more," what was the rationale for these massive tax increases in those two areas?

Hon Mr Laughren: When we approached the budget, we didn't approach each section of the budget as a sealed compartment, so I hope you would appreciate that you approach the budget as a package, and that along with what I would refer to as modest tax increases, the surtax, especially as a package, the tax on the income tax, was more substantial than some people would have liked. I understand that but the rest of the tax package in the budget was extremely modest.

We did reduce taxes. The business community was also concerned about the level of business taxes on the business community, and which taxes did we lower? We lowered taxes on the business community, recognizing the fact that we're in a recession. That was a recession-driven decision to reduce the taxes for manufacturing, processing, mining and farming, so we reduced those taxes.

As well, we increased the current cost allowance, or the depreciation allowance, and reduced the tax on the small business community. You can't have it all your way out there. At the same time the people were telling us in the pre-budget consultation—we did our own pre-budget consultation as well as what the committee did—"For heaven's sake, show some vote of confidence in the economy by doing something on job creation." They said: "Don't let this recession spook you too much. Reserve the essential services of this province, especially in health and education." That was a very strong message we got. Nobody likes to have a deficit of $10 billion. Who would like that?

1700

Mr Stockwell: Or $14 billion.

Hon Mr Laughren: Or $14 billion or whatever. I don't like it any more than Brian Mulroney likes it, but I'm not going to go to Hong Kong and denounce Brian Mulroney because his budget's over a billion—

Mr Carr: Just on that trip, you came back from the trip and now that you are able to help businesses with this fine tax that you didn't raise and I guess that—

Hon Mr Laughren: No, reduced.

Mr Carr: Okay, reduced, whatever you'd like to call it. Of course, you take it out of consumers' hands and that hurts businesses too.

Hon Mr Laughren: But we put that back into the economy. We didn't take it out and put it in our pockets.

Mr Carr: Let's look at the investment, since you mentioned Hong Kong. You made your whirlwind trip. We didn't have any announcements, out of all these trips, of any investment and what we're hearing from the international investment community is that people are saying that through a number of initiatives here in Ontario, right through the tax to the regulations, everything, the international people are not going to invest in Ontario. What concrete investment can you bring back and show us today of industries, companies rushing to come to Ontario, because there haven't been any announcements to date of international companies making substantial investments in Ontario.

Hon Mr Laughren: I wonder if you'd allow me to separate my trip from some announcements that have already been made. The trip I went on, and if you know me you know I don't even like travelling, so I don't see it as much of a perk, was what we call investor relations travel, visiting with the people who sell our bonds and the people who buy them. So I wasn't going to talk to the Industrial Bank of Japan about moving to Ontario. It was to talk about the virtues of investing in Ontario.

Mr Carr: What is the community saying about us?

Hon Mr Laughren: I won't give you a boosterism speech here, but I also spoke to the business community, the chamber of commerce in London, and to the investing community in Frankfurt as well. The questions I got, because it was a question and answer session every time, completely open, were, one, what about our Constitution? several questions on that, how we're coming on that; two, NAFTA, the North American free trade agreement, is that going to proceed or is it not? and three, the deficits we have, not just last year and this year, but in the next couple of years too, are we going to be able to get that deficit down the way we're saying we intend to? I mentioned the constitutional thing. Those were basically the questions. I'm trying to think if there was any other question.

By the way, and I'm not saying this to be partisan, I don't think I got a single question on the labour relations reform. Nobody is here who was with me, but I don't think there was a single question on that. At the time I was over there, we did an issue on Ontario Hydro which was $2 billion that sold very fast. Mind you, at the same time, to put it in perspective, that was when the Danes had voted against the Maastricht community and so there was some nervousness around investment in Europe at that time too, right or wrong. So it did make it a very attractive issue I think. So I did what I could in Denmark. That was the response.

Interjection.

Hon Mr Laughren: Yes. I spent enough time in opposition to know what the job is there, but if you get outside Ontario and you were looking at a map of the world and you were looking for a secure political and, dare I say it, economic environment, where would you put your money rather than in Ontario?

Mr Carr: British Columbia or Alberta.

Hon Mr Laughren: All right, that's another province, but this is a good place to invest. Canada is a good place to invest and Ontario is the big province that's doing the issues out there for selling bonds. It is not the kind of problem we sometimes focus on here—I'm not saying illegitimately. The opposition keeps governments on their toes.

If you talk to a company like Ford, which has announced about $2 billion of investment in this province, that is a massive commitment to Ontario and a vote of confidence. I'm not taking credit for that, Monte, I'm just saying what they're doing.

Mr Monte Kwinter (Wilson Heights): If I get a chance, I want to talk to you about that because you're talking but you're not listening when you say you're talking to them. I was with Ken Harrigan five days ago. You should hear what he has to say.

Mr Carr: As was I.

Mr Kwinter: Yes, we were there together.

You keep trotting out this great investment by Ford. You got it by about that much. It was nearly gone after we had negotiated it.

Hon Mr Laughren: I'd rather look at what Ford does. What it's done is make a major commitment to this province.

Mr Carr: The plant was already on.

Mr Kwinter: The point is they're doing it in spite of you, not because of you.

Hon Mr Laughren: That's nonsense. You tell me then where there's a better place to invest than Ontario. Monte, there is no better place to invest than Ontario; you know that.

Mr Carr: You're using them. That plant was operational, the $500 million.

Interjections.

The Chair: Wait a minute, Hansard is having a problem picking up all the voices at once.

Hon Mr Laughren: I'm not using Mr Harrigan; I'm not using Ford.

Mr Carr: Yes, you are using them.

Hon Mr Laughren: The fact is that there is no better place to invest in than Ontario. I wish you'd point to a jurisdiction that's a better place than Ontario to invest in. I don't know of one, and I'm talking as an objective observer too.

The Chair: Treasurer, we have to move on.

Mr Jim Wiseman (Durham West): I'd just like to comment that in the last three weeks I've had one particular investor who has decided to put $28 million into Ontario. I think that's not inconsiderable money.

I'd like to go back to the whole discussion around the actuarial deficiencies and the unfunded liabilities in the pensions.

Interjection: Is this a conflict?

Mr Wiseman: I don't think it is.

There is a huge debate about and around the unfunded liabilities and what the actuarial deficiencies actually were. Different actuaries put out different numbers and then those numbers are used, if I'm understanding this correctly, to project what the unfunded liability will be in the long run. These different numbers, when you multiply them out and then extrapolate and compound them over years, can amount to huge amounts of money. Just to begin this discussion, I would like perhaps some discussion back about how they're arrived at and why you have confidence in them, and then I'll ask my next question.

Hon Mr Laughren: Alan, can you help me on this one? If I understand you correctly, it's the projected contributions, our matching contributions to the teachers.

Mr Wiseman: The teachers; the unfunded liabilities.

Hon Mr Laughren: I will ask either Alan or David Ezer, who is an actuarial, to help us out here.

Mr Puttee: If I understood the question, it had to do with the estimated size of the initial unfunded liability. The province required that an initial evaluation be done dated January 1, 1990. The estimate at that time—I didn't know we were going to get questions on this, so I'm going by memory—was I believe about $4 billion. That was the estimate that was made shortly after January 1, 1990.

The legislation that had been passed in 1989 called for the initial unfunded liability to be written off over 40 years. It was recognized, though, at the time that, since all the data were not in, there would be a need to re-estimate to get the final value of the initial unfunded liability associated with the teachers' plan as at January 1, 1990. Therefore, in September 1991 I believe, the final estimate conducted by the board for the teachers, using their actuarial consultants, was filed with the Pension Commission of Ontario.

1710

A number of things had changed in the interim, which had the net effect of significantly increasing the size of the initial unfunded liability. The value that was in the valuation filed on September 30 was $7.8 billion. Since again the legislation required those to be written off over 40 years starting in January 1990, that required a new higher schedule of payments over the 40-year period, and as well we had to go back to catch up the payments from January 1, 1990, to September 30 to reflect the higher estimate. When the Treasurer was speaking earlier, he made reference to catch-up payments and that is what they were. There are comparable numbers or companion numbers on the public service that I can also give you.

The Chair: Okay. Mr Sutherland.

Mr Kimble Sutherland (Oxford): Thank you. Mr Treasurer—

Mr Wiseman: I wasn't finished.

The Chair: We'll come back to you.

Mr Sutherland: One of the aspects you underlined when you presented the budget was significant capital investment. In the last couple of days we've had some announcements about strategic capital. Given that in spite of what Mr Sterling has said about the free trade agreement there's still high unemployment and a lot of these people were working in jobs that have been affected—trade may be picking up as a result of it or maybe not as a result of it, but there's still a lot of unemployment out there—I was wondering if you could give us some sense of when capital announcements will be made, and from the time that they are made how soon you see some of the projects getting under way to help alleviate some of the unemployment and certainly to help the construction industry.

Hon Mr Laughren: The budget has divided capital into two sections. One was the base capital in all the ministries for the regular building of schools, highways, hospitals and so forth. That was $3.4 billion. On top of that we had—I don't want to inflame Gerry Phillips here—

Mr Phillips: I'm listening.

Hon Mr Laughren: I know, but I know how he gets going on this one.

On top of the $3.4 billion that's in the base is another $500 million of what we call strategic capital fund, and we divided it into different categories. That was the special capital fund. It was $500 million for this year, but over five years it's $2.3 billion. We want to treat this capital fund differently than capital has been treated in the past.

I think this is true of all government. This isn't directed at any one government. We would have done it the same way as well, and we did last year, the same way as has been done historically. But we think that because of the restructuring that's going on out there in the economy there's going to be a need for governments to be much more strategic as to where they put taxpayers' money in capital, that simply we have to make a distinction between the normal maintenance of the system and more strategically placed capital, and that's what this fund is for.

We've made a major commitment in a number of areas this year. You already heard some announcements by Richard Allen and by Ruth Grier, and there may have been another one. Marion Boyd as well made announcements on the utilization of this strategic capital. We want that to get out there as quickly as possible and we think we can do it. It's going to put emphasis, for example, on green industries or green projects, whether it's industry or not, and if it's in the manufacturing sector, it's going to make sure it goes into areas where there's a lot of high value added, where knowledge is a major component, in things like telecommunications and so forth.

That was the reason for dividing capital into two sections. We said in the budget that this fall we're going to have a capital report to the Legislature on an annual basis and we want to do that. I can't remember what month we're doing that, November or December.

Ms Clark: Yes, around that time.

Hon Mr Laughren: Around November or December. We're working towards that now so that there's proper capital reporting to the Legislature, quite frankly, more the way other jurisdictions do it than we traditionally have done it. We think there really is a qualitative difference between capital and operating, so we're going to do that for the first time this fall. We've started churning away at it in the Ministry of Treasury and Economics, and I think the clarity of it will satisfy our severest critics, which is why Gerry Phillips is smiling.

Mrs Caplan: I wouldn't count on it.

The Chair: Mr Wiseman again. Mr Sutherland has another question after you.

Mr Wiseman: I have to get back to the pensions. This is something that's bugged me for a long time, and don't cut me off after this question, because it's a short answer, okay?

The Chair: You have one question.

Mr Wiseman: My question will be multipart; it'll have A, B and C.

The Chair: I've got this hammer here too.

Mr Wiseman: I want to get back to the unfunded liability. I want to understand how we can have an unfunded liability, especially in the teachers' superannuation fund, which has been around since 1912, and how it could have grown to $7.8 billion when in the past the provincial government has been the sole borrower of the money from the teachers' funds and from the pension funds. What was going on? Surely the science of actuarial projections is not new in the last four years. I'd like to understand the history of this and how we got to this debt.

Hon Mr Laughren: I'm going to defer to Alan.

Mr Puttee: I think there are two parts to the answer. The first is that a large part of the initial unfunded liability is associated with the decision to retroactively index the benefits of teachers. That decision was taken—I'm not sure of the date—in 1975 with the creation of the—

Mrs Caplan: It was announced in 1974 for 1975.

Mr Wiseman: Okay, thank you.

Mrs Caplan: It was unfunded when it was announced and it was retroactive. I just remember the briefing.

Mr Wiseman: How much of the provincial debt—

The Chair: That's another question.

Mr Wiseman: No, that was part of the question I asked. That was part B.

The Chair: You know, we came here to ask some questions of the Treasurer.

Hon Mr Laughren: It was subliminal.

The Chair: Okay, a short answer?

Mr Puttee: I think the second part of the answer would relate to why the initial unfunded liability was originally estimated at $4 billion and how it got to $7.8 billion. I think the quick answer to that is that there were significant changes in the demographic assumptions and that there were also benefit increases that had occurred in the interim, mainly associated I believe, with an early retirement window that had been offered to teachers and taken up by many of them. So the situation changed and the cost of that had to be reflected.

1720

Mr Wiseman: How much of the current provincial debt is owed to the teachers' pensions?

Mr Puttee: I'm just not sure. You mean, what is the amount of the debentures with the province's name on them that are held by the teachers' pension fund? The teachers' pension fund has assets of $24 billion—about; these are round numbers—and as of January 1, 1992, the value of the Ontario debentures was about $18 billion. That will go down, since we're not issuing them any more.

The Chair: Mr Kwinter, I know you've got a question there.

Mr Kwinter: I just had one.

The Chair: Just go right ahead. I'll cut you off if you're too long.

Mr Kwinter: Thanks, I can hardly wait.

I'd like to just address this to the Treasurer and to his staff. The concern I have about what is going on is that we are getting two messages out there. Is this document an economic document or a political document?

Hon Mr Laughren: If you knew its genesis, you would agree that it's an economic document.

Mr Kwinter: What I'm saying is that there are mixed messages throughout this document and there are mixed messages in the message the government is sending out. I'd like to spend a little bit of time talking about free trade. Just by coincidence, you happened to provide me with a set of written documentation of some of the things I was concerned about, but let's talk about free trade.

As you know, I led our government's attack against the free trade agreement—not because we were against free trade. We were against the deal, and I think history will show that our concerns have been borne out, because the things the free trade agreement was supposed to address have not been addressed. We're still fighting the same battles.

But what we do have is a situation that I think, if you want to be fairminded and you want to talk about it, before the free trade agreement was implemented, 80% of all of the trade and goods and services between Canada and the United States was duty-free. Of the remaining 20%, the average tariff that was in place was 10%—that's the average—and that 10% is going to be reduced over a period of 10 years, some immediately, some over five years, some over 10 years. We're now into the third year of that agreement.

The point I'm making is that of that 20%—and we're now into the third year and we're reducing on average some part of the 10% of the tariff—surely that is not enough to distort the economy of Ontario or Canada. I mean, it just can't happen. The number is not big enough. So to keep blaming free trade for all of our woes—I'm not saying you can't blame it for specific situations, but I'll tell you, every time a plant closes it's blamed on free trade, every time a plant opens it's attributed to free trade, and in most cases, free trade had nothing to do with it. That is a concern I have.

I have a concern where you talk about things in this document that are not borne out in what is happening literally in the daily press. Today there was a report of an economic forecast for Canada in which they say the growth in Ontario is going to be one of the lowest in all of the provinces of Canada, and they attribute it to the fact that we have the greatest concentration of manufacturing in Ontario, and that is in decline. The tax policies of this government—you may not agree with it. I'm just saying that was a factor that was attributed.

Let me just talk to you about a couple of things. Let's talk about this business confidence. Let's talk about Ford Motor Co. Ford Motor Co has been here for many, many years. In 1989—and I'm not trying to take credit for it; I'm just stating the facts—I negotiated with the Ford Motor Co to put that van plant into Oakville. We were competing with St Louis, Missouri, we had to come up with a package, and the package was done. It was like a fait accompli, and the first phase of it was the paint plant. Being politicians, we tried to get them to announce the van plant during the campaign, and they said no, they wouldn't announce it. They did not want to get involved in the politics.

Hon Mr Laughren: Good for them. They wouldn't let you use them.

Mr Kwinter: All right, but the point is that the decision was made in 1989 and because it's such a huge amount of money and because it takes time, it just happens that it's coming on track now, but to suggest that this is a vote of confidence in this government is absurd.

I want to talk about Glaxo, another one that you've mentioned. I want you to know that decision was made three years ago and we nearly lost it, not because of anything other than that the Ministry of the Environment—my colleague was involved in exactly the same battle that your colleague is involved in—designated as a potential site a site in Mississauga that was practically beside where Glaxo is putting this investment. They said, "There's no way we're going to put a pharmaceutical facility next to a garbage dump and we are not coming here." I had to fly to England to the head office and give them my personal assurance that the dump site would not go there, notwithstanding it was on the list.

The point I'm making is that to trot these things out as signs of business confidence and signs of support makes no sense. But I want to talk about this document that gives you an idea of where I have some serious concerns. You're talking about the things that are going to make growth and on page 7 you say the decline in interest rates over the past two years is a positive. You turn over to the next page, page 8, and you say the economy is going to be milder because of the high interest rates.

Hon Mr Laughren: Yes.

Mr Kwinter: Then on page 5 you say: "The US economy is gaining strength. Retail sales, employment, durable orders and consumer confidence have strengthened in recent months." You go over to talk about you're going to have a milder recovery because there is slow US and international growth and ongoing structural adjustment and high debt levels. You're saying on the one hand it's going to be a great economy because all these things are happening and on the other it's not going to be a great economy because all these things are happening, the same things that are happening. You're catching them both ways. It's going to be good or it's going to be bad, but it's exactly the same factor.

But the most important thing is, and this is the one I want to talk to you about, you talk about the things that are going to be leading the economic recovery of Ontario. I agree with you; I have enough confidence in the inherent strength of Ontario. I say this as non-partisanly as I can: No government can screw up the future of Ontario. I just think it's too strong for that; I really believe that. But let me tell you, there are some very serious problems.

Number one, in your projections you think there's going to be a much greater increase in the housing sector. Figures are showing that it's not; no question, it's better than it was, but if you tell someone, "The bad news is you're going to drown in 50 feet of water. The good news is we've corrected that and you're only going to drown in 30 feet of water," the point is, you're still going to drown. The housing sector is not rebounding the way it has been projected.

You have a situation where the automotive industry, which is supposedly the industry that's going to lead us out of this recession, has got some very serious problems on the horizon. The problem we have at the present time in Ontario, where we build most of the cars in Canada, is that we build nearly one million cars; one million is the total, but that includes Bromont, Quebec, and it includes the Volvo plant in Nova Scotia. But of those cars, close to 90% are being exported to the United States.

Mexico, which is currently building 600,000 cars a year, has announced that it will by the year 2000, which is only seven years away, be building 4 million cars. I can tell you, those cars are not going to be driven by the Mexicans, they're going to be driven by the Americans and they're going to be driven by Canadians. Somewhere along the line we are going to have to make sure—and this is going to be critical in the NAFTA negotiations—that we at least maintain our share, but we are going to be under incredible pressure because it isn't the assembly operations that are going to be critical, it's going to be the parts suppliers that are going to go where the major assemblies are going to take place.

The concern I have—and I refer to this, like high blood pressure that doctors refer to, as the silent killer. If people have it, many people don't know they have it and suddenly they have a problem. We have a problem with things like the amendments to the Ontario Labour Relations Act.

1730

You say that when you go out to Japan or where you go—I have to say I travel as well, far more than you do because I don't mind it—but the concern you have is that when people look at jurisdictions they take a look at all the competing factors and they make a decision. Sure, when you say, "What better place than Ontario?" there are places that are comparable. There are tradeoffs. At one time our health care system was a tremendous asset. That is under attack. Our hydro certainly was an area in which we were very competitive and that is certainly deteriorating. So we have a situation where I can say to you—and as I say, this can be proven—the Ford Motor Co plant would not have come here today. St Louis, Missouri, would have got it if we'd started clean and we're dealing in the same environment, because they had to go and compete against them and they made their pitch based on a whole range of—

The Chair: Mr Kwinter, can you come to the question?

Mr Kwinter: I'm trying to set the groundwork to say to you that these are concerns I have. These are concerns that are going to impact on our economic viability. These are concerns that are going to impact on your ability to meet your targets, because collectively, we as a province have taken on some fairly substantial debt. We make projections based on certain premises. I am concerned about whether or not those targets can be reached.

If you do it on a percentage basis—when you take a look at your first budget, and everybody yelled and screamed about this deficit, we had demonstrations out and people were taking to the streets.

The Chair: Mr Kwinter—

Mr Kwinter: Just one second. I think this is important.

The Chair: Yes, but he was going to stay till 5. I've been able to persuade him to stay here till 5:30, and we have to go to the House at a quarter to six.

Mr Kwinter: The point I'm making is that in that one year there was a $1-billion adjustment.

You've got projections going over the next three or four years, and my concern is that those numbers are going to grow because of the pressures. There are pressures every day. Yet there are also pressures going the other way, in a negative sense, on your ability to raise the revenue to service that kind of debt and to provide the kinds of services we Ontarians would like to have and what you, the government, would like to provide. So my question: I'm sorry I went so long, but I tried to portray an environment that we're working in and get your reaction as to what you think we're going to do about it.

Hon Mr Laughren: I actually enjoyed your comments and I share some of your concerns. You'd have to live in some kind of dream world not to be concerned about some of the things you've mentioned. I'll try to keep some of those. Let me go through them quickly. I don't want to use up everybody's time.

On the fair trade—that's a good slip of words; actually fair trade might have been better—on the free trade agreement we've never said that free or freer trade is bad in itself. What we've said is, just like you said, that we think this is not the right agreement. Because we recognize that with the globalization that's going on out there, you can't build a wall around any jurisdiction. The abandonment—and you can say this is partisan if you like—by the federal government of any adjustment policies was almost breathtaking. I believe that so fundamentally. Guess who picks up the entire tab on that? It's the province. You know that. I don't have to belabour it.

I think I'd like to leave some of the forecasting stuff to Phyllis. I've got a new list of companies that have come here recently. I don't pretend that Ford invested that $2 billion because it liked this budget or anything like that, but I do think that if it were really overly concerned about Ontario it could pull the plug at any point.

At any given point they could say: "We don't like what you're doing. The deal is off." I'm not taking away anything from the work you did. I know that when you were the Minister of Industry, Trade and Technology you were very aggressive in pursuing investment for the province. I have no quarrel with what you've said in that regard. In terms of Ontario remaining competitive in the health care sector, I looked at what it costs an employer in the United States. I believe it was an automobile employer.

Mr Kwinter: Lee Iacocca said it was $700.

Hon Mr Laughren: No, it was C$4,200 to pay the health care costs for an employee if that was in the contract or arrangement, right? For Ontario it was around $650 or $700. That's an enormous competitive advantage. In terms of Mexico, I really do think we're talking apples and oranges when we talk about competing with Mexico. I don't think I have it with me, but I have a list of companies and I haven't used this list, because it's a bit of a perverse satisfaction to have companies move out of Mexico back to Ontario.

Mr Kwinter: I saw that article.

Hon Mr Laughren: I'm sure you did. There is some of that going on. Largely it's because of the skills and the abilities of the labour force here. It's not because they like you or me—well, maybe you; they're not particularly fond of me.

Hydro is something we do have to keep a very close eye on. The rates have gone up and they're going to go up again. You don't stop in midstream—it's something like turning the Queen Mary around—with Ontario Hydro when everybody acknowledges we have to pay for what's been built. When projects like Darlington come on stream, the rules say that's when they go into the rates. We can't do anything about that at this point. Shutting down Darlington wouldn't solve the problem either; it's built.

I think we're on the right track with our conservation strategy. I'd like to see more use of the non-utility generating plants, but that's tough when you've got excess capacity in the system. It is very difficult.

Mrs Caplan: You won't have excess capacity for long.

Hon Mr Laughren: I'm telling you, they sure have it now.

Mrs Caplan: That's only because of the recession.

Hon Mr Laughren: Yes, that's right, that's the main reason but I'll tell you—I could be out on my numbers here—there are something like 30 or 40 non-utility generating proposals out there now to feed into the grid. I think it's a great development that's happening out there, because inevitably there's some other benefit to what they're doing as well, not just feeding into the grid.

In one sense I agree with you on Ontario's ability to compete and prosper regardless of whatever government is in place. That may sound a bit too complacent. I don't mean it that way.

Mr Kwinter: I didn't mean it that way either.

Hon Mr Laughren: No, I know you didn't. I really do believe that as long as we keep our infrastructure up to scratch—and by that I mean our transportation system, our educational system. We've got to keep it up to scratch and we've got to keep pouring money into post-secondary. I think our moves on training are long overdue. It's the right thing and the federal government is cooperating on it. I think they'll be more responsive to community needs.

I don't expect you to agree we're doing everything right. I really do think we are starting to behave more strategically in terms of the way the economy is changing on us. I hope we are; if we're not, it'll pass us. It'll go by. I worry quite a bit about that, because I really think—and this isn't a reference to your comment—the days of Ontario having so many natural advantages that we don't have to worry about it are over, I suspect, to a degree.

1740

It's a very competitive world out there. We've got to be there. We actually have a committee that deals with strategic investments and so forth, and we're trying to be really thoughtful about which sectors we support. That was one reason we put in the budget the sectoral partnership fund of $150 million. That's part of that strategy and is designed to encourage industries within a sector to work together when any one company can't do it by itself. I think that's being strategic.

I'm cautious as well; I'm cautious on the projections. There's only the last number of projections I saw before the one you referred to, where other forecasters had us up with greater growth projections than we did. Some of them I thought would be lovely, but I didn't think they were terribly realistic, so we'll see.

We have nothing to gain with unrealistic projections. I think they're embarrassing when you don't achieve them. You understand that. I hope our projections are not optimistic; I hope they're realistic. It would be nice to exceed them. Phyllis, did you want to deal with something?

Ms Clark: Just a few comments on the nature of the message that's in the economic report we gave you, the difference in interest rates, I think, where we talked about real interest rates being high compared to nominal interest rates being low. The impact of low nominal interest rates is the amount of moneys that frees to put into consumers' hands to buy things with their disposable income.

What we try to say here is that we expect recovery. We can see signs of that coming now, but we don't think it will be as strong as the recovery we had when we came out of the 1982-83 recessionary period. We're forecasting, on the next three or four years, growth that averages about 3.7%. When we emerged from 1982-83 we had much higher growth. We had growth that averaged in the high fives-low sixes at some points. There are several structural changes that we think have taken place in the economy, including the free trade agreement, GST and other things that have had an impact on growth. That's why we expect more moderate growth, but we do expect growth.

That's the nature of the comments and the individual items you referenced in terms of autos and housing. We did point out the cross-counter flows you've got in those areas, but autos are still very strong. Exports to the United States are up, and the share of Canadian exports and the Canadian share of the US auto market have increased. It looks as if they will continue to increase throughout 1992. We are moving very strongly in that period.

It's the same in housing. We're on base as far as our forecast is concerned. With that, we've had an increase in the first quarter of 1992 over the last quarter of 1991, so we're fairly tracking on that.

In terms of comparative growth with other provinces, there's a group of forecasters that does cross-Canada comparisons. We think we're going to be among at least the top two or three growth areas in Canada in the next three to four years.

Mr Kwinter: I just want to put something into the record, because I think it's important that it be on the record.

The Chair: Okay, but then I'll let the Treasurer close with his remarks.

Mr Kwinter: The comment on Mexico: We should know—and this is verifiable through George Peapples, who I know was on the Premier's Council, so you can talk to him—they have four engine plants in North America. They have one in St Catharines, two in the United States and one in Pueblo, Mexico. They are all clones of each other. They practically used the same blueprints and built them. If you speak to George Peapples, the president of General Motors, he will tell you the most productive, most cost-efficient plant they have turning out the identical product is in Pueblo, Mexico.

There's a sort of canard that people keep referring to: "Oh, well, you go to Mexico if you want to do hand work and cheap things. They don't have any technology. They don't have any skilled workers." I just want to let you know that this is a high-tech plant and that in the General Motors family of engine plants it's the best they've got.

Mr Sutherland: Just on that note, since we're getting closer to what looks like a North American free trade agreement, maybe it should be one of the future issues or near-future issues that this committee begins to look at what the implications of NAFTA may be for the province.

The Chair: You see, Mr Kwinter, being the Chair here, since I worked in St Catharines, I'd have to say St Catharines did a better job, but that's my opinion. Mr Treasurer, any final remarks?

Hon Mr Laughren: Thank you, Mr Chairman. I've enjoyed the exchanges because—I'm not saying this to butter anybody up—they've been thoughtful and not particularly partisan either. As you might expect, I am concerned about projections to the future and whether we're going to have the growth we think we're going to have because it makes it very tough on a lot of people if we don't. I believe we've started out of the recession and we're going to recover all right.

I really do get a lot of comments when I'm talking to people, other than people who stand back a bit, about Ontario being a great place to live and invest. I have had a lot of comments—I could read them out but it would be seen as too self-serving for words—made by the business community following the budget. I think this year it was a much better reception than last year. There was an appreciation of the acknowledgement to the business sector about the recession and its depth and the reduction in taxes to the business community. I think there was a real sense of that.

As well, the business community is quite complimentary about our attempts to look ahead and they talk about our commitment, for example, and strategic capital. They comment on that and say it is the right direction. They don't compliment me on the amendments to the Labour Relations Act, of course not; they don't compliment me on increases in the personal income tax, of course they don't, but I think that, on balance, the business community feels we've done some of the right things.

I don't like the barrage that occurs out there from time to time. It's a free country and a free province; people will do what they will with billboards and demonstrations. I've been part of those—not billboards, but I've certainly been part of demonstrations for a long time and so I understand that. My only concern always has been to make a distinction between people disliking and attacking the government as opposed to the province, because I think there's an enormous risk there for the very people who themselves have a lot to lose. It's always been my pitch to the business community that you don't have to love us, but keep your faith in the province. I didn't use your words, but I think yours were quite appropriate, Monte. Anyway, I enjoyed the afternoon.

The Chair: Thank you, Mr Treasurer. I notice you're about an hour and 15 minutes over your time, and we appreciate your presence at this committee.

Mr Kwinter: Mr Chairman, I want to personally thank the Treasurer for coming in and spending the time with us. It was very helpful.

Mr Phillips: Can I get an answer? Not now, but—

The Chair: A written answer?

Mr Phillips: My number two question, maybe just meet with somebody for that?

The Chair: Two and 3. Okay.

Mr Phillips: I'll just phone your office, I guess.

Hon Mr Laughren: Okay.

Mrs Caplan: Mr Chairman, I think it's a very productive use of the committee time to have the Treasurer here to discuss the economic issues and forecasts and perhaps to not only ask questions but to have a little bit of the kind of debate that we have. I hope the Treasurer will come back because businesses are making decisions today which are going to affect the long-term projections of the province. Many of the policies—fiscal, economic as well as social—are having an impact on some of the decisions. If we can have that discussion in this forum, perhaps some of the comments will be helpful to those making decisions that are going to affect the province in the medium and longer term.

Hon Mr Laughren: Thank you.

The Chair: This committee is adjourned.

The committee adjourned at 1749.

CONTENTS

Thursday 25 June 1992

1992 budget	F-125
Ministry of Treasury and Economics	F-125
Phyllis Clark, assistant deputy minister and chief economist, office of economic policy
Kevin Costante, acting director, fiscal policy planning branch
Hon Floyd Laughren, Treasurer and Minister of Economics
Alan Puttee, director, intergovernmental finance policy branch

STANDING COMMITTEE ON FINANCE AND ECONOMIC AFFAIRS

- Chair / Président: Hansen, Ron (Lincoln ND)
- Vice-Chair / Vice-Président: Sutherland, Kimble (Oxford ND)
- *Caplan, Elinor (Oriole L)
- *Carr, Gary (Oakville South/-Sud PC)
- *Christopherson, David (Hamilton Centre ND)
- Jamison, Norm (Norfolk ND)
- *Kwinter, Monte (Wilson Heights L)
- *Phillips, Gerry (Scarborough-Agincourt L)
- *Sterling, Norman W. (Carleton PC)
- *Ward, Brad (Brantford ND)
- Ward, Margery (Don Mills ND)
- *Wiseman, Jim (Durham West/-Ouest ND)

Substitutions / Membres remplaçants:

- *Klopp, Paul (Huron ND) for Mr Jamison

In attendance / présents

Also taking part / Autres participants et participantes:

- Owens, Stephen (Scarborough Centre ND)
- Stockwell, Chris (Etobicoke West/-Ouest PC)

Clerk / Greffier: Decker, Todd

Staff / Personnel: Campbell, Elaine, research officer, Legislative Research Service

F-9

F-9

ISSN 1180-4386

Legislative Assembly of Ontario

Second session, 35th Parliament

Official Report of Debates (Hansard)

Thursday 8 October 1992

Assemblée législative de l'Ontario

Deuxième session, 35^e législature

Journal des débats (Hansard)

Jeudi 8 octobre 1992

Standing committee on finance and economic affairs

1992 Budget

Comité permanent des finances et des affaires économiques

Budget de 1992

Chair: Ron Hansen
Clerk: Todd Decker

Président : Ron Hansen
Greffier : Todd Decker

Published by the Legislative Assembly of Ontario
Editor of Debates: Don Cameron

Publié par l'Assemblée législative de l'Ontario
Éditeur des débats : Don Cameron

Table of Contents

Table of Contents for proceedings reported in this issue appears on the outside back cover, together with a list of committee members and others taking part.

Index inquiries

Reference to a cumulative index of previous issues may be obtained by calling the Hansard Reporting Service indexing staff at 416-325-7410 or 325-7411.

Subscriptions

Subscription information may be obtained from: Sessional Subscription Service, Publications Ontario, Ministry of Government Services, 50 Grosvenor Street, Toronto, Ontario, M7A 1N8. Phone 416-326-5310, 326-5311 or toll-free 1-800-668-9938.

Table des matières

La table des matières des séances rapportées dans ce numéro se trouve sur la couverture à l'arrière de ce fascicule, ainsi qu'une liste des membres du comité et d'autres personnes ayant participé.

Renseignements sur l'index

Il existe un index cumulatif des numéros précédents. Les renseignements qu'il contient sont à votre disposition par téléphone auprès des employés de l'index du Journal des débats au 416-325-7410 ou 325-7411.

Abonnements

Pour les abonnements, veuillez prendre contact avec le Service d'abonnement parlementaire, Publications Ontario, ministère des Services gouvernementaux, 50 rue Grosvenor, Toronto (Ontario) M7A 1N8. Par téléphone : 416- 326-5310, 326-5311 ou, sans frais : 1-800-668-9938.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

STANDING COMMITTEE ON FINANCE AND ECONOMIC AFFAIRS

Thursday 8 October 1992

The committee met at 1546 in committee room 2.

1992 BUDGET

The Chair (Mr Ron Hansen): Okay, I'd like to bring this committee to order. I'd like to start off by giving a little bit of background on why we're here today. I received a letter on July 22 from Mr Phillips, and I'd like to read out the letter to give a little bit of background to some of the members who are new on the committee and maybe refresh some of the members, since it was a while ago. It says:

"Dear Mr Hansen:

"This letter is to formally request that the finance and economic affairs committee request the Provincial Auditor to give the committee his formal opinion on how the government has chosen to report its budgetary figures in the 1992-93 budget.

"My concern was dramatically heightened when Treasurer Laughren informed the finance and economic affairs committee on June 25, 1992, that the government had been required to pay at least $2 million more in interest payments than necessary in return for the teachers' pension agreeing to 'rescheduling' a $500-million payment due January 1, 1993, to the first day of the next fiscal year (ie, April 1, 1993). The only reason to do this was to show the deficit $500 million lower (ie, to get it below $10 billion). This will cost the taxpayer at least $2 million in unnecessary expense (see exhibit I: minutes of the finance and economic affairs committee meeting of June 25, 1992).

"My leader, Lyn McLeod, has consistently expressed concern about the accounting practices that the government has used in its 1992-93 budget. We tried to get the Provincial Auditor to investigate our concerns (see exhibit II: open letter to the acting Provincial Auditor, May 4, 1992).

"The Provincial Auditor said that he would be happy to, but required the Legislature to ask him (see exhibit III: auditor's response, May 8, 1992).

"We then asked public accounts committee to have that happen (see exhibit IV: motion put forward by Mr Greg Sorbara).

"The public accounts committee refused because the NDP majority rejected our request in spite of assurances by Treasurer Laughren that he was quite prepared to have the Provincial Auditor examine the budget (see exhibit V: minutes of the public accounts committee meeting of June 18, 1992).

"While the unnecessary expenditure of $2 million has upset us most recently, as you can see from the attached exhibits, we believe there are several matters of major concern.

"In closing, I look forward to having an opportunity to raise this matter with the Provincial Auditor. I await your reply.

"Yours sincerely

"Gerry Phillips

"MPP, Scarborough-Agincourt."

A copy went to the clerk, Todd Decker, and to the Honourable Floyd Laughren, Treasurer of Ontario.

Since we were on the break at that time, I talked to Mr Phillips and I said the first chance that we'd have when the House came back. I had talked to the clerk, Todd Decker, and the response that I got from him at the very beginning was:

"This is to get your direction on when the committee should meet.

"You asked me to arrange for the Provincial Auditor to be scheduled to meet with the committee to discuss the issues Gerry Phillips raised in his letter to you dated July 22.

"As you probably know, the public accounts committee dealt with selecting the new auditor this summer and made their recommendation on Monday of this week. In the meantime, there is no Provincial Auditor, so Gerry Phillips's request really can't be carried out just yet.

"Is there something else the committee could consider at a meeting, or should we just hold off for now?"

I'll read the letter that was sent to Mr Jim Otterman.

"Dear Mr Otterman:

"At the instruction of the committee's subcommittee and the Chair, I am writing to request that you attend at the committee's meeting at 10 am in committee room 2 of the Legislative Building on Thursday, October 8, 1992.

"The purpose of this meeting is for the committee to discuss with you the issues contained in the letter of Gerry Phillips, MPP, to the Chair of the committee, a copy of which is attached.

"It is the intention of the committee formally to request that you prepare a response to the issues raised by Mr Phillips and perhaps to solicit from you the methods that might be used to respond to these issues and the possible time frame involved.

"Todd Decker, clerk of the committee."

We had a subcommittee meeting last Thursday and at the subcommittee meeting we made arrangements for the auditor to come, agreed by all three subcommittee members. Another letter came from Todd Decker to me. It said:

"I made arrangements for the acting Provincial Auditor to come into the finance and economic affairs committee at 10 am this Thursday. However, he has a previous commitment to meet with the public accounts committee that same morning. I would suggest that we simply reschedule the meeting for Thursday pm, at which time he is available."

That was Todd Decker. So this is the reason we are in an afternoon meeting: We didn't meet this morning. That gives everybody a little bit of background on where we're at today. I would like to welcome Mr Otterman to the committee here. I see he's just sitting there, waiting to answer questions. I know the first member sitting in the room here waiting for a response was Mr Phillips, so I think we should get on. Would you introduce your colleague also? I see you have some other colleagues. As they come forward, if you need some help, would you just introduce them to the committee? Go ahead, Mr Otterman.

Mr Jim Otterman: Thank you, Mr Chair. With me here at the table is Ken Leishman, our executive director, who is our resident specialist on the public accounts and the accounting practices of the province of Ontario for our office.

The Chair: I want to take some direction from the committee here on how we would like to wind up asking questions of the auditor. Do you want to go for 15 minutes and go to each party, and then see how much time we've got and go back again?

Mr Gerry Phillips (Scarborough-Agincourt): Just so you know what initiated this and what I'm looking for out of this, when the budget came out, we had several concerns about the way the finances were reported. Fundamental to it all is that I think the public expects to get an accurate and fair assessment of the finances of the province. If it were a private corporation on the stock exchange, there would be a consistent way it would have to report so the public could see, in a consistent, fair manner, how the corporation was doing.

We raised several questions around the accounting practices in the budget. What I'm looking for—this is, I think, a role of the Provincial Auditor: to objectively advise the Legislature on the reporting of the finances. We have, I hope, the right to ask the auditor to give us those opinions.

Specifically, my leader raised three major issues. One was something called the rescheduling of cash payments, on page 73. My view is, that's not a rescheduling of cash payments; it is a loan. The government has borrowed $500 million from the teachers' pension. In fact, the Treasurer, in a document, calls it a loan. If that is the case, the budget should have reported it as a loan and the deficit would have been $500 million higher. I would like the auditor, not necessarily today, to inform the committee of whether, in consistent accounting practices, we are accurately, consistently reporting that as a loan.

As I say, I was further worried by this because we are required to pay 11¼% interest on the $500 million. If we went to the market and borrowed it, which is what really should happen, treasury is paying less than 8% now for money. The only reason we're borrowing the money from the teachers' pension is because it will allow us to call it a rescheduling of cash payments, not shown on this year's books, put it on next year's books and, in my opinion, artificially understate the deficit by $500 million. That's my opinion and I'd like the auditor's comments on that now or in the future.

My second major concern is, in the budget, there is, under revenue on page 81, something called "Payments from the federal government. Other." There is approximately $1.2 billion in there, a revenue from the federal government called, "Fiscal stabilization money, $1.2 billion." I don't think there is a hope in heck of that money coming this year. If this was a private corporation and this was an accounts receivable, there wouldn't be an auditor in the world who would ever sign the books and say, "This is a legitimate accounts receivable due and payable this year." The federal officials, when the budget came out, said: "They're not getting that money. I don't know what they're talking about."

That would be my second point: How can we determine whether that is a legitimate source of revenue to be put into the budget and on what basis it can be put in there? As a matter of fact, as you know, I think, I've asked, dating back from December, for the application of the fiscal stabilization. I said, "Just show it to us." Remember, I think it's in our notes here, each time we've been told we can't see that.

That's my second major question. It is a huge amount of money. As I say, if this were an account receivable, you would hear back from that person saying: "I'm sorry. Tell your client they're not getting the money this year."

The third issue is, again on page 81, you'll see something called "Sales and rentals," in 1991, $97 million; 1991-92, $93 million; 1992-93, $1.2 billion. This is two things. One is the plan to transfer a bunch of government land over to the Ontario Land Corp and get the Ontario Land Corp to give us back the money and, secondly, what a cynic might call a kind of tax scheme whereby we're going to sell trains and buses and stuff to offshore investors who will give us the money and then we'll repurchase the things over a 20-year period. That's just the first of the schemes. This is the tender here, the GO Transit request for proposals.

That's for almost $1 billion of revenue this year. I think that's just the first of the schemes. I think we're going to see a whole flood of similar things like selling off government buildings and leasing them back, that sort of stuff.

Those are my three major ones. As I say, I don't know where else to turn but to you and your staff to give us advice on whether this is legitimate, consistent accounting, and whether this accurately reflects the finances of the province and fully discloses to the public on a consistent basis or not. You can tell by the tone of my remarks that I don't think the public is being accurately told the fiscal situation of the province.

These are the specific issues I think we should be dealing with. There then is a longer-term issue that I don't want to cloud, but I think a role this committee might play is in helping to determine how the finances should be reported on a consistent basis that is most helpful to the public, because this isn't the only government that has ever done things like this.

1600

Mr Kimble Sutherland (Oxford): What was the last government to do that?

Mr Phillips: I think you'll see the provincial auditor in either Alberta or Saskatchewan has just issued a very major report on similar matters.

Mr Sutherland: I thought you meant here, Gerry.

Mr Phillips: I suspect in the past each government has advanced payments to pensions and what not, but my point is I think the public has to understand what we're really dealing with here. Many people in the investment community said, "Oh, the deficit's under $10 billion; maybe that's a step forward." But if it's artificially under $10 billion because of just pure accounting trickery, then it isn't really accurately helping the people understand the climate in the province.

I would appreciate the committee instructing the auditor to give us his opinion on the three major areas I've raised and whether that is accurately and consistently reflecting the books of disclosure to the public, and if it isn't, how should it be reported? If it is, I'll understand.

The Chair: I take it that's the question we're here for, but I'm just going to go around. Mr Stockwell, is there an additional question you'd like to put out, or would you like it to unfold as the answers come in from Mr—

Mr Chris Stockwell (Etobicoke West): No, I'd much prefer to hear the answer.

The Chair: Same thing, okay?

Mr Sutherland: No, no. I have a couple of comments. First of all, while the auditor's office has been asked here, I'd just like to get clear, because I don't know for sure. I mean, I have some familiarity with the office of the auditor, but I'd like you to explain, first of all, the official mandate of the auditor's office and how you see these questions fitting into that mandate; then maybe some question about what the priorities of the office are right now and, in terms of how this fits into the priorities of the office, how soon you think responses could be given.

I'd like to make one other note. Mr Phillips brought up the question about the GO train rolling stock and seemed to be questioning whether that was an appropriate procedure or not. He should be aware that the reason that is allowed is under federal law. They allow that at least for the airlines as well, so it's not an unprecedented practice here in this country.

The Chair: I believe Mr Kwinter has a submission.

Mr Monte Kwinter (Wilson Heights): I'd like to comment on the remarks that were just made. I'm not saying they're intentional, but if we were to follow those remarks, it would totally misdirect what we're here to talk to the auditor about. We're not interested in finding out what the role of the auditor is and how he sees his priorities. We're saying, "Here are some concerns that we have." If he wants to say to us, "That really isn't my purview to comment," that's fine, but I don't think we should be spending our time delving into the role of the auditor.

The Chair: I think he was asking for a summary.

Mr Sutherland: With all due respect, that's what I'm really getting at in terms of whether it's in the purview. I know the auditor comments on a lot of things in his report. Usually it's on the actual spending issues, so that's really I guess what I was getting at.

Mr Kwinter: Really all we want to do is ask the questions and he'll tell us whether or not he can comment on them.

Mr Sutherland: Okay. That's fair enough.

The Chair: Mr Otterman, maybe you could comment on the questions put out so far. Start off with Mr Phillips's questions that were put before the committee, since they were the first ones in.

Mr Otterman: Okay. However, in doing that, I'm going to lead pretty quickly into the mandate, which was raised in the latter question. I think we have to clarify for the purposes of this discussion today that the Provincial Auditor does not have a mandate to audit the budget or what is in the estimates. We have the responsibility to audit the financial statements of the province after the money is spent, after the accounting is made.

However, having said that, when Mrs McLeod wrote to me previously, requesting that we do some work in this area, I did say I would be pleased to attend at either the public accounts committee or any other legislative committee that may wish to ask questions about the accounting practices as they are currently conducted. In doing that, I guess we could put a hypothetical thing on this: that it's a year later from now and you can ask whether these events, if they occurred, would be accounted for properly. That would be a kind of starting point. We'd be pleased to discuss, within that framework, the three items Mr Phillips mentioned: the deferral, the equalization fund and the sale of assets.

Mr Phillips: What is called in here a rescheduling of cash payments but the Treasurer calls a loan: Under normal accounting practices, would you not be required to show that as a loan?

Mr Otterman: The key thing is the basis of accounting, which is a cash basis of accounting. In the cash basis of accounting you wouldn't record that loan until you actually received the proceeds. Similarly, on a disbursement you're not going to record the disbursement of whenever it's deferred to, that date, until you make that payment. What you have to compare here is the accounting basis, which is cash basis versus some other form of accounting basis, which is commonly referred to as accrual basis of accounting or modified versions thereof.

That's where I thought that by agreeing to come to the committee, this would be of some assistance. In much of the debate that's gone on so far, I see this difference coming up about accounting practices, which suggests to me that perhaps the cash basis of accounting versus the other forms of accounting, which are normally found in the private sector, are causing some misunderstanding.

If it were an accrual basis of accounting, that would have to be set up as a liability; there is no question. But it's not; it's a cash basis of accounting.

Mr Stockwell: So what do you set it up as?

Mr Otterman: You don't record it at all. There is no record until it's actually paid, which would be the April 1 period.

Mr Phillips: I think if you get in behind it, the Treasurer said they have lent the money from the teachers' pension, just as they would have lent the money from—and they've given them a note that they will pay 11.25% on it. If they had borrowed the money from a bank, you would have had to show that as a loan.

Mr Ken Leishman: There's no cash inflow. Based on the modified cash basis of accounting that the province follows right now, if its loans are set up as payable as a result of a cash transaction—

The Chair: Could you speak into the mike, please?

Mr Leishman: Yes. Here, there is no cash transaction. They have just agreed to defer the payment of that, which was originally due, I believe, on January 1, until April 1. That being the case, under the cash basis of accounting, that isn't recorded as an expense until April 1. It's a variation in reverse of what has happened the last three years in a row. There have been preflows; now this is a deferred flow. In essence, it's the exact opposite, which is allowable under the modified cash basis of accounting.

There is a question there, if you sit back, that it's in accordance with the accounting principles of the government. But more and more one might have to sit back and think, are these accounting principles appropriate?

Mr Phillips: The Treasurer has said it was a loan, and I can understand the rescheduling of the cash payments. But in my opinion, when he said it was a loan it meant they had essentially paid the money to the teachers' pension and reborrowed it at 11.25%.

1610

Mr Leishman: No. I think the Treasurer headed it up in his budget as a rescheduling of cash payments. So all they have done under the cash basis of accounting is deferred that payment, as well as more minor payments to the public service pension fund, from January 1 to April 1. That being the case, what would normally be charged as an expense during the fiscal year ended March 31, 1993, will not go through as an expense until the fiscal year beginning April 1, 1993.

Mr Stockwell: That's shameful.

Mr Phillips: How do we get at the abuse of taxpayers' money? We're going to be required to pay 11.25% on this. Just for the optics of rescheduling the cash payment, we will spend over $3 million in extra interest payments when we could have raised this money in the open market for $3 million cheaper.

The Chair: I don't know if that's a question for him to answer, because I think it's a treasury decision and he's the auditor. I don't know: Is this your role?

Mr Otterman: It's their decision. If you look at it, I think it has a net cost to the Treasurer of—I forget how long the period was, but it's a difference in interest rate of almost 2%.

Mr Phillips: More than that.

Mr Otterman: However, that's no different than if you preflow the money, which has been done in earlier years. There's a net effect of that. It's really a decision of the government, how it wants to spend the money and when it wants to spend it. So really, from a value-for-money point of view, I think it could be questioned and looked at that way, and I think it would be clear it cost them more interest expense. However, there are probably other transactions which gain them interest revenue the other way.

Mr Kwinter: Mr Otterman, you just raised the point that I wanted to raise. That was, you are empowered to do a value-for-money audit. You do it all the time. You could quite reasonably, if you were auditing the budget—which you don't do, because that isn't in your mandate—point out the fact that there was a cost that could have been avoided had they gone another route.

The question about the budget—and I take your point about how the government has the right. It certainly, whether it's an accrued or cash basis, can make this decision. But the question that we raised is that the budget is a road map of where this government hopes to be one year down the road from a fiscal point of view. That's really what it is; it's an estimate and it's a best-kind-of-guess estimate.

The point that we're trying to make is not to question whether or not the government has the right to do this. But certainly if it is stating—and this is a political document—that the deficit is $9.9 billion when in fact it has changed the type of allocations that it has made or it has mixed up the accrual and the cash basis and it has made that decision, then what you have is a political statement that the deficit for this year is $9.9 billion. Whether or not it's proper that they can do these things, what it does is it does not compare apples with apples. It doesn't say: "If we had done it on the same basis that we did last year, which we chose not to, our deficit would have been $11 billion or $12 billion. But we have made the decision, and it's quite within our right and quite within accounting principles to do it this way, and as a result we are telling you that the deficit is $9.9 billion when in fact if we had used the same process we'd used last year and if we were to compare this year with last year it would be up in the $12-billion-plus range." Is that a fair statement?

Mr Otterman: Yes, that happens, and we've tracked these in our annual reports in the past. When they're fairly major adjustments that way, where plans change during the year whereby funds were either preflowed or in this case will be deferred, when we get to our next year's report we would point out that these funds were not flowed as they normally would be. But it's caught, usually, in the financial reporting end of it, at the end of the fiscal year.

The other case is that I think in the past they've always been highlighted by the treasurers in whatever quarter it works, in their quarterly fiscal report. So it's not as neat and nice as it could be, but these disclosures are made and a reader can find them out and work that in to adjust for comparability purposes.

Mr Stockwell: Firstly, let me just say that I don't agree with what you said just a minute ago. This particular issue, the rescheduling of cash payments, was absolutely buried and hidden—almost deceitfully hidden, in my opinion—during the budget process. I even asked the question in the House of the Treasurer, "Are you going to pay a premium for this borrowing?" and the answer was, "No, we're not." I'm going to say he didn't know, but frankly, as an auditor and a value-for-money auditor, it would seem to me it's absolutely incumbent on you not only to point this kind of thing out but to rail on about exactly the expense to the taxpayers for nothing.

Mr Kwinter: His mandate is not to deal with the budget.

Mr Stockwell: I know his mandate is not to deal with the budget, but he's a value-for-money auditor. This is going to take place, and if the question is put to you, "It's going to happen," I would expect to hear that it's silly to defer this for three months for no other purpose than to keep your debts at below $10 billion, if it's value for money. Where is the value in this? What's the value in doing this? Maybe that's the question: Where's the value in your mind in doing this?

The Chair: Maybe just for all committee members, you're doing it as an accountant, taking a look at the accounting principles here, regardless of what the treasury does. That interest does not show up until April 1 and it's accounted in the next year. I'm not a chartered accountant myself and—

Mr Stockwell: I'm just asking, where's the value in this trickery? Where's the value to the taxpayer?

Mr Otterman: It's very difficult to comment on any item or decision that's taken in the budget. We don't have the authority to audit the budget, how it's prepared. Actually, we tried several years ago and I think a legal opinion by the then treasury people clearly indicated that we did not have the authority or the mandate to question anything in the budget, in its preparation.

For example, we were concerned with the estimates made for the major sources of revenue. To do a value-for-money audit of that area, just to take your example of this $2 million, you would have to be privy to the reasons the Treasurer had, all the choices, assumptions or whatever that were available to him to make the decision whether the net cost of this transaction was good value for money, and we clearly wouldn't get access to that information.

Mr Stockwell: This is not an estimate, sir. This is not a revenue projection. This is very simply a deferral. It's a deferral of a payment. If you pay on January 1, it costs you X; if you pay on April 1, it costs you X plus Y. Where in this is the value to the taxpayer? I'm not asking about estimates, I'm not asking about revenues; I'm asking a simple accounting question. By deferring this to keep the deficit below $10 billion, what is in here that's valuable for the taxpayer?

Mr Otterman: My answer is that it's not the accounting question you're concerned with. I think we've handled the accounting question. Just like any other item in the budget, whatever reasons the Treasurer has, we're not going to get at that. We don't have the mandate to get at it.

The Chair: You just make sure all the nickels are in there at the end of the year.

Mr Stockwell: I understand what he does.

Mr Phillips: Can I just ask a question on the fiscal stabilization thing? I think it's a bogus accounts receivable. The problem is, it's only at the end of the year we find out and then we're on to the next budget. I think they had $570 million in last year's budget. Surprise, surprise, they didn't get it. Whom can we call on to help us determine whether in fact this is a legitimate item to put in as an account receivable? As I say, if we were in the private sector we would ask our accounting firm to confirm that this is legitimate. We're counting on you, I guess, to give us some assistance here. How can you help us on this?

Mr Otterman: I guess if you go to the cash basis of accounting, he's not considering it as an account receivable. He thinks it's a payment that he is going to receive in the 1992-93 fiscal year.

1620

Mr Stockwell: What do you call that? It's not an account receivable?

Mr Otterman: Not on the cash basis of accounting because no cash has changed hands at this point. You've got to switch gears between the two types of accounting, but let's not belabour that part of it.

Again, you're into getting access to the information that the Treasurer would have had to say: "I think this is a good estimate. I think we are going to get it," and where, of course, as I explained, it'll have access to that. How you get that I think would have to be through your questions to the Treasurer and his people. Invite them in, ask them those questions. I think the disclosure is there—

Mr Phillips: I'm sorry, we've tried. We've asked them for 10 months to give us the application. They won't.

Mr Stockwell: You're the last line of defence.

Mr Kwinter: I would like to pursue the same issue, again hypothetically. I understand your role and where you can't comment.

In a public company, if you were to find there was an amount that was included in the annual statement of the financial affairs of the company, an amount of $1.2 billion, which is a substantial amount of money, that was an expected revenue during that fiscal period, you would think there would be some effort on the part of the auditor to verify that those funds were forthcoming, and if not, there would be a note to the financial statement saying these funds are there but there's no indication, no verification, in fact, that they're going to come. Is that a fair assumption?

Mr Leishman: Yes, that's absolutely a fair assumption when you're dealing with their financial statements at the end of the year. If they had an account receivable of $1.2 billion there which could not be confirmed and it was doubtful whether it was going to come in, you would no doubt qualify their financial statements because their revenue had been overstated. But what we're dealing with here is a budget which is prepared based on the cash basis of accounting, and it was the Treasurer's best estimate that the whole $1.2 billion would be received during this coming year.

Our job as auditors of the province, under the modified cash basis of accounting, is fairly simple. If, in fact, that money comes in, then we confirm, "Yes, indeed it did come in and it came in at the amount they applied for." If it doesn't come in, then that should not, under their current basis of accounting, be set up in the financial statements for the year ended March 31, 1993 as revenue at all.

If this were a private company, then what we would be doing would be exactly as Mr Phillips stated. We would be examining that application, making sure the application was valid and at the correct amounts. We would be confirming with the federal government, "Yes, indeed, you do have a valid payable to the provincial government," but under the modified cash basis of accounting we, as auditors, are only interested in what comes in cashwise.

You're right, there is a chance that a portion of that $1.2 billion might not be received this year. Perhaps the whole thing won't be received. If it isn't, when the financial statements come out their budget will be over what their actual is by $1.2 billion.

Mr Otterman: I'd just like to add two points to perhaps further clarify that.

In your private sector example, Mr Kwinter, you used the financial statements, if we were auditing the financial statements. Also, if in the private sector we were auditing a prospectus for that company, that they're going out to try and expand their operation and get more money from lenders, there the auditor is looking at some of the reasonableness of the figures they've put into their financial projections, and that forecast would be like examining the budget.

Mr Kwinter: If I could just—

The Chair: We've got Mr Sutherland—

Mr Kwinter: Just a supplementary.

The Chair: A short one.

Mr Kwinter: That's exactly the point I want to make. The budget of Ontario, which is not an accounting document per se because it's a projection, is a prospectus. It is being put out to entice people to invest in Ontario. It is being put out to try to get support for the fiscal policies of the government. If these things are put out and say, "We have a $1.2-billion receivable and we are going to defer costs," and everything else, it really misrepresents the financial status of the province.

We as members of the Legislature have to take on the role that an auditor or a securities commission would take on if it were a prospectus with a public offering or an auditor in a financial statement. I think we have the right and the obligation to take a look at revenue projections where there is no basis for assuming that those revenues will ever be received. Our concern is that when we try to get some kind of indication, some sort of verification that yes, an application has been made, yes, there has been a response that was favourable and yes, there's every indication and every expectation that during this fiscal period ending March 31 we will be the recipients of $1.2 billion in federal transfer payments, and when we don't get that, when we don't get any comfort that this is going to happen, then I think we have a problem.

I think we have an obligation to people who are looking to the fiscal position or stability of the province to let them know that there's some gerrymandering going on, or whatever you want to call it, there's some creative accounting, and these are areas that should be open to question, which is all we're doing.

The Chair: Any response?

Mr Gary Wilson (Kingston and The Islands): That wasn't really a question.

The Chair: I don't know.

Mr Sutherland: So I guess, to summarize here, we've had the Liberal members ask three questions. But basically, if I can summarize correctly, you have indicated that at this time you're not in a position to make any statements on that because you will have to wait until the financial year is closed and the actual financial statements are presented. Then you'll be able to make some comment in terms of whether their concerns are valid or whether the Treasurer has put forward an accurate position of the financial statements.

Mr Otterman: I think it'll be self-evident. The events themselves will be disclosed at that point and we'll simply audit the validity of those events. That's correct.

Mr Sutherland: So in terms of right now, though, again what we have here is speculation on how the events may turn out and we have to wait and see how the events actually turn out.

Mr Stockwell: My question now is more on procedure. There are clearly bold-faced untruths, in my opinion, in this budget. There's just no doubt in my mind that they are simply in there—

Mr Sutherland: Excuse me. A point of order, Mr Chair: Could I ask, for the record, since this is the second time Mr Stockwell has used such language, whether we are under the same guidelines as the House in terms of what type of language we use?

The Chair: I believe we are.

Mr Stockwell: Which word were you upset about—"bold"?

Mr Sutherland: No. I think "untruth" is the one I want to take out and challenge you on.

The Chair: Okay. Just use another word there, Mr Stockwell. You've got many.

Mr Stockwell: Lies.

The Chair: No, no. Come on.

Mr Stockwell: I guess that's not a good word either. I guess I feel very strongly about this. I'll say they are just unbelievable.

The Chair: Okay. That's a good one.

Mr Stockwell: It's just unbelievable that this should be brought forward in this fashion. The $1.2-billion fiscal stabilization account is a pipedream. We all know it. Maybe they don't, but they will know it soon. The sales and rentals are, in my opinion, a little sketchy. That one can almost be acceptable, but the $500 million now being pushed off for three months is absolutely unbelievable.

I guess my question to you is: The treasury department can't help us, simply because it is not allowed to speak out against the government. That's very clear, because no accountant would sign this. You as the auditor can't help us, because you're on a cash audit system where the moneys have to actually appear before you can make a determination, or not appear or the year has to end, so you're of no use. So who is it that we go to as protectors of the taxpayers, as stewards of the taxpayers, from a professional basis in the huge bureaucracy of this place, to announce to the public for their own protection that these numbers are cooked? Who has that responsibility?

Mr Otterman: A general answer to that is, I believe you as members, under your ability to use the tools you have—

Mr Stockwell: But there's no professional staff, in essence, none; no professional staff hired by the taxpayers.

1630

Mr Gary Wilson: I think you're the professional staff. You're the guys who are supposed to be doing that.

Mr Stockwell: I'm not asking you to provide these numbers. Why would I ask you anything? My question is, there's no professional staff we can approach who would give an unbiased, professional opinion on whether these numbers are cooked. That's all I'm asking. You're of no help. Who is it? Who's supposed to do this?

The Chair: Mr Stockwell, I think he answered the question before. He counts all the nickels at the end—

Mr Stockwell: I'm asking him who is the staff who can help us. Is there anyone who can ferret this out? You know they're cooked, I know they're cooked, the Treasury staff knows they're cooked, but nobody can say it.

Mr Sutherland: Mr Chair.

The Chair: Just a minute. Mr Sutherland.

Mr Sutherland: First of all, I resent the implication that the books have been cooked here. Okay?

Mr Stockwell: I'm saying it, categorically: They're cooked.

Mr Sutherland: Mr Stockwell, you've had your opportunity. I'd like to have mine here for a couple of seconds, please. The point of the matter is, Mr Stockwell has indicated that we have no basis for a claim to the fiscal stabilization account and I don't think that's the case. I think there is a legitimate claim Ontario has for this and that we deserve that. Now the question may be as to when we're going to receive that and that may be an issue that comes up.

Mr Stockwell: You must have fallen off a turnip truck.

Mr Sutherland: Just a minute here: There has not been a process put in place for this type of assessment of a budget to go on. The auditors have said, and they've said it several times here already, that at the year-end, when the financial statements are presented, they'll be able to make some type of judgement, but probably by that time we will know anyway because as events unfold the information will be presented. The information has been presented. The auditors have answered. I'm not sure what else we're going to be able to do at this stage this afternoon regarding the assessment.

Mr Stockwell: I just asked a question.

The Chair: I know. You made a statement. There was one—

Mr Stockwell: Can I get an answer to my question?

The Chair: I just want one question. I know the Chair usually doesn't ask a question, but it is for a little clarification so I understand all the issues here too. This procedure has been carrying on for how long, what we're doing right now, on the auditing? This is not something new in the last year or two years; this has been going on for years, so there hasn't been a change in auditing, has there?

Mr Otterman: I don't think it's a change in auditing.

The Chair: Or accounting.

Mr Otterman: Are you asking, is it a change in accounting?

The Chair: Yes.

Mr Otterman: There's been no change in the basis of accounting, to the best of my knowledge, going back to—

The Chair: Just maybe give the whole committee a little clarification.

Mr Otterman: Maybe since 1968 was the last major change.

The Chair: Fine. Can you answer Mr Stockwell's—

Mr Stockwell: The only question I have left is, is there any professional staff, bureaucrats who are hired, who can come in and get an honest accounting, a person-in-the-field submission, as to the validity of this? Is there anyone?

Mr Otterman: If you're asking, is such an estimate capable of being audited? the answer would be yes, it's capable of being audited.

Mr Stockwell: So unless the Treasury department agreed to release that report there's little, if anything, we can do?

Mr Sutherland: Public accounts committee.

Mr Stockwell: Somehow this—

Mr Phillips: We were turned down at public accounts.

Mr Stockwell: Yes.

Mr Phillips: We were voted down by the NDP. They wouldn't let us look at it.

Mr Sutherland: You look at it and you look at the—

Mr Phillips: We took it there and we were voted down.

Mr Sutherland: At public accounts, though, you look at the financial statements after the year is over and review them.

Mr Stockwell: No, I'm asking now. Just like if you were going for a public offering, like Mr Kwinter said, there is some validity to the numbers. All I'm asking is, is there any avenue or any area open that could measure the validity of these numbers? Because in my opinion they're cooked. How do I get that out to the public? It's shameful.

Mr Otterman: I would just comment that when you say the books are cooked, I think you've got to be careful of that, too. It's a little generic. If you're talking about the budget and the estimates therein, fine.

Mr Stockwell: That's what I'm talking about: They're cooked.

Mr Otterman: But you're talking about the financial statements of this province.

Mr Stockwell: That's what I'm talking about, the budget: The numbers are cooked.

Mr Otterman: They haven't been cooked.

Mr Stockwell: They're cooked.

Mr Otterman: Okay.

Mr Stockwell: No more questions.

Mrs Elinor Caplan (Oriole): First of all, I appreciate your being here today. I think the questions we have about the accounting practices in the formation of the budget are ones which are of interest to people who are looking at the province's budget for the purposes of deciding on future investment opportunities and so forth, in judging our credit rating and generally, after the fact, the competence of the government or ultimately how good it was in not only predicting but making decisions from policy, both economic and fiscal, as well as social policy decisions. So the question we have around the accounting practices is a real one.

I'm not going to engage in the kind of rhetoric of my friend Mr Stockwell, but there's such a thing as generally accepted accounting principles and generally accepted accounting practices when a corporation establishes a budget or an estimate, and the questions we have are very serious and very legitimate, and that is, are the practices and the principles that have gone into the formation of the budget in line with those which are generally accepted for large corporations which are developing perspectives, or is there something different about this?

Are the assumptions that are being made in this budget realistic and legitimate so that people can count on them, or have they been sort of selectively taken in a way which would give us—we do expect that the year-end results are going to be very different than the estimates the budget put forward, and that causes us great concern.

Mr Otterman: Perhaps I can go at this, to try to be helpful, in this way: On your first example of the private sector, referring to the terms of generally accepted accounting principles and so forth, probably for the last 15 years, various governments around the world, and primarily in Canada the Canadian federal level and some of the provincial levels, have been looking at the various bases of accounting they've been using over the years.

It's probably to say that most started with the cash basis of accounting. In many parts of the world today and in most parts of Canada, some modified version of the cash basis—which I don't want to get into, it'll only get confusing, but it means you hold the books open a few days. You don't cut off cash receipts or cash expenditures right at the end of the fiscal year, and they use that term "modified" there.

There has been very much work done in Canada by the CICA, the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants, through its public sector accounting and auditing committee, and even around the world, Australia, New Zealand the United Kingdom and several other governments have been working towards trying to improve the financial accounting and reporting systems in an attempt to improve overall accountability.

You could tie that back to the budgets. Once you change your basis of accounting, you'll likely apply that same basis in preparing your budget. You may not. If you don't, then you've got some reconciliation to do, and that could be confusing, I suppose, too.

But it may be useful to the committee, and also to the public accounts committee, if they wish to delve into this matter, to take a look at a study that was done by the International Federation of Accountants, which is comprised of the major accounting bodies around the world, in a report it released in March 1991. It probably gives the best explanation of the various bases of accounting that exist, from the cash basis on the one end to the full accrual, generally accepted private sector basis on the other end, with various versions in between. It's probably the best laymanized—as accountants can get, anyway—version I've seen and I'd recommend it.

Mrs Caplan: It's not too boring. Is that what you're saying?

Mr Otterman: Yes, I think it's fairly readily understandable too. It won't get you into a whole bunch of fancy jargon that'll put you to sleep right away. I think that would be a useful thing for you to consider in response to the other member's question, who I would seriously like to help, but this might be the more useful way of helping.

I think these various forms of the basis of accounting generally regard that the more you move up the ladder from cash basis to the other forms up to the full accrual basis, the thinking is anyway that it is an improvement in accountability to be able to demonstrate your stewardship for the funds than the lower end.

1640

Mrs Caplan: Where would you place Treasurer Laughren on that scale from zero being cash to 100% being accrual?

Mr Otterman: The province essentially follows the full cash basis of accounting except expenditures—you can pick me up on that—

Mr Leishman: It's modified from about three.

Mrs Caplan: Three?

Mr Leishman: Towards the cash basis.

Mrs Caplan: Say that again.

Mr Leishman: About 2 or 3 out of 10, leaning towards the not fully cash basis, but almost fully cash basis.

Mrs Caplan: That's the least level of accountability in public administration and that falls short of where the international community is recommending governments should be.

Mr Otterman: That's what the accounting communities are recommending.

Mrs Caplan: The international accounting community has recommended greater—

Mr Otterman: Yes. They see it increasing the accountability such as the earlier questions. It would cover things like loans receivable and loans payable. Undoubtedly, as you go up into the full accrual accounting, the items have to be set up when the transaction occurs versus when the cash flows.

Mr Leishman: I'd just like to make one statement. Whether you follow full cash accounting or whether you follow full accrual accounting—I think we commented on this in our report last year, the year before last and the year before that. Whatever basis you follow, when it's followed with integrity, that's fine. But where accountants and auditors begin to have a problem is when, in their opinion, the integrity aspect isn't there. I'm not making any comment about this year or last year. It's just a general comment.

Mrs Caplan: I'm going to yield to my colleague Mr Phillips.

The Vice-Chair (Kimble Sutherland): I'm sorry; I've got to go to Mr Jamison and then come back, okay?

Mr Norm Jamison (Norfolk): If we bring this back into perspective, Mr Phillips has asked the auditors to come here today to answer some questions. Due to the way the Provincial Auditor's function exists, I think the auditors have put it very clearly that their role is one they have to be very careful about in their answers.

On the rest of the conversation, it should become painfully aware on the part of the Liberal Party in this committee, it should become very clear that as with any budget, there are projections. I think this is what Mr Phillips is talking about: the projections. We have talked, even in the latest round of the Canada talks, about certain commitments being upheld by the federal government, about certain payments and certain duties the federal government has not being negated at certain times. I think the Treasurer has answered some of those questions in direct questioning from Mr Phillips in the House.

I'd like to say this: As with any budget, and certainly the Liberals should be aware of this, their projections were well off, given one certain projection in around 1990, I believe, to a great extent. That deals with economic factors that are projections in any budget, and those we should be aware of, especially sitting on this committee. As we've talked to economists, for example, over the last two years and listened to projections on the economy based on renowned economists in this province, all of us have been saddened to come to understand that none of them has been right. It's a very deceptive kind of art in itself, trying to predict what will happen in the future. So I would say to you that in the context of Mr Phillips's letter, your abilities to answer those questions you described are very limited in their scope.

Mr Phillips: Just on the point Mr Jamison made, I appreciate the auditors' report on the deficit in which they said there was only one surplus in the last 20 years in Ontario, and that was the final Liberal budget. Then it goes in detail to explain what happened after the NDP took over and the $3-billion deficit. As I've said in the House, if the Premier dares to use that $8-billion number again, I will challenge him to a very public debate.

I'm back to the audit, and I hope you can understand our frustration, because we can't seem to get any help in terms of dealing with the issues. We started with this thing when the budget came out. We asked the auditor, and he said, "Well, I'll have to get a committee to ask me." We tried to take it to public accounts; public accounts turned us down.

Last year in the budget there was, I think, $570 million receivable from the fiscal stabilization fund. It never came in. Did you, on hindsight, examine that and comment on the legitimacy of that claim and whether that was realistic to have in revenue?

Mr Otterman: No, I don't believe we did any work on that claim.

Mr Phillips: Could you do that? I gather you're saying you can do nothing about the one that's in this year's budget, but you could give us an opinion on whether there was reason for it to be in the budget last year.

Mr Leishman: Mr Phillips, I believe it wasn't in the budget last year. The first time it appeared was as of—

Mr Phillips: An estimate, okay.

Mr Leishman: —the December 31 Ontario finances that came in.

Mr Phillips: Yes, that's right.

Mr Leishman: Had it come in for the year, had it been received, then we would have audited it. I believe somewhere someone has made a statement that with those claims, the federal government has a period of 30 months upon which to act. I think the claims were made in December 1991 and February 1992. So you can take it from that as to whether it will be received this year. I don't know. We aren't privy to the discussions that are going on between ministry of treasury and treasury in Ottawa, so we wouldn't know.

Mr Phillips: You can see why I'm getting frustrated here. It was in the revenue estimates last year. It didn't come in. You do the audit, but you can't comment on it because it didn't come in. You will never, ever be able to give us a comment on whether it should ever have been included, then?

Mr Leishman: If the government changed its basis of accounting to the accrual basis of accounting, then things would be different.

Mr Phillips: But aren't, then—for the public—your hands totally tied and you can't comment on the fiscal stabilization?

Let me tell you what's going to happen. The government is desperate to get the deficit down. There will be so many different schemes down the road that your head will spin. The first one we see is to sell the GO trains; then there will be a bunch of buildings sold; then they'll probably take sewer and water off the books; then they're going to take training and what not, and take it off the books; then there will be just a series of things. So the public, without somebody like yourself—we can try to do it in opposition, but we need some help—is not going to have a consistent basis of comparison. I'm getting the feeling from you people that you can't help us.

Mr Otterman: There is one thing that we shouldn't overlook. As we've mentioned in previous reports, we've tracked the kind of unusual or abnormal cash flows that have occurred in here, whether they were included in the budget or not. After the year-end, we can comment on the variances from budget, if we wish to, and look into those. At year-end, we would give further scrutiny to ensure that the financial statements are correct, that the integrity is there in terms of, for example, this equalization-stabilization payment; as we would do for, say, the personal tax revenue—that's under an agreement—and how that flows. We give it some scrutiny to see that they got the money they were supposed to get, that the variance is not all that far off.

Under the cash basis, the thing that we're always looking for in accounting at year-end, if you really want to get into the integrity part, is that there were no deliberate attempts to stop money from coming in, like putting it into the next year and stuff like this. We look at that. It's not going to be the easiest thing in the world, maybe, to find, but we would do that.

But beyond that, no, we'd be back into looking at the budget items again and we're not privy to that.

1650

Mr Kwinter: I'd like to comment on Mr Jamison's comments and maybe get a reaction from you. I think it's quite apparent that we are not critical of the fact that, given the uncertainty of our economic environment, the projections are not right on an income and expenditure basis. Because of the depth of the recession, because of certain things that have happened on a global basis, those things change.

We have no problem with that, and we're not criticizing anybody for saying, "Our revenues were supposed to be this, our expenditures were supposed to be that and we didn't meet our targets." That happens all the time in many organizations.

What we are critical of and what we are trying to get some sort of handle on is when they take $500 million and delay the payment for no reason. It isn't as if the province is strapped for money on the long term. They have access to $500 million any time they want it, so it's obvious that the three-month delay was strictly cosmetic; it was strictly so that the $9.9-billion figure could be held, because in the minds of the Treasurer and the cabinet and the Premier, "We don't want to go over $10 billion, so whatever you do, do some creative accounting to keep it under the $10 billion."

What they've done is taken $500 million and said, "Instead of paying it in January, when we normally do—we certainly don't have to go and beg on the streets to get the money; we have the money, because there's always a turnover," they have agreed to take the $2-million penalty, or whatever the amount is, and delay it until April 1. They have set up a receivable of $1.2 billion, of which there is no real, concrete confirmation that it's going to be forthcoming. They have set up internal sales of assets to a crown corporation so that they can also show it.

The concern we have is that if it weren't for the politics of it, what they would do is let the figures go. Whatever they are, they are. Businesses are faced with exactly the same obligation. These are the figures, with a footnote to the budget, "We have applied for stabilization transfer payments, and if they are forthcoming, we will reduce our deficit"; not the other way around, of including them and saying, "These funds are coming, and as a result, here's what our deficit is going to be."

That is the problem I personally have. The tail is wagging the dog. The number is $9.9 billion; your responsibility is to come up with that number. How you do it—just make it so that it sounds feasible and come up with these various scenarios and, "This is the one that seems to be the most palatable and the one we can sell the best."

That is my concern. I'm not asking you to make a political comment. What I'm saying to you is, do you not agree that the way it should be done is to state the financial condition, and if you want to put some of these other things in, put them in as potential changes as opposed to, "These are the facts; this is what it's going to be, and we'll worry about it next year when it doesn't happen"?

Mr Otterman: That is an alternative way of handling it. But again, not being privy to what went into the decision-making for doing it the way the Treasurer did, I can't comment further.

Mr Gary Wilson: I guess one thing that occurs to me here is that the auditor and his colleague have been very patient in explaining the kind of accounting system that's used here, and the Chair brought out that it has been in effect for a good number of years. I wonder why, if the Liberals are so exercised about it now, they didn't immediately proceed to change it to the accrual type of accounting rather than what's called the modified cash basis of accounting. As we've heard, there are the two ways of doing it, and that has been in practice for a long time.

The other thing is, as Mr Phillips mentioned, that the surplus was brought in by the Liberals under, it seems to me, the same kind of arrangement. Then you'd have the accountants drawing to the attention of the Legislature, perhaps, how that was achieved: by downloading on the municipalities, for instance, and other ways of keeping the money here rather than fulfilling responsibilities.

Pay equity is another example, the things that weren't done, where the money might have been spent, which would have run up a deficit or at least taken down the surplus. Those are political decisions, and I think they've been quite clear that this is where our responsibility lies. I just wanted to make that comment, Mr Chair.

The Chair: That's a comment. Okay. Any questions? Mr Sutherland.

Mr Sutherland: I think Mr Wilson is right in terms of the types of political decisions you make. Mr Chair, though, I think we've had the auditors here for an hour, we've gone through questions three or four times. I think we understand.

The auditors have commented on what they can at this stage, so unless there are new questions outside the teachers' pension plan issue, the stabilization account and the Ontario Land Corp, I'm not quite sure what the need is to continue questioning this afternoon. The auditors have commented on what they can comment on, and beyond that, it is going to have to be left until the end of the fiscal year, coming back probably from a public accounts standpoint.

The Chair: Okay. Want to wrap it up, Mr Phillips?

Mr Phillips: Well, I'll try. It's been a frustrating experience, and if you've commented on the fiscal stabilization last year anywhere, I'd like to see it, because that seems to be the only area you can comment on. I think we'll have to pursue it in whatever way we can. I guess we can't get much assistance from the auditor. I think my concerns are real and are valid, and I'm concerned that the public is not being given the full picture.

I think there's another long-term issue we may want to look at as a committee, and that is the suggestion from the auditor of whether we can initiate a new way of reporting for the province.

I think people are cynical, and I'm not saying this is the first government ever to do these things, because I think every government looks for ways to try to make itself look better. Every single government does it. But the members of the public get very cynical when they see they can't trust the numbers, and therefore I'd like perhaps to get copies of the report that you've got. I would like perhaps some time on our committee, Mr Chairman.

The Chair: Yes, maybe the committee could get a copy of that.

Mr Phillips: I think all of us perhaps could agree that it's in our best interests to try to find ways to update our provincial reporting systems, because otherwise it will be the most creative artist out there who—this GO thing is just the start of it. There are going to be some of the most harebrained schemes over at Treasury to try to make the numbers look better. Quite understandable. I think the whole financial community has been alerted to it. It's, "Bring forward the schemes," and I understand that.

So I would request perhaps the report, a chance on this committee for discussion. I appreciate your coming here today and I appreciate that you can only do what you have the authority to do and that we're railing at you when we're railing at something else. I hope you take it in the way that I certainly meant it and I hope we all meant it. I'm frustrated, but I don't think they can do much more for us.

The Chair: Okay, Mr Phillips. I'm glad that we were able to have the auditor come at your request and that the committee agreed to have the auditor come before this committee. Being frustrated, maybe you'll become an accountant in the end, to figure out how to—

Mr Phillips: Oh, it's better than politics.

The Chair: That's why I asked a few questions. Normally as a Chair I don't ask the questions, but I like to get a little bit of clarification. It is a special field and takes many years. My assistant's dad owns a firm in St Catharines and that's why I had him in here for a while, in case I got lost with some of the terminology. But I didn't have to run back to him.

Mr Otterman, you explained everything quite clearly, and as I've heard Mr Phillips say, you're one of the the bean counters out there so you make sure all the beans are in the jar at the end of the year. I don't think there have been any missing that I can see, but maybe there are a few still growing out there that haven't been picked until the next year, as Mr Phillips has said.

I appreciate your attendance here, and maybe as a committee we'll take a look at welcoming you back again after the fiscal year. Maybe there are going to be some changes that can be made. As you say, you've been doing the same old job for years the same old way, but maybe there are better ways to do it. Thank you for coming.

This meeting is now adjourned until we have another subcommittee meeting.

The committee adjourned at 1700.

CONTENTS

Thursday 8 October 1992

1992 budget F-139

STANDING COMMITTEE ON FINANCE AND ECONOMIC AFFAIRS

Chair / Président: Hansen, Ron (Lincoln ND)

Vice-Chair / Vice-Président: Sutherland, Kimble (Oxford ND)

Caplan, Elinor (Oriole L)

Carr, Gary (Oakville South/-Sud PC)

Christopherson, David (Hamilton Centre ND)

Jamison, Norm (Norfolk ND)

Kwinter, Monte (Wilson Heights L)

Phillips, Gerry (Scarborough-Agincourt L)

Sterling, Norman W. (Carleton PC)

Ward, Brad (Brantford ND)

Ward, Margery (Don Mills ND)

Wiseman, Jim (Durham West/-Ouest ND)

Substitutions / Membres remplaçants:

Wilson, Gary (Kingston and The Islands/Kingston et Îles ND) for Mr Ward

In attendance / présents

Also taking part / Autres participants et participantes:

Leishman, Ken W., executive director, reporting and special audits, Office of the Provincial Auditor

Otterman, Jim F., acting Provincial Auditor

Stockwell, Chris (Etobicoke West/-Ouest PC)

Clerk pro tem / Greffière par intérim: Manikel, Tannis

Staff / Personnel: Campbell, Elaine, research officer, Legislative Research Service

F-10

F-10

ISSN 1180-4386

Legislative Assembly of Ontario

Second session, 35th Parliament

Official Report of Debates (Hansard)

Thursday 29 October 1992

Standing committee on finance and economic affairs

London-Middlesex Act, 1992

Assemblée législative de l'Ontario

Deuxième session, 35^e législature

Journal des débats (Hansard)

Jeudi 29 octobre 1992

Comité permanent des finances et des affaires économiques

Loi de 1992 sur
London et Middlesex

Chair: Ron Hansen
Clerk: Todd Decker

Président : Ron Hansen
Greffier : Todd Decker

Table of Contents

Table of Contents for proceedings reported in this issue appears on the outside back cover, together with a list of committee members and others taking part.

Index inquiries

Reference to a cumulative index of previous issues may be obtained by calling the Hansard Reporting Service indexing staff at 416-325-7410 or 325-7411.

Subscriptions

Subscription information may be obtained from: Sessional Subscription Service, Publications Ontario, Ministry of Government Services, 50 Grosvenor Street, Toronto, Ontario, M7A 1N8. Phone 416-326-5310, 326-5311 or toll-free 1-800-668-9938.

Table des matières

La table des matières des séances rapportées dans ce numéro se trouve sur la couverture à l'arrière de ce fascicule, ainsi qu'une liste des membres du comité et d'autres personnes ayant participé.

Renseignements sur l'index

Il existe un index cumulatif des numéros précédents. Les renseignements qu'il contient sont à votre disposition par téléphone auprès des employés de l'index du Journal des débats au 416-325-7410 ou 325-7411.

Abonnements

Pour les abonnements, veuillez prendre contact avec le Service d'abonnement parlementaire, Publications Ontario, ministère des Services gouvernementaux, 50 rue Grosvenor, Toronto (Ontario) M7A 1N8. Par téléphone : 416-326-5310, 326-5311 ou, sans frais : 1-800-668-9938.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

STANDING COMMITTEE ON FINANCE AND ECONOMIC AFFAIRS

Thursday 29 October 1992

The committee met at 1009 in committee room 1.

LONDON-MIDDLESEX ACT, 1992

LOI DE 1992 SUR LONDON ET MIDDLESEX

Consideration of Bill 75, An Act respecting Annexations to the City of London and to certain municipalities in the County of Middlesex / Loi concernant les annexations faites à la cité de London et à certaines municipalités du comté de Middlesex.

The Chair (Mr Ron Hansen): The standing committee on finance and economic affairs will come to order. I'd like to say good morning. I see a lot of new faces on this committee for this particular hearing.

This morning we're going to have a presentation from the Ministry of Municipal Affairs in reference to Bill 75, An Act respecting Annexations to the City of London and to certain municipalities in the County of Middlesex. It's been sent to this committee.

At our last subcommittee meeting it was decided that we'd have the ministry in this morning and witnesses this afternoon; the following Thursday will be witnesses; two weeks later, on November 19, we'll have clause-by-clause and amendments. That's to give all members an update as to what's going on in these particular hearings.

I'd like to say that a request came into my office just about half an hour ago. It was from Doris Bond, a councillor from Westminster, requesting that proceedings of today's public hearings be televised. After discussion with Todd Decker, it wouldn't be televised back to the Westminster-London area, because right now we have private members' time in the morning, and then in the afternoon they'd be televising the House sitting, so our committee would not be televised out to Westminster and the London area. It's decided that it wouldn't be an advantage to switch this committee to another room to be televised. I take it that all members agree that it wouldn't make an impact? Okay.

Mr Ron Eddy (Brant-Haldimand): I have two questions. When the briefing is going on, will we be allowed to ask questions at that time, or should we wait till the end of the briefing?

The Chair: I'm going to take some direction from the PA.

Mr Gordon Mills (Durham East): At the end.

The Chair: At the end, yes. A lot of the presentations this afternoon will be half an hour, and if they take 20 minutes on the presentation, it's only going to leave three minutes for each party to ask questions. So keep in mind that if you have a question that's three minutes long, I'm going to have to cut off so the other parties have a chance to ask a question.

Mr Eddy: That will be explained to the presenters, of course.

The Chair: Yes, I will. But it can happen with the members if their question is three minutes long.

Mr Eddy: The other question I had was, are we able to accommodate some or the majority or all the people or bodies requesting to be heard? Have you any feel on that?

The Chair: I've got a list right now of people who have requested to appear on the committee. Mr Eddy, I believe you're a member of the subcommittee now. The three subcommittee members will be sitting down and doing a cross-section of people to come, because I don't think we'll have enough time for all of them. We've got about nine pages of people to come before this committee. There was some discussion at earlier subcommittee meetings that we cut it to 15 minutes to get more people on, but I don't think it would have done justice to people to appear for 15 minutes, and we'd have no time for any questions.

So possibly 15 minutes before we meet this afternoon, the subcommittee members can meet ahead of time and discuss some of the groups here so that we get a good cross-section. Maybe some of them have appeared already, maybe we have their briefs, and possibly we can have some new groups come forward. Is that agreeable with you, Mr Carr?

Mr Gary Carr (Oakville South): Yes. It's just that you said nine pages. Do you know how many that works out to, the number of people who want to come in?

The Chair: They did something wonderful for me: They numbered them. There are 37.

Mr Carr: Thirty-seven. So at the subcommittee we will go through that and be able to—

The Chair: I think we agreed that we'd have enough time for nine. Was it nine? Yes, at a half-hour, there were nine groups. Mr Sutherland, do you have any problems at, say, 3:15 for that subcommittee meeting?

Mr Kimble Sutherland (Oxford): No, that's fine.

Mrs Irene Mathysen (Middlesex): Mr Chair, in connection with the broadcasting, while I understand that other things are going on so that there couldn't be a live or simultaneous broadcast, I would like you to consider the advantages of the people in the area being able to see a rebroadcast at a later date in terms of hearing what the people who come to this committee have to say both for and against Bill 75.

The Chair: With the scheduling of the different committees in the different rooms, I'd have to talk to the chief government whip. Maybe I can have a discussion after we break at 12 o'clock and see if there is a possibility.

Mrs Mathysen: If you could find her, that would be fine.

The Chair: If I can find her, yes.

Mr Mills, would you introduce your guests? Okay, you're starting off.

MINISTRY OF MUNICIPAL AFFAIRS

Mr Mills: Thank you, Mr Chair. I'm going to start off here this morning, and I'm going to make the opening statement on behalf of the minister on the London-Middlesex Act, Bill 75.

The new local government structure that will be created by Bill 75 will position the greater London area for economic renewal while ensuring that the environment and valuable farm land are protected.

The greater London area is one of the most desirable places in which to live and work. It has the potential to attract new commercial and industrial development that can give a much-needed boost to its economy, the benefits of which will be shared by the entire province. The reality is, however, that London cannot accommodate new growth within its existing boundaries. London needs more land to provide for a viable future for all of the communities in the area. Managed growth is essential as we head into the next century.

For the past 11 years, various attempts have been made to arrive at a local solution to London's need for more land. All these attempts have failed. That is why in January the Minister of Municipal Affairs appointed an arbitrator, John Brant, to examine all options and recommend the most workable solution.

The Brant report forms the basis of the legislation that was tabled in the Legislature by the minister on June 18.

Bill 75 will resolve this long-standing local dispute. It will position the greater London area for economic renewal. It will financially prepare the county of Middlesex for a renewed rural community. It will give agricultural land in the annexed area the greatest protection in the province and correct the area's serious environmental problems. Regulations will protect farm land and control urban sprawl.

The legislation enshrines comprehensive planning, prevents piecemeal development decisions and creates a climate of certainty for the future of London-Middlesex farm land and the environment.

The city of London will be required to develop and adopt a new official plan. The regulations for Bill 75 will spell out the mechanisms for mandatory public and provincial participation, participation that will ensure meaningful involvement by a wide variety of local and area interest groups and guarantee consultation with provincial ministries.

The new official plan will address the issues of growth management, social planning and the protection of the environment and of agriculture. The regulations will call for the development of a strategic vision and a social services plan that will form the context within which the new official plan will be developed. All future land use decisions made within the new city of London must reflect the principles and values expressed in the official plan.

The county of Middlesex, through its own visioning and planning, and assisted by a compensation package funded by the city of London, will have an excellent opportunity to reaffirm its values for rural living. It is through good, sound planning that we protect the environment and renew existing rural communities.

It is critical from a good planning perspective that the same body that controls development and sewers also controls water services and parks. We believe the decision to have the city take over the functions of the two public utility commissions has common sense and good planning on its side. This will ensure that a single body will be responsible for the delivery of parks, water and sewer services.

Services currently provided by the two PUCs will not be cut off, and municipal employees who are affected by the annexation, including PUC employees, must be offered a job by the city of London.

A new hydro-electric commission will be established to administer the electricity functions of the PUC. The commission will be represented by the chairperson of the Westminster PUC and five London PUC members until the next municipal election. Thereafter, city council will appoint the five commissioners.

Since the release of the Brant report on April 3, 1992, we have listened to both sides of this debate. John Brant held extensive public consultations in the city of London and the county of Middlesex from January till March. He listened, and we listened.

1020

When second reading debate of Bill 75 was interrupted in June, we were already committed to holding public hearings in the London area. On September 24 and 25 the minister kept his promise and heard presentations from 62 people from the city and the county.

A number of sound ideas were presented at the hearings and are reflected in the amendments we will propose to this committee. The amendments also address some of the concerns raised by four local members: Marion Boyd, Irene Mathyssen, David Winninger and Dianne Cunningham. They have been active participants throughout this process and were all present for the two days of public hearings held in London.

Proposed amendments to Bill 75 will deal with land use planning and financial matters, particularly in the area of the compensation package.

Changes to the planning sections of Bill 75 result from extensive consultation with the affected municipalities and provincial agencies. Part of the consultation took place through the transition team the minister established to oversee the implementation of the legislation. The transition team consisted of political and technical representatives from the five affected townships, the town of Westminster, the city of London and the county of Middlesex.

The amendments being proposed to this committee introduce some flexibility in the buffer area. These changes will accommodate future unforeseen land use activities that would not detract from the basic intent of the buffer area. The changes to Bill 75 will permit the minister to deal with these matters through regulation.

The buffer area will remain a truly long-term agricultural and open space area on the border between the county and the new city. There will be ample opportunity for planned urban growth within the enlarged London. The controls in the area are already in place today through official plans approved by the province. The regulations of Bill 75 will ensure that this control remains.

Additional changes would enable the province to ensure that the city of London prepares its new official plan within a reasonable period of time, as well as all the prerequisite studies and plans such as its strategic vision and a social services plan as outlined in the Brant report. These changes will also ensure that the protection of agricultural lands and the environment are dealt with to the province's satisfaction.

Ministry staff have already commenced consultation with the city of London on the process through which these documents will be prepared and on the methods for obtaining extensive public participation. The regulations will ensure that these matters are addressed to provincial satisfaction and that certain portions of the present city official plan reflect the latest provincial policies and standards.

It is gratifying to see the high degree of cooperation that has already been shown by the affected municipalities. We will continue to encourage this cooperation in the future and intend to reflect it in the regulations.

One example will be the formation of a rural advisory committee as part of the city of London's decision-making process and structure. The regulations will spell out the committee's composition, representation, function and reporting relationship.

In addition, ministry staff will be working with the city of London's staff and representatives of London's social service agencies in the development of the social services plan component of the bill.

Changes to the finance sections of Bill 75 result from consultations with affected municipalities and the public hearings held in September in London.

Given the concerns expressed by the county and affected municipalities, the compensation package will be amended to more accurately reflect the impact on the county. Amendments include a regulatory power that outlines payments directly to the county and four local municipalities to compensate for the annexation. The amendments provide for enhanced compensation to Middlesex county and annexed municipalities to ensure that no county resident will experience any annexation-related tax increases for five years.

As with all other municipalities in Ontario, the decision to move towards market value assessment is a local one and will be left to London city council.

For conservation authority levies, a regulatory power will be added to the act to permit the Lieutenant Governor in Council to alter the apportionment so that tax shifts among municipalities may be reduced. In order to provide additional time for the city to prepare for extending services to annexed areas, the city will implement urban service areas in 1994.

Given that the county will be responsible for suburban roads following the annexation, suburban roads payments will continue in perpetuity.

Additional changes to the finance sections of the act are technical in nature and relate to the amendments discussed above.

As a result of the transition process, a few amendments relating to the bill, not related to planning or finance, have also been deemed necessary. Affected township municipalities or boards will be given an extra six months, to January 31, 1994, to determine which employees will be considered surplus and then be employed by the city or its boards. A provision will be added so that Westminster volunteer firefighters can continue to operate in the new city.

A provision that would allow municipalities or boards to appeal a decision of a committee of referees on the distribution of assets and liabilities will be clarified to say that an appeal must be lodged within 30 days. Westminster libraries that were to continue to operate through 1997 will now do so under the London Public Library Board's direction.

Detailed explanations of each of the changes to Bill 75 are appended to the actual rewrite of the bill itself. You will find these appendices in your packages of material.

In conclusion, on behalf of Dave Cooke I'd like to take this opportunity to thank the four local members for their cooperation throughout this process, and particularly for their participation in the two days of public hearings held in London: London Centre MPP Marion Boyd, London North MPP Dianne Cunningham, London South MPP David Winninger and Middlesex MPP Irene Mathysen. They have faithfully represented the concerns of their constituents while acknowledging the needs of the entire London-Middlesex area. The minister has appreciated the insight of his caucus colleagues and would like to acknowledge the fact that Dianne Cunningham remained non-partisan throughout the process.

I would also like to extend our appreciation to John Brant for taking on the responsibility of arbitrator and for doing such an outstanding job.

Annexation, amalgamation: Any change to local government structure or municipal boundaries is difficult. Redefining the parameters within which a community identifies itself is bound to elicit an emotional response. But true community is not defined by boundaries. True community grows out of a shared vision of strong values and principles.

The London-Middlesex area is expected to be one of the fastest-growing urban areas in Ontario heading into the next century. The potential for managed growth and economic, social and cultural opportunities cannot be realized without a change to the current local government structure.

The solution to this emotionally charged debate has been a long time coming. While this solution will not satisfy everyone, we believe we have now achieved the delicate balance between competing local interests and the good of the entire London-Middlesex area.

Now I am pleased to table the written submissions that were presented at the minister's public hearings held in London in September.

1030

Mr Eddy: I am disappointed that the honourable minister is not here to answer some of the questions and be involved in the process, because I understand that he is the one who indeed is making at least some of the decisions in this matter. However, I want to point out that the Liberal and PC members had the opportunity to meet with the staff to have a briefing late yesterday afternoon, and I very much appreciated that. We were advised at that time of several amendments and were advised that we'd have them in writing this morning. Are they available at this time, or will they be—they are available?

Mr Mills: They're in your packages here.

Mr Eddy: Oh, they are included?

Mr Mills: Yes.

Mr Eddy: Excellent, thank you. I was hoping we'd have access to them.

The Chair: No further questions?

Mr Mills: I'd like to introduce Mr Brian Riddell, who is an assistant deputy minister of Municipal Affairs. Brian has a presentation he would like to make. Brian, would you go ahead.

Mr Brian Riddell: I want to take the opportunity this morning to give a bit of context to how we got to this point in Bill 75 in terms of the London area as well as to provide some more detailed information and briefings to the members of the committee by staff of the Ministry of Municipal Affairs, who will join me at the table following some brief introductory remarks.

Certainly, in terms of the context, and as Mr Mills indicated, the London area had specific needs that had to be addressed and have to be addressed. The fact that the Ministry of Treasury and Economics has identified this area as, I believe, the second-highest growth area over the next 20 to 30 years points significantly to the need to ensure that the area is prepared to deal with the kind of challenges that it's going to be faced with.

In addition, I think that a number of members of the committee will be aware of the environmental issues and problems that exist in a lot of areas of Ontario but particularly in the London area, in the area surrounding London and in some of the areas of Middlesex county. There have been a number of developments in the area around the city and in the county that have been developed on private services, particularly septic tanks and wells for water. In the case of the South Winds subdivision in the community of Lambeth within the town of Westminster, a subdivision that contains approximately 180 homes, after about two years the septic tanks failed, creating a very significant health and environmental problem. The costs to fix that are significant. The fixing of that is something that is going to require the installation of services and the ability to treat those wastes that come from that area.

In addition to that, there have been a number of other concerns expressed by the London-Middlesex health department about septic tanks and their operation and their capability within the area. The London-Middlesex health department has been very reluctant to approve new development on septic tanks because of that concern.

The other significant area, and it's an area that—

Mr Eddy: Point of information: Could I, just at this time, point out that the London-Middlesex district health unit is no longer responsible for septic tank health inspection. It relinquished that mandate to the Ministry of the Environment approximately a year ago, maybe a little longer. I think that's the case, is it not?

Mr Riddell: I'm not aware of that.

Mrs Mathysen: Yes, that's the case.

Mr Eddy: Is that the case? Thank you, member.

Mr Riddell: Maybe we could point out some of these things at the end, but I guess all members—

Mr Eddy: Yes, I'm sorry. I don't mean to do it to interrupt; I'm doing it in a manner to correct the stance. I think it's wrong to be saying what the health unit says when the health unit is not involved and has not been involved. They were at the time of the South Winds development, but I point out that it was the Middlesex-London Health Unit, so it would have been approved by the health unit whether it was in the city or the county.

The Chair: Okay, that's fine; thanks.

Mr Eddy: It's just a point of information.

Mr Riddell: I appreciate the correction, and I would add that in discussions with the Ministry of the Environment, I think it's fair to say it is having the same kind of concerns. Nothing has changed, really, because there are no new technologies. It's the general question of, how do you safely provide services in rural areas where the costs of providing good pipe services or safe pipe services are prohibitive in many cases? That is an issue that either the district health unit or the Ministry of the Environment, depending on who is the delegated authority in any area of the province, is grappling with, particularly in areas like Middlesex county and some of the areas in eastern Ontario where the soils are not capable of handling the kinds of loads that are being put on them by today's demands.

The other significant factor in the London area, of course, is the fact that in this area, in Middlesex county particularly, you have one of the best agricultural areas in Ontario. There have been a number of indications in terms of the amount of agricultural land, class 1, class 2 land, in this area but it is significant, and that is one of the other issues that had to be dealt with: How do you adequately protect that very scarce resource, that non-renewable resource?

Bill 75 also undertook several ways of dealing with the viability of the county. I think certainly the fact that the county is losing a fairly significant proportion of its assessment is a factor that plays very largely in this bill.

In addition to that, the arbitrator, Mr Brant, identified the need to provide capital money, an amount of $2 million a year over three years beginning in 1994, from the city to the county, to be used to assist and stimulate good growth and development in those areas of the county that the county had identified through a new official plan, and that money would not be able to be used by the county until it had developed a new official plan.

The issue of suburban roads is probably one of the areas that was of most concern to the county. They brought this up very early in discussions with us at the transition committee meetings. We worked very closely with the county, the county engineer, the Ministry of Transportation, the regional office, the district office in London, district 2, as well as the head office in Timmins, to come up with a way of dealing with the suburban roads issue, as Mr Mills indicated, that would see the funding of suburban roads continued in perpetuity, similar to the Brantford model, which some of you may be familiar with.

The negotiations process in terms of boundary negotiations in the London area really commenced formally with an application by London under the Municipal Boundary Negotiations Act in 1988. Fact-finding began in 1989. As a result of that, there was another round of negotiations with the parties during 1990 and 1991. Unfortunately, and maybe typically, though, in cases like this, there was no agreement among the local municipalities as to an appropriate solution to deal with the annexation issue. As a result of this impasse, the chief negotiator's third report recommended a consultation process leading to legislation with specific expression of provincial interest or the kind of things that should be included in any consultation process.

1040

As you're aware, the minister appointed the arbitrator, John Brant, in January 1992. In his charge he was given some very specific terms of reference. Generally, those are to ensure that the economic development potential of the area, both London and the surrounding area, is maximized, to do everything to ensure that the environment and the natural areas are protected and in fact enhanced, and that servicing—which is really one of the major issues in terms of how that area is going to grow and develop—is done in a very cost-effective and environmentally sensitive way.

The minister indicated that the arbitrator would have 60 days during which he would consult and provide a report to the minister. The minister did at that time commit to implement the Brant report. That report was presented to the minister in late March of this year, and as a result of that, the minister accepted the report and announced, in early April in London, his intention to proceed.

Bill 75, in terms of its development and evolution, is based very much on the principles which are enshrined in the Brant report, particularly the principles of ensuring the separation of the rural and urban areas. As well, Mr Brant talks about the fact that the greater London area presents a co-opportunity. What he meant by that was that the county and that area, as well as the city, have coexisted for a number of years and that on the basis of that coexistence the whole area has benefited. The city has benefited because of the existence of the county. The county has certainly benefited, I think, because of the existence of London. That kind of coexistence and co-opportunity is something that should be looked at as a basic principle in terms of the future.

One of the elements of Bill 75 which will be discussed in a little more detail, but may be worth talking about now, is the fact that in terms of good planning in the area, there's a need for London to develop good new official plans to deal with the new areas that are going to be part of London after January 1, 1993. The critical components in those planning processes will certainly include compact development, environmental sensitivity and good, responsible development as well as the protection of agricultural and rural areas. A number of elements of the bill and the regulations and the amendments address how that can be done. The buffer zone particularly, I think, is a very strong indication of Mr Brant's intent to ensure the separation of the rural and urban areas.

In terms of financing, the bill and its amendments ensure that the county is compensated for lost assessment, as well as provided with a capital fund, which I mentioned, of $6 million, and certainly recognize the new cost arrangement for suburban roads, based upon the Brantford model.

The public hearings in London that Mr Mills mentioned were attended by a number of interested individuals and groups. Some 62 presentations were made at those sessions, and many of the good suggestions were incorporated, particularly in terms of land use planning, good development and the buffer zone. The idea of a rural advisory committee, again, was a suggestion that came out of those hearings, and is something we're moving on.

At the same time, the county made the very strong point that the compensation that was required to deal with the lost assessment was a very critical element to it. The minister at that time indicated that he would do whatever had to be done to ensure that the ratepayers in the area—and by the area is meant the city, the county, the annexed area, as well as those areas outside the annexed area still remaining in the county—would be protected from significant tax increases for a five-year period.

During his announcement in early April setting up this transition, the minister announced the formulation of a transition steering committee. That committee is represented by elected heads of the municipalities in the areas well as the public utilities commissions, both the PUC for London and for the town of Westminster, and a technical coordinating committee which is represented by the clerks, the CAOs, depending on where you are, or the city manager, for all the area municipalities plus the PUCs.

The transition teams have been moving together over this period of time to develop a very comprehensive work plan that was approved by the steering committee in June of this year. Work has been continuing on a very active front on things like workforce issues, service issues, financial issues, compensation issues and a number of other issues related to the transition, the move to new boundaries as of January 1, 1993. That work is continuing and the result will be that as of the end of December of this year, the kind of things that have to be done for the new municipalities on January 1, 1993, will be in place.

At this time I would like to turn it over to Taras Myhal who will talk a little bit more about some of the provisions in Bill 75.

Mr Bernard Grandmaître (Ottawa East): Is it proper, Mr Chair, to ask the deputy minister some questions on his presentation?

The Chair: I think if we had some questions before—do you mind? I think there only seems to be one. Just a short one?

Mr Grandmaître: No, it's not a short question.

Mr Mills: I think, Mr Chairman, that if we had the complete package—presentation and financial—and both gentlemen will remain, then you can direct your questions to either one. I think that would be appropriate for the continuity of the presentation.

The Chair: Okay. We'll carry on. The people will still be there to be asked questions.

Mr Taras Myhal: My name is Myhal. I am with the municipal boundaries branch with the Ministry of Municipal Affairs. I will be dealing with some of the general provisions of Bill 75 and its amendments and there will be two other staff persons: Zdravko Weing from the plans administration branch will be speaking on planning provisions of the bill and Kate Chinnery from the municipal finance branch will be dealing with some of the financial provisions of the bill.

On the question of the general provisions, I'll start with the boundaries, the actual annexations being dealt with through the bill. The major one is the annexation of 64,000 acres from the town of Westminster and four townships that surround London, the townships of North Dorchester, Delaware, London and West Nissouri, that will form part of the new city of London.

There are also some minor annexations being dealt with through the bill. Small portions of the town of Westminster will be annexed to the township of North Dorchester and to the township of Delaware. Part of the township of London will be annexed to the township of West Nissouri. There's also one other minor annexation being dealt with: The village of Belmont, which is part of Elgin county for municipal purposes, is receiving some lands from the town of Westminster and from the township of North Dorchester.

Those are the annexations. The bill also speaks to a buffer zone which does not encompass annexations or boundary changes but is a planning zone that surrounds the new city of London.

On the question of representation, the new London city council until the 1994 municipal elections will be comprised of the current mayor, the board of control, existing ward councillors and also, to represent the newly annexed areas, the current mayor of the town of Westminster. At the time of the 1994 municipal elections, the Minister of Municipal Affairs may, by regulation, redefine the wards of the new city of London. Subsequent to the 1994 municipal elections, the wards would be redefined by the standard Ontario Municipal Board process.

To ensure continuation of bylaws and resolutions on the annexed areas, the bylaws and resolutions of those municipalities whose areas are being annexed into the city of London will become bylaws of the city of London. For the other annexed areas, the bylaws and resolutions of those municipalities and of the county of Middlesex will be dealt with in a comparable fashion.

1050

On the question of the public utilities commission, both the city of London and the town of Westminster have public utilities commissions that will be disbanded as of January 1, 1993, the implementation date for the bill.

The functions of water supply and parks and recreation that are currently part of the London PUC will become part of the city administration. There will be a new hydro-electric commission formed which will take over the electricity function of the current public utilities commission. The responsibility for the provision of electricity in the annexed areas will continue to be Ontario Hydro's until such time as the city decides to expand its service area into those areas, which can be done over time.

Representation on the hydro-electric commission until the 1994 municipal elections will be the existing city PUC members and, to represent the newly annexed areas, the chair of the Westminster PUC. After the 1994 elections the hydro-electric commission will be appointed by city council.

As part of the bill, the suburban roads commission will be disbanded.

On the question of libraries, there are existing libraries in Westminster within Glanworth and Lambeth, and they will continue to operate at least through December 31, 1997; they'll be operated by the city of London.

On volunteer firefighters, Westminster currently has volunteer firefighters. Through the bill and its amendments, there will be an ability for those firefighters to continue to provide services within the new city of London.

On the question of schools, Bill 75 doesn't alter school board boundaries. There is currently a committee of Middlesex and London public school board representatives that is looking at that issue.

Bill 75 and its amendments also provide for the establishment of a rural advisory committee within the city of London. That committee will address rural issues in the new city of London.

I'd like to now call on Zdravko Weing of the plans administration branch. He'll go through some of the planning provisions of the bill.

Mr Eddy: Could I just point out, while we're waiting, that I don't think it was clarified why the board of education boundaries are a problem? The city of London and Middlesex county were not united in one board of education. There were five cities in Ontario that were not joined with their counties when county boards of education were established. Three of the cities are now in regional municipalities, the other two are Windsor and London, and in those cases the counties have a public board of education and the cities have a public board of education. The separate school boards are joint. That's the reason it's more of a problem in this area.

Mr Zdravko Weing: My name is Zdravko Weing. I am a senior planner with the plans administration branch of the ministry.

My presentation today will last about 10 to 15 minutes and it will deal with two major areas. One is planning matters in so far as they affect the new, expanded future city of London, and another one is with regard to the buffer area surrounding the future city of London. I'll be referring to these two maps.

With regard to the first area, my presentation will deal with three components. The first component will deal with the new future official plan for the city of London, the second component with interim controls in the annexed area until the new official plan comes into being, and the third one is the area of subsequent control after the new official plan is approved by the province.

In so far as the new official plan is concerned, Bill 75 allows two years for the city to prepare the new official plan and to adopt it and submit it to the ministry for approval. The bill also stipulates that the new official plan should cover the total area, meaning the existing city of London and the 64,000 acres proposed to be annexed.

The ministry is now proposing two revisions to it. First, we feel that in order to prepare a strategic vision and social services plan, referred to earlier in the presentation, the city needs a little bit more time than two years. The revisions to the bill would allocate three years for the preparation of the new plan. In addition, the city will be preparing a variety of studies which are required by the Planning Act, and for that purpose it may need about three years. In addition, the revisions would allow the minister, through his regulation, to extend the three-year period if need be in the future.

There is another revision to this section of the bill. This revision would provide the minister with the opportunity to request the city of London to revisit some of the sections or some of the components of the present official plan, which was approved by the ministry in 1991. This is an up-to-date plan which was intended to govern the use of land for the next 20 years, and this plan might need some updating. Otherwise, the bill would request that the new plan be prepared for the annexed area of 64,000 acres plus components of the old plan.

In so far as the content of the official plan is concerned, the advisory committees and the public participation process, there are no changes proposed to the bill. Ministry staff is in the process of consulting the city staff with regard to those components that will be included in ministerial regulations. This is with regard to the official plan.

Interim controls on the annexed lands before a new official plan is approved by the minister: What we have done on this map is plot for you the boundary of the annexed area. We shaded in grey the present city of London area. In the area which is proposed to be annexed, we have plotted official plan designations, those official plan designations that are in existence today and that the city is going to inherit and be responsible for on January 1.

The majority of the area is designated agricultural. Some lands, which are shaded in green, are designated industrial; commercial in blue; and pink are the hamlets and the villages, the village of Lambeth and the village of Hyde Park.

Revisions to the bill would allow that in the agricultural area the use of land be governed by the existing official plans. In so far as four urban areas are concerned—two industrial areas in the town of Westminster and the village of Lambeth and the village of Hyde Park—the revisions to the bill will not permit any development to occur unless full municipal services will be provided. In addition, the bill provides for the ministry to control and give approval to the extension of municipal services from the city into these four areas.

1100

The revised bill provides the minister with the ability, through his regulation, to add additional lands to the area which is subject to restrictions. For example, lands here or somewhere else which were controlled over urban development should be extended. The regulation would also allow the minister to delete lands from the four areas where restrictions apply. For example, if there is an existing lot in the middle of a village which would qualify for private services and would pass the tests of the Ministry of the Environment to obtain a septic tank permit, then the minister can amend the regulation to permit infilling on such a lot.

Now a few words about the land use controls that would be in place after the new official plan comes into being. Bill 75 provides for control of agricultural areas for 10 years after the new official plan is approved. We are proposing one minor revision to the bill, which would enable the minister, through his regulation, to permit minor official plan amendments and changes in so far as the list of permissible uses is concerned, if such uses are compatible with agricultural activities. Those types of uses will be listed in ministerial regulations. This is with regard to the city of London.

With regard to the buffer area, the buffer area is outlined with a red line. It consists of approximately 48,000 acres, and it covers five townships. We have plotted on this map all official plan land use designations. The white area is designated agricultural, brown is designated residential, green is designated industrial and blue is commercial. Only 5.1% of the buffer area is slated for urban development, in accordance with those official plans. Approximately one half of that has already been developed and another half is available to be developed, in accordance with those official plans.

The official plans are relatively new. They were approved by the ministry in the late 1980s and one in 1990. Two brand-new official plans are right now before the ministry, for Lobo and North Dorchester, and these two will be approved in December of this year.

Based on the very good protection of agricultural lands that these five official plans would provide, we are recommending changes to the bill which would in essence allow the use of land in the buffer area to be governed by those five official plans. In addition, revisions to the bill would permit the minister, through his regulations, to indicate which compatible land uses could be permitted in the future within the buffer area so the buffer area would remain truly a buffer. This is the extent of my presentation.

The Chair: Mr Mills, do you have anyone else presenting?

Mr Mills: Yes, one more person, Dr Kathleen Chinnery. She is a senior economist with the Ministry of Municipal Affairs.

Dr Kathleen M. Chinnery: Good morning. My name is Dr Kathleen Chinnery. I'm a senior economist in the municipal finance branch of the ministry. I'll attempt to give you a brief overview of some of the major finance provisions contained in the bill. There are some minor technical amendments which, if we have time or you wish, I will go through as well. But I suggest we spend the majority of time on the major parts of the finance provisions, which include the compensation package, the tax rate provisions in 1993 and subsequent years, urban service areas, as well as suburban road payments.

In addition, Taras, in his presentation, did talk briefly about an amendment with regard to the volunteer fire department. In section 19 and section 24 of the bill we have provisions to protect employees of municipalities and employees of the public utilities commissions. The only amendment we are proposing is to extend the date of declaring these employees surplus in the municipalities and in the PUCs.

The regulation that's contained in section 19 protects employees by defining employee or retired employee, their benefit package, as well as seniority and pensions. This is a regulation which will allow the steering committee and the transition team to have some input into how employees and what, with regard to employees, may be protected as a result of this act.

I'd like to switch into the more finance discussion. I'd like to direct your attention to section 42 of the act, which discusses the proposed reassessment of the city of London in 1993 for 1994 tax purposes. As Mr Mills did state earlier, it is the general policy of the Ministry of Municipal Affairs that a reassessment is a decision of a local municipal council. For this reason, we are going to propose to take this out of section 42 so that at a future date the London city council can decide if it would like a reassessment and what type of reassessment. There are some consequential amendments as a result of removing this. I don't think I need to go through those at this time.

In addition, in section 42, because we are not forcing changes to the school board boundaries, we have removed the rest of the subsection to eliminate requirements to have two assessment rolls which, as I'm sure you can understand, is an administrative nightmare. This makes it much easier. Again, this is a consequential amendment.

Perhaps I could just move on to a discussion of how we're going to handle the phase-in of tax rates from 1993 to 2003. As Brian mentioned earlier, the ministry has decided that for the first five years following annexation there shall be no impact on taxpayers in the county of Middlesex nor to taxpayers who are in the areas annexed to the city of London. In section 43 of the act, we provide that 1993 tax rates in the areas that are annexed to the city will not increase any more than the general rate in the city of London. In accordance with that, we have a regulation which will prescribe the manner in which the city of London shall levy rates of taxation for that year.

The amendment we are proposing, which is contained in your package, is that we extend this protection to the municipalities in the county of Middlesex, because at this point it protects only those in the areas annexed to the city of London.

For tax rates for 1994 to 2003, in section 44 of the bill we have a minister's regulation whereby the minister can describe the phase-in of tax rates and tax increases over that period. We will be amending that to include, again, the municipalities remaining in the county which are affected by the annexation. That will make this section consistent with section 43.

In section 46 of the bill we have a discussion of the implementation of urban service areas in the new city of London. As it stands in the bill now, these urban service areas were to be defined, the rates associated with those services and the extent of service provision defined by regulation for January 1, 1993.

1110

Because of the difficulty in determining the level of service provision and the associated costs that will accrue to the city of London, we have decided to change this to an implementation the next year, January 1, 1994. It will not mean that taxes in the areas annexed to the city will be increased astronomically. What it means is that, in section 43, the tax rates for 1993 are protected. There really isn't any problem with removing that provision for urban service areas in 1993.

I'd like to move on to the compensation package. In the Brant report and in Bill 75, in sections 48 and 49, we have a discussion of the total compensation package from the city of London to the county of Middlesex. This compensation package, as it was in the Brant report and in Bill 75, included a $3.6-million payment over five years for loss of revenue due to loss of assessment. Another payment of $6 million in total over three years was to provide the county with funds for capital development projects.

The other part of a compensation package was payments to compensate the county for the capital and operating costs for the suburban roads. This was based on their 1992 payment of approximately $1 million, increased for any additional expenditures related to capital projects on roads. However, given, as Brian outlined, that we have made the decision to compensate the county of Middlesex and the local municipality so that no ratepayer feels any undue tax burden for five years, the compensation package will be enhanced.

The way in which we are intending to do this is to take out the parts of sections 48 and 49 which have specific reference to numbers such as $3.6 million. The amendment we intend to propose is to put a minister's regulation in there whereby payments will be made from the city of London to the county of Middlesex and directly to the four local municipalities in the county in 1993 for 10 years. This was also in response to the public hearings process and consultations with the local municipalities and the county of Middlesex, which expressed concern over the level of compensation.

At this point we have presented over the past several weeks some numbers which have become publicly available to all of the local municipalities, the county and the city of London. We are at the present time discussing some of the actual numbers and whether these estimates are the most appropriate to be used. That's another reason why we are introducing the flexibility for that compensation in a regulation.

If I could just move on to the suburban road payments, as Brian introduced, we intend to compensate the county for suburban road costs in perpetuity. Instead of being based on the 1992 payment of approximately $1 million and then inflated for expenditures on capital projects for roads, we intend to suggest that the payment would be based on one mill of the local assessment of the city of London, which is approximately $1 million.

However, due to the fact that we are not in a position to judge whether the city council at any point in the future will decide to have a reassessment in the city of London, we are going to suggest a regulation whereby the minister may adjust that payment of one mill rate in order to reflect actual expenditures on roads in the county of Middlesex.

Some other discussions which were presented at the public hearings with regard to the conservation authorities' levies concerned the municipalities that are being directly affected by the annexation, as well as other county municipalities, such as the township of Lobo, which are being negatively affected as a result of changes in the land area and the assessment base for conservation authorities in the London area. As a result, we are going to propose a minister's regulation whereby we can apportion the conservation authority levies in order that the levies are balanced among the municipalities remaining in the conservation authorities.

If you would like me to go on to some more technical amendments, I will do so, but I think that's enough.

Mr Mills: That's the ministry's presentation, Mr Chairman.

The Chair: Thank you, Mr Mills. Ben, do you still have that question—did you write it down?—that you were thinking about asking about one hour ago? You've got the floor.

Mr Grandmaître: I've got the floor.

Mr Sutherland: Just before we start, we're dividing up the 45 minutes equally then?

The Chair: Yes.

Mr Grandmaître: Forty-five minutes?

The Chair: Whenever the bell goes. It looks about 15 minutes each.

Mr Sutherland: Okay.

Mr Grandmaître: Yes, I have a number of questions, so instead of waiting or expecting an answer, I'll make this brief presentation and we can take it from there.

I realize that annexation is a very emotional time in people's minds, especially taxpayers. We're experiencing a very tough recession at the present time, and there's uncertainty in the air and people are concerned about their future, their job and their children. I think the timing of this annexation is not the best.

I realize that for some time the ministry has tried—even in our days as a government we tried to reach an agreement with London and Middlesex. At the same time, I find it very difficult to understand what the ministry or the minister is trying to do. I feel there's a rush job in this annexation and I'm very concerned.

I'm concerned not only for London, the London-Middlesex annexation; I'm very concerned about the process used to reach those conclusions. I'm concerned that the ministry will continue to use this high hand with future annexations.

Again, tripling the size of London is a big concern of mine, for a number of reasons. Back in the late 1980s—1988, 1989—it was not the intention of London to annex such a large portion of Middlesex and counties surrounding.

Why 64,000 acres, when only 7% of those 64,000 acres are zoned commercial or industrial at the present time?

Why 64,000, when maybe 90% of the annexation is agricultural land? Yet the annexation process initiated or launched by London was to improve its growth or potential, and I agree. I agree that London has been a fast-growing municipality and we must give it the tools, the opportunities to improve not only services, but its economic situation.

Again, I find that 64,000 acres is way too much. This is the largest, or maybe the largest, annexation in the province of Ontario, so I want to find out the logic behind such a large annexation and also the compensation. I don't want to deal with the compensation package at the present time, but I don't like it when they tell us that the package may be enhanced or the minister, through regulations, can do this, can do that. There are all kinds of uncertainties before us, and if I'm not mistaken, we were told yesterday afternoon some 27 amendments would be introduced. Am I right, 27?

1120

Mr Mills: They're in the book.

Mr Grandmaître: They're in the book? Well, I got it this morning.

Mr Mills: So did I.

Mr Grandmaître: So did you? That's called consultation. I feel a little reluctant—not reluctant to accept what staff are telling us; I have great faith in Municipal Affairs, but at the same time I do question—

Mr Mills: Not me, I hope.

Mr Grandmaître: Never, Gord. I would never question you.

Mr Sutherland: Which side of the fence are you leaning to now?

Mr Grandmaître: No, no, not exactly. I've gone through annexation before, I've gone through expropriation, and if you want to talk about that compensation package, I call this expropriation. That's what it is. The final compensation package isn't finalized yet. So we're going through expropriation.

I might as well get into your compensation package. I want to know, has everybody been advised or consulted about those 27 amendments before us, Gord?

Mr Mills: Whom do you mean, everybody?

Mr Grandmaître: Everybody concerned—the municipalities, the counties—have they been advised?

Mr Mills: I think the amendments have come about through consultation.

Mr Grandmaître: Through consultation.

Mr Mills: Yes.

Mr Grandmaître: But they haven't been discussed openly and publicly. You haven't had public consultation on those amendments.

Mr Mills: No, but many of the amendments are through presentations made. We've listened, as I said. We listened; they listened.

Mr Sutherland: Just to add to that, Mr Riddell in his presentation indicated that the majority of the amendments coming forward were the result of input from local people by their—

Mr Grandmaître: No, no, the transition team, if I'm not mistaken.

Mr Sutherland: Okay, transition team, but there are local people involved in the transition team.

Mr Grandmaître: There's a difference between a transition team and the general public. If you call this consultation, that's up to you.

The Chair: I know you have a lot of points. The clock's running.

Mr Grandmaître: Is that right?

The Chair: Can you get some of the answers back maybe from the staff, as it is now—

Mr Grandmaître: If you can stop these interruptions, Mr Chair, maybe I can—

The Chair: I know; that's why I cut in here.

Mr Grandmaître: If I can go back to the $64,000 question. When only 7% of those 64,000 acres are presently zoned commercial or industrial and only 5% of the buffer zone is presently zoned for development, why such a wide buffer, Mr Chair?

The Chair: Okay, I'll ask.

Mr Grandmaître: No, that's only part of it. And how come the buffer zone wasn't expanded to the south side? Right now the buffer zone is only on three sides. Is this for future annexation or expropriation? I don't know.

Mr Chair, I know the time is running, but if I stop now to look at my notes, can I come back later with the rest of my questions?

The Chair: You have five minutes in your party time. Do you want any answers back on some of your comments here?

Mr Grandmaître: Absolutely.

The Chair: I think Mr Mills wanted to make some comments on your speech or question period.

Mr Grandmaître: Both. I hope Gord is not taking my time, though, in answering my questions.

Mr Mills: No.

Mr Grandmaître: Thanks, Gord.

Mr Mills: Perhaps Mr Riddell can make reference to the buffer zone.

Mr Grandmaître: The buffer zone and the logic behind the $64,000 question.

Mr Mills: Yes. It's to prevent annexation, but perhaps, Mr Riddell, can you just—

Mr Riddell: The question of the size of the annexation is an issue that certainly has been raised in a number of places, particularly in the public hearings in London. While I mention that, I might just make a point here regarding the 27 amendments. A lot of those amendments came from the public hearings in London. A lot of them came, as well, from the transition process, which is the municipal representatives, so there is a component of both in them.

Mr Grandmaître: So they're public amendments?

Mr Riddell: The amendments coming from the public hearings in London I guess are public, yes.

Mr Grandmaître: Have they been distributed to the affected municipalities?

Mr Riddell: Not yet. This is the first time this committee has seen them.

Getting back to the buffers, or the annexation area, I think in terms of the logic—this is certainly something that I know the arbitrator went through when he was looking at the area and trying to make a determination as to the appropriate size. During the discussions among the municipalities that went on between 1989 and late 1991 there were a lot of different options that were on the table depending on which particular area you represented, I guess. Some of them were larger than others.

In essence, the thing that creates the difference is, if you look at the terms of reference that were provided to Mr Brant, the long-term economic recovery opportunities and the emphasis on long term, particularly the protection of the environment and the efficient provision of services to ensure economic growth and development, meant that certain areas like the Lambeth area and the area around Highway 135, certainly the key transportation corridors in this area, the 401 corridor specifically as well as the 402 corridor, were areas that should be included in the city of London, because the city of London would have the capability to deal with those kinds of objectives.

As well, the arbitrator felt that it was critical that the airport up in the northeast corner, currently in West Nissouri, be part of the city of London because that's really a key component in terms of London's long-term economic growth and development and the capability to service that as well.

When that was all looked at, and you look at the remaining lands, particularly in the town of Westminster, there was a very strong feeling that if you dealt with those kinds of objectives and criteria, there could be remaining a portion of land in the south, somewhere between the county line with Elgin and something to the north, a concession or two. But the question then became, how could this land be managed? It's essentially agricultural land. In some discussions that occurred during the summer months with a lot of the municipalities around, the concern, particularly of North Dorchester and Delaware when they were presented with this suggestion, was that they felt that unless somebody was prepared to compensate them in terms of pretty significant compensation into the future, although they didn't know the specifics of it, they weren't really prepared to take on these responsibilities for lands which would have to be serviced but for which there wasn't really development potential or return other than its existing agricultural use.

The Chair: You've got one minute left. Mr Eddy, do you have a question?

Mr Eddy: Yes. I am sorry; I had to go into the House. Did you make any statements?

Mr Grandmaître: Yes, I did. Statement plus questions.

Mr Eddy: Oh, you had the opportunity to make it. I wanted the opportunity for statements because I feel so strongly about this matter.

But coming back to the matter of the town of Westminster, I find it so strange that you consulted with the council of the township of North Dorchester and the council of the township of Delaware about giving them something but you didn't talk to the council of the town of Westminster about taking everything away. It seems strange to me; it's just so strange. However, I guess that's what has happened in this process. I think we should deal with everybody equally.

1130

I was concerned that there weren't any members, other than the member for Middlesex, present today to be part of this procedure, noting that most of the members are from regional municipalities, including the restructured county of Oxford where there's not a separated city-county situation, because I think it's so important to recognize that it's two distinct, separate municipalities; however, with many joint services. I noted during the introduction by the parliamentary assistant, who is here instead of the minister, who, of course, is making at least some of the important decisions in this matter, that it wasn't recognized that the social agencies and services are indeed joint city-county services. They are all, the CAS and a whole host of them, indeed joint and serve both municipalities.

I was particularly concerned over the statement that this empowers or allows the greater London-Middlesex area to be prepared for great growth and development. There's no doubt about it; there's going to be great growth and development because of the superhighways that are in the area that are attracting—

The Chair: I've got to cut you off, Mr Eddy. I think you could read a whole text on this to us here.

Mr Eddy: Could I just finish my statement on this?

Mr Grandmaître: I think you should.

The Chair: How long is your statement?

Mr David Winninger (London South): Mr Carr will give you his time.

The Chair: Okay, Mr Carr's going to give you some of his time. It seems like Christmas here today.

Mr Carr: I'll give some to them, but I'll want it back at some point, and they'll owe me.

Mr Eddy: Yes, okay. You've thrown me, Mr Chair.

The Chair: You were throwing over the time. That's why I threw you.

Mr Eddy: Yes, agreed. Yes, you're quite correct. I agree with you.

The Chair: Okay, fine. Can you finish your statement then?

Mr Eddy: Yes, thank you. I've got it. Really, you're equipping the city of London because you're giving them everything. It's the city of London that's going to be equipped and you're disembowelling the county of Middlesex, because you're taking most of its industrial and commercial development and economic base, and indeed you're establishing a buffer zone of some 55,000 acres, neutering it. So there can be nothing.

The other thing I must correct is that Middlesex county is not an agricultural area; it's a mixture of towns and development. There are three towns, there are five villages, and there are many urban service areas in the county of Middlesex that are completely urban, but in townships and in township governments. There's a large urban population. It isn't strictly rural.

I'd also like to point out that several of the municipalities are fully serviced—municipal water supply and municipal sewage treatment—including the town of Westminster, the town of Ailsa Craig, the town of Parkhill, the town of Glencoe, the town of Strathroy. It's not just an agricultural area and I think that has to be recognized. What you're doing is you're eviscerating a county and taking a large part of it away, and it's not just a rural agricultural area that you're robbing. Was that given consideration during the process: The fact that the county is made up of rural and urban and, indeed, you are taking a large portion of its space—not all of it, I recognize—and then you are taking the right for a much larger area? I know why there's a buffer zone, but I would have handled it in a much different way.

You mentioned the Brantford situation in connection with suburban roads. Are you aware of the Brantford situation with the mutual advisory planning area, where the area annexed to the city and an area in the county is controlled jointly through mutual planning? I wondered if that had been considered, because I see it as a better solution. You may not agree.

Mr Riddell: Perhaps I can comment on the point raised about the county, and I certainly agree that while the county does have some strong urban communities within it, there are, I think, some real issues that have to be addressed in some of those communities. I know, for instance, Strathroy is on well water right now and there's a question about how much longer those wells will be capable of providing any further growth. Water supply is another issue that's very important to the county in terms of any future growth.

I think that because of the annexation, and particularly the contribution the town of Westminster makes to the county with its economic assessment base, as the member indicated, it is certainly a significant share of the county's assessment.

Recognizing that the county has some opportunities, I think, is important as well, the fact that the $6 million is important seed money for the county to use after it has developed its official plan, to try to identify in that official plan where the county feels the appropriate growth and development opportunities are as a county.

I am pleased to indicate that the county has already done a visioning session. They are entering into discussions now with consultants to do a strategic plan. They are hiring a replacement for the former CAO. As a result of all that, they will be developing, with our support, a new official plan which I think will go a long way in terms of providing those ideas to the county on how it can grow and develop in the future.

Mr Carr: First of all, I want to thank the ministry and the staff for going through the tremendous amount of preparation. I know Mrs Cunningham and Mr Murdoch were very pleased with the efforts last night. The packages you put together have laid things out. I want to thank you very much for that.

Hindsight being what it is, I wish members of this committee, with the ministry, could have done that outside the hours of this committee, because the big question we have this afternoon is that we've got 37 people and we're going to have to narrow that down to about nine.

There is some concern in the public, with the government saying there has been a lot of consultation and some of the public saying there has not. Unfortunately, the difficult task in the subcommittee this afternoon will be to pare that list down and try to get representation. If you look at the list, we've got agriculture people, people from the board of education, environmental groups and municipal officials. Looking back at it, I wish we had taken more time to do this and be together, which the ministry people can do along with the MPPs, and given more time to the public.

Having said that, I think from the information you've presented, we understand the government's position. I'm looking forward to getting on with hearing what the public is saying.

I know Ron was speaking in the House and missed the opportunity. I don't know what time is left, but in the interest of fairness, if he would like to take some of the time—I think Ms Mathysen may have some questions too—I'd be prepared to give my time over to that, with the understanding—I think this goes for all committees—that as we go along, if there are any questions or concerns we do have regarding the ministry, we can go directly to you on that, and once we've had a chance to go through the amendments. So I would be prepared to divide up the time to the other two parties if the ministry will give us a commitment that if we do have any questions as we go along, it will answer them.

The Chair: I just want to note that at 3:15, the subcommittee can meet in room 2. That's just next door here.

The other thing is that my colleague is in the House speaking today on a bill that addresses this particular issue also, that of a minister for rural affairs. I would like to be in there to vote at that time when the bell goes. If it goes at 11:55, then this committee will be adjourned.

We don't have that much time. The Liberals had approximately 20 minutes. You took about three minutes. Looking at the other side here, let's see if we can get back if Ron has other comments. I know Mr Mills has a comment. Maybe you could just address that comment before we go to the government party.

Mr Mills: There was some question by my colleague about input into the amendments. I'd just like to say that groups will be given the opportunity to look at the amendments, to make input during this committee.

I don't want to rap you on the knuckles, Bernard, but you said you were frightened of the iron hand, that we seem to be taking over. I can tell you very straightforwardly that we encourage municipalities to make their own decisions, to make their own solutions; witness to that is the Simcoe county restructuring. But this was very difficult; 11 years they didn't get to it, and that's the reason.

1140

Mr Grandmaître: However, however.

Ms Mathysen: I have a number of questions and I would like to leave some time for my colleague Mr Sutherland. Just indulge me for a moment. Mr Grandmaître, you were a Minister of Municipal Affairs. When was that?

Mr Grandmaître: In 1985.

Ms Mathysen: From 1985 to—

Mr Grandmaître: From 1985 to 1987.

Mr Mills: He was a better Minister of Revenue.

Ms Mathysen: To 1987? Okay, thank you.

Mr Grandmaître: He wasn't a bad employee, either.

Ms Mathysen: I have a number of questions. First of all, you mentioned that developments like South Winds were a significant problem in terms of the reason behind this extensive annexation. I just wondered how, when and by whom South Winds was approved.

My next question is, by whom was the 1988 London annexation proposal set aside?

My third question is, regarding this premise that regulations and a new official plan by the city of London will protect agricultural land within this new city, would regulations and a new official plan, or an official plan, period, in the county of Middlesex likewise protect this same agricultural land?

I pose my last question informally, but I would like to put it on the record because I would like clarification and I would like to see numbers. I understand that there will be a moratorium on taxes in the county of Middlesex and in the newly annexed area for five years and that London will be free to determine reassessments in 1993. But the whole cost of this package troubles me very much because some of my constituents are still city dwellers and they will, I fear, bear the cost.

I would like to put on the record that I am requesting:

— A full costing of the annexation, and I would like included the cost of the compensation package. I understand it will be about $35 million. I expect it would be difficult to extrapolate the $1 million in perpetuity for suburban roads, but certainly some kind of number around that, if it's possible.

— The cost of harmonizing PUC employees and city employees, because it's my understanding that PUC employees earn about $7,000 more in wages and benefits than city employees. I would expect that if they are working for the city as a group, there would be a need to somehow accommodate those city employees who have a lesser level of wages and benefits.

— The cost of employing the county employees who will be displaced. I know that there are some 70 in the town of Westminster and I expect there would be more once this shakes out.

I know that in the interim, in the next year or so, the OPP will be looking after policing in the annexed area. However, eventually the city will have to pay for that, and it's my understanding that some 24 new staff people are required, a new radio service is required, obviously there will be some cars required, and if I'm not mistaken, there will be perhaps even more than one new substation for the police required, because it's not logical for a policeman or a policewoman to go from Adelaide and Dundas all the way down to the Elgin county line on a call.

I'd like to know what the cost of extended fire protection, maintenance, snow plowing and caring for this new, extended road and the library is. It's my understanding that the Middlesex county library will be needing $100,000 in compensation for the loss of tax base and the loss of benefits that it received by having that Westminster-Lambeth library. I would like to know who will pay for that compensation.

Lastly, education: If there is going to be a moratorium on taxes in the county of Middlesex, does that include education taxes? Because notwithstanding this local arrangement between the London and Middlesex board that still hasn't materialized, I have some fears around the impact of this annexation on the Middlesex board.

I know, for example, that London would like to simply service and take over the three schools in Westminster. There is a capital cost—those buildings are worth about $3 million—and the teachers who serve there have a retirement gratuity package with the Middlesex board—London does not have such a retirement gratuity—and the payoff of that retirement gratuity is between $1.5 million and $2.5 million.

There are support staff from the Middlesex board of education. Unfortunately for those people, London is downsizing its support staff. How will those people who will be displaced and may not be employed be accommodated? Is there going to be a compensation package there?

I haven't mentioned hard services. London is responsible for hard services to Hyde Park, to Canterbury Estates in Hyde Park, to South Winds. While I'm familiar with the $3.5 million that is coming from the Ministry of the Environment, I would assume there would be some future costs in terms of hard servicing in respect to the 135 White Oaks Side Road area. And obviously, viewing the map, we see that there are future areas intended for industrial commercial development; hard services must go there.

Whatever I haven't been able to mention here—I'm sure I've lost or omitted something—I would like to know, in as close a ballpark figure as you can manage, what the final cost to those taxpayers in the city of London will be and an anticipation of how soon we could see the effects of the cost on those London taxpayers.

The Chair: I don't believe they have all the answers up front—

Mrs Mathysen: No. That, unfortunately, Mr Chair, is the problem: We don't have them all.

The Chair: But what we can do is that as soon as the answers are available, could they be addressed to the clerk here so the clerk can send it to each member of the committee before we meet next time? Is that—

Mrs Mathysen: No, I wonder, about those first two questions—

The Chair: Are there any questions that can be answered today?

Mr Riddell: On the South Winds question, I'm sorry, I don't have the information with me. We'll have to undertake to get that to the committee in the next day or so.

Mrs Mathysen: I believe it was in 1984-85, something like that, that it was approved.

The Chair: What was the second question?

Mrs Mathysen: By whom was the London 1988 proposed annexation set aside?

Mr Riddell: That proposal, as we reviewed it in the Ministry of Municipal Affairs, was seen as not comprehensive enough in terms of its application. It didn't include the Lambeth area which it was felt was very important. As a result of that, that's why we made that decision.

Mrs Mathysen: And that was in 1989?

Mr Riddell: In 1989, yes.

Mr Ron Eddy: Any reason?

The Chair: The thing is that with these questions that have been asked, rather than get them all at once, maybe if you have two or three that are answered or come through to the clerk and then maybe some would take a little bit longer, some of those—

Mr Grandmaître: There are so many questions, Mr Chair.

The Chair: Yes, there are so many questions. Send as many as you can through as quickly as possible for the committee, if that's possible.

Dr Chinnery: Can I just clarify one thing? Irene, the education taxes are not being protected in 1993 or succeeding years. It's the general mill rate for municipal purposes.

Mrs Mathysen: So if Middlesex is financially disadvantaged, then the ratepayers in Middlesex will be looking at the consequences of that.

Dr Chinnery: What we're saying is that we're protecting the municipal taxes. Because we are not doing anything with the boundaries of the school boards, we're not putting any restrictions on the school boards. That wouldn't be appropriate, I don't think.

Mr Sutherland: I wanted to come back to the question of the farm land in the southern part of the town of Westminster and the proposal that was put forward.

At this time, I want to give some credit to my colleague the member for Middlesex, who has throughout this entire effort tried to see what compromises were available.

Mr Riddell, you mentioned in response to that earlier that there were some proposals to make the annexation smaller regarding some of the land in the southern part of the town of Westminster. That had been offered to a couple of the townships and those townships had decided that they needed significant compensation to receive them?

1150

Mr Riddell: I believe that was the discussion that happened during the summer. There were discussions with all the municipalities in the area, and it's my understanding that as a result of a proposal on the table that looked at a new line in Westminster, both those municipalities that I mentioned expressed concern, as I indicated, around compensation, in terms of longer-term compensation, if they were to even consider taking those lands.

Mr Sutherland: Did the townships state at the time how much compensation they were looking at specifically for that?

Mr Riddell: I don't believe they knew. It was just an indication on their part that they were concerned that they would be asked to take over lands that they would have to provide services for but didn't have an ability to recover.

Mr Sutherland: The townships said, "We want compensation," but they didn't put any specific proposal on the table to be considered?

Mr Riddell: Not to my knowledge.

Mr Sutherland: Okay, thank you.

The Chair: Mr Eddy.

Mr Eddy: One follow-up question immediately is, were the people in the area consulted? The areas are so small. I really don't think they attract much attention, because the percentage in those two areas is so small in comparison to the vast agricultural class 1 and 2 lands in the town of Westminster that are going down the drain. That's why I say it's hardly worth talking about. We know, as a matter of fact, that with this deal the township of North Dorchester, if I may call it that, does not see its future lying with the county of Middlesex. It sees its destiny with the county of Oxford, and that's what you're doing because you're not looking at these things properly.

I cannot understand for the life of me why—well, you are of course Ministry of Municipal Affairs staff—the education mess is being left. Why is it being ignored and left? I think it's irresponsible to leave it, to ignore it to the extent you are, saying, "Oh well, the two boards of education, the Middlesex County Board of Education and the London Board of Education, can get together and work this out someplace, some time, perhaps." That is very poor. Everything else is being forced down people's throats, so to speak.

The Chair: Mr Eddy, I was trying to split the time as equally as possible. I thought you had a little comment to make or a question. Do you want a reply on that?

Mr Eddy: Is the education—

Mr Sutherland: Mr Chair, I want to just ask a question about time. Do we still have our time as the governing side?

The Chair: Yes. You stopped asking questions, so that's why I went back to rotation.

Mr Sutherland: I just wanted to ask that question. I think it's one thing to say you want compensation, but you have to put some proposal on the table before anything can be seriously evaluated in terms of any type of negotiation actually going on with respect to that issue. I just wanted to get that clarified as to whether something specifically had been put on the table by the townships.

The Chair: Any other government members with any more questions?

Mr Winninger: How much time remains, Mr Chair?

The Chair: You've got about three minutes, because we're coming up to the vote in the House.

Mr Winninger: I'd like to get back to the point raised by Mr Grandmaître about the 64,000 acres and why that's required. Unfortunately, because I had to debate in the House earlier, I couldn't hear all of your presentation, but I gather there are ongoing concerns with the extent to which London is presently growing. It's been identified as one of the fastest-growing centres. For sensible, rational future planning, we need to look at a wide area around London to ensure that we can protect valuable agricultural land and environmentally sensitive areas, so there can be proper planning for transit, schools and so on.

I wonder if the ministry, either through the parliamentary assistant or its senior officials, could respond directly to the question as to why we're looking at 64,000 acres.

Mr Grandmaître: I did ask that question: Why 64,000 acres?

Mr Eddy: The city doesn't want it.

Interjections.

The Chair: I'm trying to figure out who the parliamentary assistant is here.

Mr Mills: Well, they keep interrupting. Westminster didn't want it either. Once you've taken the tax base, Westminster didn't want it either. I think it's fair to say that the annexation, no matter how small or how big, the tax base would have gone anyway; and I just want to add the areas around wanting compensation in perpetuity, or the ability to develop it if they took the agricultural land.

Mr Winninger: I'm not sure you answered my question, but I think—and maybe you can confirm this—that the reason we're looking at this large area is for proper planning for future development, given that a lot of industry is attracted to London and needs well-serviced lands to develop on.

Quite frankly, in my own riding of London South, we're right at the boundary of the city; the neighbourhoods creep right up to the city boundary line. So in terms of the growth we're experiencing, particularly in the southern part of London, there has to be somewhere for those people to live. For that reason we need to develop some well-planned, well-structured residential areas and also industrial areas to service the growing need for industry.

The Chair: Any other questions?

Mr Winninger: No, Mr Chair.

The Chair: Fine. You've got a couple of minutes, Mr Eddy. Did you have other comments? I know you were thinking out loud there for a while; I could hear you talking.

Mr Eddy: I'm going to have a few problems. You're going to have some problems with me on this one, because I just don't understand the member's—I don't think the member has really looked into this, because there was agreement. There is lots of open land that can be annexed to the city of London in the town of Westminster that will not destroy its tax base; that will not take a lot of land out of agriculture, because it's owned by developers; that will meet the city's need to the year 2026, as the city's report indicated. It's all there, it's all in place and it can be easily transferred and not destroy a county and not eliminate a municipality.

Mr Winner: But it wouldn't be properly serviced.

Mr Eddy: Well, it can be serviced—

Mr Winner: The history doesn't show that.

Mr Eddy: The city of London can service it. It's available to them; it's adjoining two areas that are serviced and being serviced. It has rail and road facilities. It's there.

The Chair: It'll be very important to the point that when you're picking your witnesses to come before the committee, maybe these are some of the issues you want to bring forward with your witnesses. Since you're on the subcommittee, you'll have an opportunity to bring people forward who could represent this point of view.

As it's getting close to 12 and it looks like they're just winding up in the House—the vote will be coming—I'd like to adjourn this committee until 3:30 this afternoon, and 3:15 for the subcommittee meeting. Thank you.

The committee recessed at 1158.

AFTERNOON SITTING

The committee resumed at 1605.

The Chair: I would like to call the standing committee on finance and economic affairs to order. This afternoon we're on Bill 75, An Act respecting Annexations to the City of London and to certain municipalities in the County of Middlesex. I'd like to welcome you all here this afternoon.

COUNTY OF MIDDLESEX

The Chair: Our first presenter is Frank Gare, warden, Middlesex county. Would you come forward, please, and start your presentation. This is a total of an hour. We're going to have to cut back a little bit because of the House, maybe to about 50 minutes, so we can get everybody in today. Perhaps you can leave some time at the end for questions from the committee members. Welcome to the committee. Would you please introduce your associate also, his name and position, for the purposes of Hansard.

Mr Frank Gare: Thank you. Of course, my name is Frank Gare, as has been mentioned. The gentleman with me is Don Hudson. He's the acting clerk of the county of Middlesex. I'm the warden of Middlesex county.

I believe it's important to stress at the very beginning that Middlesex county is not against annexation as such. We do, however, want to ensure that any agreement or legislation regarding annexation represents the best agreement or legislation possible for residents of both the county of Middlesex and the city of London. We do not believe that Bill 75, the piece of legislation we are discussing here today, represents the best agreement for the county or the city.

There are currently 41 annexation disputes under way throughout Ontario. We believe the Middlesex experience establishes a dangerous precedent for the settlement of boundary disputes and therefore goes beyond a local issue. In our presentation today, I'll outline the county's concerns with Bill 75, the economic impact this legislation will have on the county and the city of London and the county's alternatives to what has been proposed in the legislation.

The county's concerns with Bill 75 focus on four areas of the legislation: the establishment of the boundary lines and the amount of land to be annexed; the compensation to the municipalities in the county for the loss of revenues through annexation of land; the elimination of the suburban roads commission, and the establishment of a buffer zone. I would like to spend the next few minutes reviewing the county's concerns in these four areas.

With regard to the boundary lines and the amount of land to be annexed, currently Bill 75 proposes the annexation of approximately 64,000 acres of land, largely agricultural, from the county of Middlesex to the city of London. As a result of this legislation, the entire town of Westminster will be annexed to the city of London. In addition, the townships of West Nissouri, North Dorchester, Delaware and London township will all have portions of their municipalities annexed to the city of London. Through annexation, the city of London will also become 80% of the size of Metropolitan Toronto.

Annexation will have a tremendous impact on the county of Middlesex. The county will lose 28.6% of its tax assessment base and about 15% of its population due to annexation. As a result of this dramatic loss in the tax assessment base and this serious loss in revenue, the county has expressed serious concerns to the Minister of Municipal Affairs about its ability to provide quality service to residents of the county.

Also, annexation means that the county will be losing valuable agricultural land, since the majority of the land designated by the legislation to be annexed is undeveloped agricultural land. Only 7% of the land being annexed, 4,000 to 5,000 acres, is designated as land for commercial or development use.

Those townships that are directly affected by annexation and losing portions of their land base to the city of London have also expressed serious concerns about their ability to remain economically viable after annexation. In fact it's worth noting that the township of West Nissouri has been discussing amalgamation with a township in Oxford county. They believe that amalgamation is a better alternative for them than annexation and that it is more economically feasible to amalgamate than to try and operate as a township after annexation. West Nissouri has already alerted its municipal employees that it may not continue to exist after January 1, 1993.

With regard to compensation to the county and the affected municipalities, as mentioned, the county is losing 28.6% of its tax assessment base as a result of annexation. We cannot continue to provide services to the residents without financial assistance from the city of London.

Bill 75 proposes about $20 million in compensation. However, half of this $20 million includes money the county would have received anyway through the suburban roads program. The $10 million in compensation is simply not enough to offset the loss in revenue the county and the municipalities will experience as a result of this annexation.

Bill 75 also proposes that the compensation be paid in a lump sum to the county from the city of London and that the county be given the responsibility for distributing the financial assistance among the municipalities. The county believes that determining financial assistance is a provincial responsibility. Therefore, the compensation given to each municipality should be detailed in legislation and not determined at a later date by the county.

We go now to suburban roads. Under Bill 75, the suburban roads commission is eliminated and the maintenance of all arterial roads becomes the responsibility of the county. For those of you not familiar with the suburban roads commission, it's a joint commission between the city and the county which shares the funding and management responsibility for maintaining the arterial roads in Middlesex county that in fact do feed the city of London. If you increase the size of London, you increase the traffic on those arterial roads, you increase the cost of maintenance and everything else that goes with it. We drop our assessment but we raise the costs.

Bill 75 stipulates that while the city of London will compensate the county in lieu of suburban roads contributions, the money is to be placed in a special reserve fund to be used for water and sewer development, in addition to road repairs. Also, the county may not take more than 50% of the expenditures for the road repairs from this fund. This means the county must contribute half the cost of the road repairs, despite losing 28.6% of its assessment base. This is simply not possible with the economic restraints the county would be facing as a result of annexation.

Bill 75 also states that the city's contribution in lieu of suburban roads funding will stop after 10 years. Therefore, in year 11, the county could potentially find itself in the situation of no funding for suburban roads, since the money in the fund may already have been used for water and sewer development.

The buffer zone: In addition to annexing 64,000 acres of land to the city of London, Bill 75 also establishes a three-kilometre buffer zone around the boundary of the land being annexed to the city of London. No development will be allowed in the buffer zone without full urban services, with the exception of farm-related development. While the province has stated that this buffer zone would prevent urban sprawl, the reality is that urban development would simply jump over the buffer zone and continue on the other side. Also, a buffer zone will not protect the development of agricultural land, since development will simply go around the zone or delay until the zone is removed.

Middlesex county is one of the top three counties in all of Canada in terms of the value of agricultural assets and agricultural output. The only way to control that would be official plans properly put in, with the proper rules and regulations to control this. The buffer zone really isn't necessary if you put the proper plans in. If you have faith in the Planning Act, then the buffer zone really isn't necessary.

The economic impact of annexation: One of the county's gravest concerns with Bill 75 is the economic impact that the legislation will have on the residents of the county. As a result of this annexation, residents in the county face an estimated 45% increase in their county taxes, since the county is losing almost 30% of its tax base, most of that being industrial and commercial.

Residents of Metro Toronto are currently concerned about the enormous increases they face under market value assessment, yet the increase in Middlesex county municipal taxes resulting from annexation is as great or greater than any increase those residents face. At a time when people are dealing with the economic hardships of the recession, the people of Middlesex county simply cannot afford to pay the increase of 45% in their taxes.

The substantial loss of revenue for the county because of annexation will also have an impact on the services which the county provides to its residents.

The Chair: I'm sorry, we're going to have to stop. Have we got a vote going on?

Mr Winninger: It's on the introduction of a bill.

The Chair: Okay. We're just going to have to stop and go up to the House and come back and resume.

The committee recessed at 1614 and resumed at 1627.

The Chair: We'll resume the hearings here. Mr Gare—actually, we started a little bit earlier. We didn't have orders of the day yet, but I tried to get the committee going a little bit earlier there. Sometimes we're like firemen: We have to put out a fire. So we're back again—false alarm. Okay, carry on.

Mr Gare: Thank you, Mr Hansen. Back to the bottom of page 4, if I could.

The substantial loss of revenue for the county because of annexation will also have an impact on the services which the county provides to its residents. Despite the fact that the county will have less money, it will be expected to provide the same quality of service, whether it be roads, schools or health services, as it did prior to annexation. The compensation package, as outlined in Bill 75, is not enough to help the municipalities in the county maintain their commitment to offering top-quality services to their residents.

It's our understanding that the ministry indicated this morning that it will amend Bill 75 so the tax rates in 1993 in the annexed areas will not increase any more than the tax rates in the city of London. However, it should be noted that London taxpayers may face huge increases to pay for the enhanced compensation package and the provision of services to newly annexed areas and residents.

We're also concerned about the ministry's announcement this morning that the bill will be amended to permit the minister to make regulations to limit tax increases in the county from 1994 to 2003, and that tax increases in the county would be prohibited for the next five years. Annexation and the loss of 28.6% of our assessment base will have a severe economic impact on the county. We believe it's unreasonable that the minister will make decisions on tax increases for the county, since it is the county and not the ministry which will have to respond to the economic realities of annexation and continue to provide services to the county residents.

I'll go through a few of the activities of the county with relation to this bill.

The county has voiced its concerns regarding annexation since 1988, when the city of London formally applied under the Municipal Boundary Negotiations Act to annex parts of the county to the city. The county made a presentation to the arbitrator, Mr Brant, during the arbitration hearings and later raised its concerns with the Brant report as well as the draft copy of Bill 75. Middlesex has also made its concerns known on Bill 75 to the Minister of Municipal Affairs, Dave Cooke, to Middlesex and London area MPPs and to other government officials since the draft legislation was released in late May. The county also made a presentation to the minister at his hearings in late September in London.

I think it's important to realize that the county has not been sitting idly by, criticizing the current legislation without offering any input on how to make Bill 75 better. As I stated in the beginning, the county is not against annexation, but we want to ensure that the annexation legislation implemented recognizes and responds to the concerns of the residents of the county.

In June the county prepared a package of proposals which are alternatives to the current legislation. This package addressed the county's concerns with the four components of the legislation I spoke of earlier. Since that time, the county has been promoting its package of proposals as a possible alternative to Bill 75. In late July we met with the Minister of Municipal Affairs to review and discuss the county's alternative proposals. To date, the county has yet to receive any response from the minister on this package, and it does not know whether the province has accepted any of its suggestions or is willing to make any changes. We made several requests to the minister that the county be allowed to review the possible amendments to the bill prior to these committee hearings. However, the minister never responded to our requests.

It is significant that the county's alternative package represents the only package of options on annexation which has been agreed upon by all municipalities within Middlesex county. Bill 75 is an initiative of the provincial government and does not have the support of the county or its municipalities.

Our alternative package: As I just mentioned, the county's alternative proposals address four areas of Bill 75: the establishment of boundary lines and the amount of land to be annexed, adequate compensation for loss of revenue, elimination of the Suburban Roads Commission and the establishment of a buffer zone around the land to be annexed.

I think it's important to realize how stunned the county was when we learned that Bill 75 stipulates the annexation of 64,000 acres. This is an enormous annexation and is substantially more than has ever been requested by the city of London. For example, a 1988 proposal to the then Liberal government stated that it would require an annexation of approximately 23,000 acres. In the city's public presentation to the arbitrator, Mr Brant, in March 1992, London indicated it would require an annexation of 9,900 acres of industrial land to the year 2026. Furthermore, nine days later in a private letter the city changed its request from 9,900 acres of industrial land to 12,000 acres. The 64,000 acres of agricultural, residential and industrial land granted by this legislation is five times greater than what the city said it would need.

We believe that our boundary line proposal is a reasonable compromise that would meet the needs of the city of London and still leave the county with a substantial assessment base. The county's alternative on the establishment of boundary lines allows 23,977 acres to be annexed to the city of London, more than the amount of land that the city requested in 1988. Annexation of this amount of land accommodates the future economic development of the city of London while maintaining the town of Westminster, London township, North Dorchester township, Delaware and West Nissouri as viable municipalities. It is worth noting that the county's proposal on boundary lines allows for the annexation of the London airport in West Nissouri township to the city of London, but excludes the landfill site situated in Westminster.

In an attempt to reach a local solution on this contentious issue of boundaries, Middlesex county has discussed its own boundary alternative with the mayor of London, Tom Gosnell. The city, however, has expressed concerns regarding the omission of the landfill site in Westminster. While the county understands the city's concerns regarding access to and management of the landfill site, we believe it is not necessary to annex it in order to address these concerns. In fact, the boundary line as proposed in Bill 75 could be altered so that the landfill site remains in Westminster, and the city of London and Westminster could reach an agreement on access and perhaps joint management of the site, with the county having access for all municipalities for the life of the landfill site.

We have heard that one of the reasons the city of London wants to annex the landfill site is that it wants to expand the Westminster site and convert it into a regional landfill. Since the city of London has just recently purchased land around the landfill site at four times its market value and the town of Westminster and the county have already agreed informally to the expansion of the site, expanding the landfill site could occur regardless of whether the site was annexed by the city or remained in the town of Westminster. With or without the annexation, the city of London would still have to submit its landfill expansion plans to an environmental assessment process by the province. This process would allow citizens to appear before the environmental assessment board to voice their concerns, and the results of this process could potentially derail any expansion plans for the landfill site.

With regard to the aforementioned 1988 proposal, the county of Middlesex also supports the option of boundary lines suggested in the 1988 city of London proposal. As indicated, the city requested an annexation of approximately 23,000 acres of land. This proposal also included a recommendation of coservicing: a shared-cost-of-services arrangement between the city and the county. This proposal was unanimously accepted by London city council but did not go beyond the proposal stage because the Minister of Municipal Affairs stated at the time that the proposal was not comprehensive enough.

We believe that this 1988 request by the city of London would still provide the city with enough land to expand and is the least costly proposal for the citizens of London since residents would not face large increases in their municipal taxes to cover the cost of a compensation package to the county.

This option has only just recently resurfaced due to concern by citizens of London about the inability of the city of London to pay the necessary compensation to Middlesex county. Recent figures released by the ministry reveal that the city of London would be required to pay the county $34.5 million in compensation. That's an increase of $14.5 million over the $20-million compensation package suggested by the Brant report. The province has not indicated that it will assist London in meeting its financial commitments to the county. Therefore the city of London will be solely responsible for finding a tax source for supplying this compensation, and municipal taxes are the most likely source.

This $34.5 million is only the compensation; it does not cover any of the associated costs with servicing the extra area: policing, hydro and all of the rest of the servicing items that go with a package like this.

A smaller annexation of 23,000 or 24,000 acres, compared to the 64,000 acres according to Bill 75, will not only allow more municipalities to remain viable and operational but will also remove the burden from the city of London of providing increased compensation to the county, since the city and the county will share the cost of the provision of services.

Since the county has never received a response from the Minister of Municipal Affairs on whether an alteration of the boundary lines of annexation would be acceptable, we do not know if the government is open to suggestions for change. We realize that time is limited, with only two days of standing committee hearings and two days of clause-by-clause, but the county will continue to work to address the issue of boundary lines.

Middlesex County strongly believes that its alternative of annexing 24,000 acres of land represents the better solution for both the city and the county. We urge the minister to meet with the city and the county to review these alternative proposals. There are those who say this proposal comes too late to make any difference to this legislation. However, it is the county's view that it makes far better sense to amend the boundary lines now and implement an annexation agreement that both the county and city can afford. Once the boundary lines are drawn, it's very difficult to change them.

Compensation: Acceptance of the county's proposal on boundary lines would obviously result in a reduced need for compensation from the city to the county. Given the fact that the city of London will have to find additional funding to provide more services to the newly annexed residents of the city, a decrease in compensation to the county would certainly be beneficial to the city, which has yet to determine the impact of annexation on London's municipal taxes. The county's alternative proposal stresses that any compensation from the city to the county must be sufficient to keep the county and the local municipalities viable and enable them to provide the same level of services to their residents that existed prior to annexation.

The county's alternative proposal on compensation also recommends that a compensation process be established so that the province establishes the amount of compensation to be awarded to the municipalities on an individual basis. Neither the county nor the local municipalities favour the system of compensation outlined in Bill 75, whereby the county has a lump sum and it distributes the money.

Middlesex county is concerned that the amendments to the bill presented to the committee this morning did not address the issue of the county having to pay the city compensation for transfers of assets through the annexation. With the county losing 28.7% of its assessment base and the county taxpayers facing a potential increase in taxes of 45%, the county simply cannot afford to pay any compensation to the city of London. Compensation from the county to the city of London is not feasible. Any financial assistance to the city would come from the province, not from the county.

1640

We are pleased that the ministry indicated in its presentation to the committee this morning that section 48 of the bill will be amended so the enhanced compensation package of $34.5 million over 10 years will be paid directly to the municipalities.

Suburban roads: The county cannot assume full responsibility for the repair and maintenance of all arterial roads in Middlesex county leading to the city. We believe some form of suburban road funding must be maintained and have suggested to the minister that an agreement be reached for suburban road funding which would allow joint funding between the city and the county for arterial roads. The county has suggested the province adopt the Brant-Brantford model of suburban road funding, where the city of Brantford contributes to the cost of maintaining arterial roads in the county.

The ministry indicated this morning that Bill 75 will be amended so that payments to compensate for Suburban Roads Commission payments will continue in perpetuity, with the payments being based on the local assessment of the city of London. We are concerned, however, that the ministry regulation will allow the minister to adjust the mill rate, and it is entirely possible, then, in the future that the contribution to suburban roads may decrease.

The buffer zone: We believe that the three-kilometre buffer zone around the land to be annexed to the city of London is too large and will not halt development of valuable agricultural land. Official plans will do this if they're in properly. The county has recommended to the ministry that the buffer zone either be eliminated or reduced to 1.5 kilometres.

It is our understanding that the minister has stated there will be no change to the size of the buffer zone. Instead, the official plans of the townships around the buffer zone will be allowed to remain in effect, and any development of land within the buffer zone already designated as industrial will be allowed as long as it does not contravene the official plans of these townships. Any use of the land other than that designated by the township's official plan may be permitted by ministerial order. We believe that this is a more effective use of this land within the buffer zone but we still question why the zone is necessary.

Concluding remarks: I've outlined to you this afternoon the county's concerns with Bill 75 and the alternatives to this legislation which we have proposed to the government and the city of London. The county has tried to maintain an open dialogue with the minister to discuss our concerns with the legislation and review our options, but unfortunately we have received no response to these suggestions. Although the minister has indicated that changes would be made to the legislation, the direction of these possible changes was never shared or discussed with the county.

This annexation legislation will force significant changes to the character and fabric of the county of Middlesex and the city of London. We are concerned that the annexation legislation recognize and respond to the concerns of the residents of the county and the city. As residents of the county, we must live with the annexation legislation you pass and implement. Annexation legislation must be done right the first time, because as this process has illustrated, boundary lines and compensation packages to municipalities are not easily changed. Middlesex county and its residents must be assured that this legislation, Bill 75, is the best possible agreement for all involved, and this can only be accomplished if the changes are made to the legislation which we have identified in our presentation.

Just a couple of other items that I don't have written on there: One is that if the boundary lines stay where they are, there will be a great impact on the education system in the London area. Increased taxes are almost a sure thing if these lines stay where they are. If you're talking about a 45% increase in your tax dollar, all of you are aware of the tax implications on the education end of your tax bill. You start applying the same percentages to that, and it becomes a real issue.

The other item is strictly a personal item. In section 5 you have made a note in the act to the effect that one person would be appointed to sit as an equal on an elected body, and I think that's a terrible precedent to set. Thank you very much for your time.

The Chair: Thank you. A right-up-to-date brief here. I noticed this morning you got comments, so you must have been pretty busy getting it all put together. Mr Mills has a few comments as the PA to the minister, and then we'll carry on with question and answer after that.

Mr Mills: I'd like to make a few comments, and it may alleviate a lot of unnecessary questions. To answer some of the points you've made, sir, first of all, you say that the settlement of boundaries establishes a dangerous precedent, and I'd like to say that the bill does not constitute a dangerous precedent because the London area presented many unique problems, such as the proportion of population in the city that made a regional government solution unworkable. The minister has clearly promised that this will not be a model for solving the restructuring problems, so I just address that.

I want to go on with the county's concerns with the legislation. The boundary lines were set to allow for good long-term planning for London's growth, to permit a solution to its environmental problems and to prevent a remnant leftover Westminster which isn't financially viable.

In so far as the compensation is concerned, it's been sweetened by amendment to prevent the annexation of related tax increases for five years and by changes to the suburban road compensation. There's $1 million in perpetuity for roads for London, and this should address roads-related problems and the amount will increase as London's tax base increases.

I'd just like a brief word about the buffer zone. The buffer zone is there to prevent fringe development and to protect farm land. I'm a little bit surprised to hear that you're advocating a form of development which is not in the long-term interest of the county and which will unnecessarily disrupt agriculture and remove land from production. Instead, the county should follow good planning policies and practices which will strengthen its financial base for the long term by developing in and around its existing centres.

You spoke of the alternate package. It has not had the support of any major group except county council, and due to the lack of support it doesn't seem possible. It isn't a comprehensive long-term solution to many of the existing issues. It seems problematical in some aspects such as joint service areas and necessitating joint planning.

I've got another one, the economic impact, with the tax impact in the first five years and phasing over the second five years to allow the county time to adjust and restructure. We've spoken about the suburban roads, and those are my comments, Mr Chairman.

The Chair: Okay. Thank you.

Mr Gare: Do I get to reply?

The Chair: You get to reply to them. Go ahead, Mr Gare.

Mr Gare: As far as it setting a precedent is concerned, I think it does set a precedent. You're allowing a city to try and administer over agricultural land, and London by its own admission is having trouble coming up with some way to do that. If you go to the Kitchener area, you will find it's having trouble looking after agricultural land, and it is a precedent that Windsor doesn't want to see, Kingston doesn't want to see, Stratford doesn't want to see, and any number of other places.

You mentioned that the major group hasn't supported it. I don't know what you would think Middlesex county is if it's not a major group. We're one of the foremost players in this. I live 35 miles from London out in Adelaide township. This is going to affect me. If this goes through, it's going to affect my tax dollars, and it's going to affect my pocketbook and my kids as long as I live on that property if I happen to hand it to them.

As far as planning is concerned, I really have my doubts that people are looking at this in the right and proper manner. To change a boundary does not change how you service people. You must have coservices to do this properly. If you keep drawing a line and extending this thing out, then you're only servicing the people in that area.

You must have the coservices and you must have it working back and forth so that everybody gets serviced, not just the people in London. I want the people in North Dorchester to be serviced too, and Delaware, and ultimately Adelaide township. You can't do that as long as you keep saying, "We're going to set the boundaries here and that's as far as you can go." If you can't get London to go coservices, then I think legislation should be put in to force it because the services, the water, sewage and waste disposal, are of utmost importance to the people, and that's what you have to remember.

Mr Grandmaitre: Is there time—

The Chair: We're going to have to split it up there. I'm going to start off with the third party. We're looking at about three or four minutes apiece.

Mr Bill Murdoch (Grey): Is that all we're going to get?

The Chair: We're about an hour and a half behind.

1650

Mr Murdoch: I certainly appreciate having you people here today to talk about probably one of the most undemocratic processes we've seen in the history of Ontario. We're upset about this and there doesn't seem to be anybody wanting to listen to you people and that's really unfortunate.

You mentioned that there were no other key players. I don't know what happened to the Middlesex Federation of Agriculture. I would call them a very key player and I was wondering—I'd like to ask you, Gord—are you going to set up a new London Federation of Agriculture? Is the government going to pay for that?

Mr Mills: They do everything.

Mr Murdoch: I'll ask you that question, Gord.

The Chair: The question isn't—

Mr Murdoch: All right. If you don't want, then maybe it's a good idea—

The Chair: We can discuss this out in the hall afterwards.

Mr Murdoch: Well, I don't like discussing—that's the problem. What do you think about that? Do you see now we'll need a London Federation of Agriculture? Is that what's going to happen?

Mr Gare: Well, there has to be some sort of committee set up, whether it's a federation of agriculture—they would certainly be involved in an effort to take their concerns to the city of London council. It's an entirely different process.

Mr Murdoch: You've been around for quite a while as a municipal politician. Have you ever seen anything like this where they just, on high, come down and say this is what you're going to do? You were prepared to talk about other ideas, am I not—

Mr Gare: Oh, sure. We have an alternative proposal.

Mr Murdoch: You have an alternative proposal?

Mr Gare: Yes.

Mr Murdoch: This government will not listen to that proposal, as we've just heard, I guess. How are you reacting with London now? We went through an annexation process in our area, but the government of the time forced us to talk and we did. I was reeve of the township of Sydenham and we had to deal with the city of Owen Sound and we sat down. It took two years to hammer out a deal, but we did get the deal and that was a democratic process because when we came out of there both of us were happy.

Do you see how you're going to be able to get along with London after this, because it's being forced upon you? I know it's not London's fault either, but the people who are going to be annexed that do not want to be annexed right now—I'm talking a lot about the rural area—they will never become Londonites, will they, in your eyes?

Mr Gare: You will always retain your identity no matter where you go, yes.

Mr Murdoch: But do you think there will always be this feeling of bitterness that this was forced upon you?

Mr Gare: That's always a possibility. The process that was taken does encourage some of that, yes.

Mr Murdoch: This is what I've been getting at. Maybe the government can listen. It will never work when you force people to do things like this in a democratic country. It doesn't work very well in socialist countries, but you're trying to force it on people in a democratic country and I think—

Mr Sutherland: Is that like regional government?

Mr Murdoch: It's maybe—we can't talk, it's—

Mr Winninger: Maybe you would have found a local solution.

Mr Eddy: Oxford county was not forced.

The Chair: Order. Mr Murdoch has the floor and he's waiting for an answer.

Mr Murdoch: One of the members across the floor said maybe I have the solution. Well, there is a solution: You sit down. Middlesex has come back with a counteroffer; London can come back with a counteroffer. That's how things work out. If you have a government dedicated to working with democracy, then you can work things out. You sit down then.

You have the stick now because you've almost forced them into it with this bill. It hasn't passed yet, thank God, and maybe it won't get passed, but you have the stick there that you can do it. You can tell people in Middlesex they've got to sit down, and you can tell London it's got to sit down, but you just can't set up somebody to come in and say, "Hey, this is what you're going to do; tough it." It won't work in a democracy and there's going to be people upset. They have rights and you're taking their rights away from them.

The Chair: I have to cut you off there, Mr Murdoch.

Mrs Mathysen: Just a couple of quick questions: One of the problems this annexation seeks to address is planning and environmental problems in Westminster. Also, it's been designed to compel the city of London to do extensive planning around environmental development. Is the county of Middlesex prepared to develop an equally rigorous official plan for the county, one that would be comparable to that of the city of London?

Secondly, I know the whole issue of restructuring in Middlesex has been a contentious one for years. I know you have a restructuring committee. I would like to know at what point that restructuring committee is in terms of its recommendations, and is that restructuring something we could look forward to in terms of addressing some of the very difficult problems Middlesex is facing and has faced?

Mr Gare: I might say that in July—was it July we went to Centralia?—we were away to what we called a visioning session. A lot of these problems were brought up on the table and discussed. From that visioning session, the county review committee received the first proposals last night for strategic plans which in fact would go to setting up the county with a plan for the future with regard to whether these are the right things for the county. I'm sure the strategic plan would go down those roads.

Mrs Mathysen: Do coservicing agreements work?

Mr Gare: You bet they do.

Mrs Mathysen: Can they work in this case?

Mr Gare: Absolutely. The lines are there. It's a user-pay thing, always has been. That's how you recover your money. As I say, you draw a line and then you exclude the people outside the line, and I think that's wrong. I think you cross the line with your service. Your waste disposal, your landfill sites and so on are going to be in a larger area. You can't have one in every municipality. Right there you've got coservices going on. You've got municipalities working together. The same thing can happen to your sewage treatment plants, your water systems and everything else.

Mr Will Ferguson (Kitchener): Can you tell me what the 1992 annual operating budget of the county would be?

Mr Gare: It's $23 million.

The Chair: Okay, Mr Eddy, you're on now.

Mr Eddy: I came down here as an elected member to represent the constituents of my riding. I hope to do that and try to do a good job to the best of my ability. Here I find I'm involved in an affair, a situation, a procedure, that is the most unfair situation I've ever experienced in my entire municipal life, starting on November 1, 1955, and that's it.

Warden Gare, I'd like to take this opportunity to thank you for appearing and to compliment you and your council on taking the time to make us aware of the fact of your deliberations in response to the city of London's annexation proposals and applications. There were originally four municipalities. Subsequently, two were withdrawn and it ended up with two municipalities, London township to the north and the town of Westminster to the south. I want to thank you for your response, recognizing that the city needs to grow. Indeed you want to grow and you recognize that and the local municipalities there do as well.

I also want to recognize your council for being at the forefront of county governments in any way: being the first county in Ontario to establish a library cooperative; the first county to establish a county library; the first county to establish a county official plan, indeed establish an official plan before there was legislation by the Ministry of Municipal Affairs to allow counties to become designated as municipalities; the first county to establish a county-wide fire-alerting system through the cooperation of the good neighbour, the city of London, servicing some 22 or 23 fire departments, one in a first nation and one in another county. Exceptional. You have done very well and I thank you for coming.

I have some questions. The first question is, are you aware and have you been aware of a series of amendments to the bill that have been proposed by the government?

Mr Gare: Are you referring to the ones presented this morning?

Mr Eddy: Yes.

Mr Gare: Yes.

Mr Eddy: Does your presentation reflect any of those amendments in any way or was this prepared prior to them?

Mr Gare: This has been prepared since.

Mr Eddy: So it does take those into consideration?

Mr Gare: It takes them into consideration, but our primary presentation is still in there in its entirety.

Mr Eddy: Does that include the new compensation package, the figures and that sort of thing?

Mr Gare: Yes.

Mr Eddy: Okay, that's fine. I just wanted to be clear on that.

Another question I have is that on page 2, I'm very distressed to find that the two local municipalities in the county of Middlesex that will be left are now seriously discussing amalgamation with adjoining municipalities in another county, further injuring and disembowelling, as I say, the county of Middlesex. I would understand that's a different process and there'd be an application to the OMB, an amalgamation which could probably go through unless the honourable Minister of Municipal Affairs would want to interfere with that process. Are you aware that is a possibility and can happen?

1700

Mr Gare: I might correct you that there was just West Nissouri. The other was on a rumour basis and I've been assured by the reeve—

Mr Eddy: And North Dorchester's withdrawn from—thank you very much. I'm relieved at that.

The Chair: As the clock has run out—

Mr Gare: She's informed me that this is not up.

The Chair: I'm sorry we had a few interruptions there. I'd like to thank you for appearing before this committee.

Mr Gare: Can I—just one little thing? In the changes, the amendments to the bill this morning, in the list that was given to us as a summary, it mentions these suburban roads and it says the subsequent payments will be made by the city to the county on the same basis in perpetuity, but when you look at the actual sheet here, it does not say "in perpetuity."

Mr Eddy: A slight slip of the hand.

The Chair: Okay, fine; we've got that recorded in Hansard.

Mr Gare: I'd like that noted and cleared up, because it's in here that "such other mill rate as the Minister of Municipal Affairs may subscribe." We might have it for a day and then we lose it.

Mr Grandmaitre: That's why Gord had a terrible time pronouncing that.

The Chair: Fine, thanks a lot.

Mr Gare: Thank you very much, Mr Hansen and the committee.

Mr Eddy: I apologize to you on behalf of the committee for the little time you've had. I also resent the little time I've had to ask questions; I had a great many more

Mr Winninger: He went overtime this morning.

Mr Sutherland: You should know that it was his members who caused the vote in the House.

Mr Gare: I appreciate the opportunity to come before you.

MICHAEL TROUGHTON

The Chair: The next presenter is Mr Michael Troughton, professor, department of geography, University of Western Ontario. Sir, you have half an hour. In that half-hour, try to save some time at the end, because Mr Eddy here is just anxious to ask questions all day.

Mr Sutherland: Mr Chair, can I correct that? We have two other presentations besides Mr Troughton's, so I think we should be saying about 20 minutes each rather than a half-hour.

The Chair: Okay. We'll see the presentation, and try to get as many questions in at the end, not statements. Go ahead, sir.

Dr Michael Troughton: I appear before the committee this afternoon at the request of members of the committee asking me to come here and make some comments on the annexation, particularly in relation to these hearings on Bill 75. I haven't done this kind of operation before, so I prepared some notes for myself and then found out this morning there are 25 copies needed of my presentation. That's what you have in front of you. I do apologize for their rather rough form, the notes to myself for this presentation. I didn't realize they would be treated so formally.

What I tried to do on these notes was to indicate, first of all, that I have an ongoing involvement, both from an academic and a non-academic point of view, with respect to this process. I've been in a position to study the annexation and the urban-rural interactions in the London area since the late 1960s. I've followed this process fairly closely in a number of ways, investigated aspects of related urban-rural interaction, made presentations at various times. I suspect the reason I was asked to speak here today is because of that ongoing involvement in commenting, at least, on the process.

If I can turn to the section that I label "Overall Opinion," I'd like to contrast the fact that I recognize the need and the rationale for the 1961 annexation by the city of London, because at that time the city was grossly under-bounded and had sprawled well outside its administrative boundaries. There was no doubt, at least in retrospect, that an annexation was justified; whether a specific size or not I won't go into, but there was certainly a need for annexation at that time.

However, I can find no similar situation and therefore no justification for the current annexation. I came to that conclusion back in 1981 and I've retained that conclusion ever since, through the various proposals made by the city up to the present and through the recent arbitration hearings.

I'm prepared to accept that a small annexation of lands immediately adjacent to the city may facilitate some rationalization of service provision and provide a cushion of land for both industrial and residential development. But from my viewpoint, there exists no justification under any rubric, be it planning, development, need etc, for the major annexation that's set forth in this bill.

As a general comment also, before I look at some specific items, may I add that I personally believe that the arbitration process came to be a flawed one. I sat through most of the hearings. I heard many of the people who made presentations. In my opinion, the recommendations of the arbitrator, as reflected in Bill 75, in no way reflect the majority opinion which was sought during those hearings. So there is to me a tremendous discrepancy between the stated purpose of the arbitration hearings, to get public opinion and input, and the results that came out at the end.

I have two what I regard as major objections to the proposal. My first one is that London, to my mind, has never demonstrated the need for more land beyond the most modest levels. I base this on the fact that, reviewing the situation that has developed in the city since 1961, even at the present density levels within the city, they're well below those of 1960; in fact, hardly more than half those of 1960. Even if we projected the suggested population of the city for the year 2026, which is the period that was looked at in the proposals, the density in the city based on London's own population projections would still only be about two thirds the level it was back in 1960. To go beyond that and provide the city with this tremendous amount of additional land to create a place that, as has been said, is approaching the size of Metropolitan Toronto, with 10 times its population, even at a population of 400,000 by the year 2026 it would result in densities—in the note it says less than 19, but it should be less than 10 per hectare, or less than 30% of the 1960 density.

This will result—and I base this on a professional opinion—in a huge, inevitably low-density urban place that I find to be in direct contradiction to the current recommendations that are coming out of the Sewell commission on planning that is currently at the stage of making its recommendations. They have plumped very solidly for higher urban densities in this province. This proposed annexation goes absolutely in the opposite direction, as far as I can judge.

I think it will result in widespread urban sprawl. As has been mentioned earlier, I think it will be extremely costly in terms of servicing a huge peripheral zone in terms of public transport, infrastructure, services and so forth. Obviously, some of these additional costs are already being uncovered.

In addition, it will divert funds away from redevelopment of the present city of London, including its already severely impacted core, which several studies have pointed out, and the need for service and infrastructure repair and replacement, which is a common need among municipalities not only in Canada but right across North America. It will saddle an urban municipality and a planning department with rural and agricultural responsibilities for which it has neither competence nor desire, in my opinion. I've had relations with the planning department in the city of London over the years, and I base that opinion on discussion with planners in the city.

My second and equally serious criticism involves the loss of a large nationally and provincially significant area of prime agricultural land. The key classification of the Canada Land Inventory—you have this on the table—places over 95% of all land to be annexed in classes 1 to 3 capability for agriculture, and, within 10 miles of the city of London, 65% in class 1.

This land is well recognized—one could produce voluminous literature to support the fact that this is a scarce national resource, and it's irreplaceable. Both federal and particularly provincial governments, including the present one, have called for its protection and its transfer to non-farm use only through thorough justification. I think that loss is a critical one, not only locally, not only provincially but, I would suggest, on a national scale.

1710

I'll just note a couple of other criticisms. The gain for the city will be outweighed, I believe, by losses for the county. One that hasn't actually been mentioned, I think, is the very fact of not only territory but the geographic integrity of the county. The way that it will be shaped, literally, after the annexation, if it goes through in its present form, will create an unwieldy geographic area. Of course, the losses of population and revenue have been treated very well by Warden Gare.

In my estimation, the county was doing a credible job of both stewardship of its agricultural lands and the provision of education, government and services etc to its area and population. This has been challenged and potentially reduced in favour of a more expensive and inappropriate jurisdiction.

I might add, with respect to planning, that it was my impression that planning was somewhat on its way towards meaningful discussions between the city and the county. It seems to me that not only have these been swept aside by imposed annexation, but I think they will inevitably sour city-county, rural-urban relationships for years to come. There is some evidence that the 1961 annexation left a bad taste in many people's mouths for a considerable period after it. I suggest that this annexation would leave an even worse taste in most county mouths for an equally long period of time.

Conclusions: It's my opinion that the proposed annexation is unjustified in terms of the needs of the city, which have never been sufficient to require more than a modest increase to its present area, even over a 30- to 50-year period.

Secondly, the impact on the rural area, and particularly the loss of a huge area of prime farm land, far outweighs any benefits in planning, administrative or other terms. In a general sense, in an era of conservation and sustainable development, if these are to be anything more than terms, if they are to mean anything, the proposed annexation goes right against them. It's a throwback and is completely inappropriate to the goals of a conservator society.

Finally, the annexation, especially the proposed transfer of prime farm land to an urban jurisdiction, is antithetical to the stated policies for agriculture and rural planning in Ontario as they have been developed by successive governments in the province, be they Conservative, Liberal or the current NDP. Thank you very much.

The Chair: Thank you. We'll start off with Mrs Mathysen.

Mrs Mathysen: Actually, Mr Chair, I think it would be fair to give some of my colleagues a chance; they haven't had an opportunity.

The Chair: Anybody on the government side have a question?

Mr Grandmaître: Professor, are you familiar with the 1988 proposal?

Dr Troughton: The one that's being suggested as an alternative at this time?

Mr Grandmaître: Yes.

Dr Troughton: Yes. I have documentation, as far as it was available, on each of the alternatives that have been suggested on the way. Yes, I've seen that.

Mr Grandmaître: Would you say this was more representative of the needs of the city of London?

Dr Troughton: Yes, I think it's more than reasonable in relation to the city's needs.

Mr Grandmaître: More than reasonable?

Dr Troughton: Yes. To me, they haven't necessarily proved the requirement for the area that is suggested by that 1988 proposal, so I would say it would be generous.

Mr Grandmaître: If you're familiar with the 1988 and the 1992 proposals, would you call this a land grab?

Dr Troughton: That's the appearance it gives. It's been defended as having some logic; I find the logic flawed. There may have been good faith in the suggestion that London should have the opportunity to develop, but I think it goes far too far and is unjustified and will be costly to the city and to the rural area.

Mr Grandmaître: I think it's only reasonable, as I mentioned this morning, that the city of London needed more room to expand; it needed more commercial and industrial land. My question this morning was, why 64,000 acres, and 95% of the 64,000 acres can be—5% can be developed, and yet the rest is all—

Dr Troughton: There was a reason, of course. I think the reason was the tactical mistake on the part of Westminster in creating itself into a town, which got itself into the situation of being analogous to Clearwater on the edge of Sarnia. This looked like a reasonable solution, but in fact it was anything but a reasonable solution. I think there was a political undersituation there that obscured the real facts of what this would do to the area from the point of view of both the city and the county.

Mr Grandmaître: Would you say that—

The Chair: I'm going to have to cut off because of the time. Mr Murdoch, do you have a question? I've got one from Irene over there, but go ahead.

Mr Murdoch: Okay. Thank you for coming. I appreciate this. I think you explained that you do see the need for London to expand; you're in agreement with that.

Dr Troughton: I can see that it might be appropriate to take in some extra area for certain key purposes here.

Mr Murdoch: But you don't see the need for the amount of land that's mentioned here in Bill 75.

Dr Troughton: No.

Mr Murdoch: Quickly, what do you suggest we do from here, then? What would your suggestion be to the present-day government and to this committee as to what we should do right here where we are? What should we do?

Mr Grandmaître: Call an election.

Dr Troughton: I think in many ways to take a step back would be a good idea. The question would be whether you go back to square one or whether you take a suggestion that had already been looked at. I suspect that probably the best way to go would be to look most closely at this 1988 suggestion because it is acceptable to the county, and in that sense it would more reflect the arbitration process, where there was a consensus, I think, by people speaking both from the county and from other areas, that a modest agreed-upon annexation would be acceptable. It would reflect that kind of thing.

Mr Murdoch: I think it's called democracy.

Mrs Mathysen: Just very quickly, Professor Troughton, one of the concerns that I've heard over and over again is that, historically, urban centres are not able to safeguard agricultural land and the farmers as they go about their business. Bill 75 proposes stringent regulations to protect agricultural land, and I am wondering, since you are a geographer, will these be effective? Are the fears that I've heard voiced legitimate fears?

Dr Troughton: I think they're legitimate fears because of things that have happened in other areas. I would suggest that the regional government situation, for example in Niagara, has been absolutely chaotic as far as preserving prime agricultural land is concerned. In a general sense, urban municipalities' urban planning departments have other priorities, and agricultural land always tends to be looked at in a lesser priority. In fact, in some cases it may only be seen as land waiting for development. With those sorts of entrenched attitudes and the sort of residual status of agricultural land, I think there is always a tremendous threat that it will not be safeguarded or treated in any reasonable manner.

Mr Mills: A couple of quick points in so far as my colleague's query about perpetuity is concerned. Amendment 22 says, "The city of London shall on or before the first day of March in each year...." That, to me, is perpetuity.

Professor, I'd just like to comment that the annexation is consistent with the Sewell proposals, and the solution of producing government over the area is not the same as creating one large urbanized area. Agriculture and open space will be preserved within the London boundaries by strict regulation and requirements through the official planning process, and similar development in Westminster would require more land because it is unlikely to be on services.

1720

Mr Eddy: On a point of information, Mr Chair: The city of Sarnia/town of Clearwater situation was alluded to, and I just wanted to point out the vast difference between this and that. In the case of the town of Clearwater being amalgamated with the city of Sarnia, the city of Sarnia was then brought into the Lambton county government. It became an integral part of it. There was no loss of assessment to the county ratepayers, nor to the county boards of education overall. It's quite a different situation.

Mr Sutherland: That couldn't be done here.

The Chair: Mr Troughton, did you want to reply to the PA's comment there?

Dr Troughton: Only to say that he and I would have to differ on the interpretation of the Sewell report, because I honestly think he's dead wrong in his interpretation.

The Chair: I'd like to thank you for appearing before the committee and for your comments.

GRANT HOPCROFT

The Chair: Could we have Mr Grant Hopcroft. Why we're trying to keep the tight time frame is that we have a vote coming up in the House at just about 6 o'clock. If we don't keep pushing on, we're going to wind up that we're going to miss one of the witnesses.

Mr Ferguson: Given Mr Hopcroft's vast experience in this field, perhaps he can give us the short version.

The Chair: Go ahead, Mr Hopcroft.

Mr Grant Hopcroft: I think Mr Ferguson knows me well enough to know I don't have a short version of anything, but I will do my best to keep my remarks brief. In fact, I had already tried to do that to leave lots of time for questions.

My name is Grant Hopcroft. I'm a member of the board of control of the city of London, and as well, I'm a member of the city's boundary negotiations committee. Following the announcement of the Brant report and the introduction of Bill 75, I've also been appointed chairman of the city's task force on local government restructuring, which is actively reviewing and has already made several recommendations to city council on restructuring of our council standing committees, advisory committees, and we will, in the new year, be making recommendations regarding ward boundaries and council structures as well.

Yesterday our task force introduced a number of motions to our board of control. The board of control's report, which will be going to city council on Monday, is attached as an appendix to my paper.

We will be giving further consideration to membership and terms of reference on committees dealing with important new agricultural and rural issues and also a restructuring of our advisory committees on environmental issues, as well as a standing committee of council created to deal with official plan and social planning matters in the new year. These will be the subject of further broad public consultation; we have already held two public participation meetings prior to finalizing that structure.

Let me say very clearly here today—and my presentation today is a personal one—that I am in favour of the basic thrust of Bill 75. London city council has pressed for well over a decade and presented a number of scenarios to interested municipalities on our boundaries and authorities from time to time. There was a time for discussion, there was a time for negotiation and there was a time for a local solution, but for a number of reasons a local, made-in-Middlesex solution was not possible. I'm also aware that there was yet another 11th-hour proposal brought forward in London last night.

I would urge this legislative committee to not seriously consider this last-minute alternative put forward by an ad hoc group of local politicians without the full authority of their respective councils. This proposal was on the table several years ago and was rejected at that time because it did not meet a number of key objectives, and now we are mere days away from the January 1 deadline set out in Bill 75. This last-minute effort is tantamount to Mission Control in Houston, at T minus three and counting, asking the astronauts on board to plot a complete change of course prior to taking off.

I recognize that Bill 75 has received province-wide attention amid concerns that it may represent a model for resolving boundary negotiations throughout the province. Minister Cooke has said, and it was confirmed by the parliamentary assistant, Mr Mills, today—and I believe this position—that the London model is not the model for the rest of Ontario. London and Middlesex county are unique in many ways, as Mr Eddy is well aware. The vast divergence in population is the key. Over 300,000 people call London home, while the county of Middlesex has approximately 65,000 residents. Those numbers speak volumes. I won't go into that in any more detail.

There is one deficiency in the process, as I see it—and another as I read through the amendments, which I'll get into—and it's with respect to the issue of compensation to the city of London for transition costs, which ought not to be borne by London taxpayers. Fairness in taxation is an important consideration, from my perspective. Currently, for example, the town of Westminster does not pay for OPP policing, even after attaining town status several years ago. These policing costs are approximately $700,000 annually, and the standard of service provided is much lower than that in the city of London. A 45-minute response time is not unusual.

The costs to upgrade and expand our police capabilities are particularly onerous to existing city of London taxpayers when you consider both the operating and capital costs, especially in view of the proposed tax freeze for residents of the town of Westminster, the town which froze its taxes last year and dug into its reserve funds, to make the city look even worse.

Similar types of consideration also need to be brought to bear with respect to fire services and other servicing considerations, which have been the subject of extensive consultations between ministry officials and local officials through the boundary transition process.

I'm particularly concerned, and this isn't part of my text, with respect to the proposed amendment reintroducing the suburban roads levy or an equivalent of it. I feel this was a very important part of the overall package the arbitrator put forward, particularly in light of the way that mill has been used in the past. I guess I'm gratified in part to see that there's going to be some flexibility in the application of that mill rate, because more often than not in the past it hasn't been based on any needs for suburban roads. It's been based more on how much money the mill of equalized assessment would bear.

But I point out, and this is borne out by the documents of the ministry's transitional technical coordinating committee, that there are some 46 kilometres of suburban roads that will be coming within the new city boundaries which will no longer be a suburban roads commission responsibility. Those will be a responsibility of the new city of London. In fairness, I think that needs to be considered.

Getting to one of the key points in my presentation, the legislation is really about fostering better planning and greater opportunities for economic growth in the London area. Many citizens in the areas earmarked for annexation have in fact expressed an attitude of, "Let's get on with the business at hand." In the city of London, the vast majority of elected municipal leaders are supportive of this process, are supportive of the Brant report and, with a couple of exceptions, that have been part of meetings with the county, there is support for this bill.

To the individuals who are concerned about farm land, I point out that the town of Westminster is already an urban municipality. Out of nine council members, I believe there are two, possibly three, involved in the active business of farming or agriculturally related businesses. It is the town of Westminster; it had already taken a decision to urbanize.

I think there are a number of red herrings that have been placed before the public and the members of the Legislature on the issues of protection of farm land. I take exception to some of the comments that have been made that the city is incapable of dealing with those concerns. We recognize they are very real concerns, and in fact we're not dealing with the needs of the city of London; we are dealing with the needs of the area, the need for planning and the need for coordination of services.

In fact, I think Mr Troughton's presentation in particular, in support of the 1961 annexation, seems to speak of a process of waiting until the situation is completely out of hand and the costs of retrofitting services are completely exorbitant before one takes action. I commend the government for trying to take the issue in hand and bring about some restructuring before those problems occur, so that in fact proper standards can be put in place, proper planning can take place and proper services put in place for development and growth, which are necessary to the economic well-being of our region and this province.

I'd like to cite one figure as an example of how expensive planning can be. Our 1988 report, which has been referred to, pointed out the lack of capacity to deal with some of those problems. We've estimated $2.8 million to deal just with some of the planning issues in terms of servicing studies as part of our official plan and servicing reviews, so we're not talking peanuts here.

To conclude, I think the city of London has shown a degree of excellence in terms of the planning that has taken place since the last annexation. I think the densities of the areas that have developed after annexation of those 1961 lands into the city, I think, reflect densities that are appropriate, given an urban context. Now is not the time for more piecemeal planning and short-term solutions such as the 1988 deal was. We have the components in place. Bill 75 can make them a reality that will benefit the entire region.

Thank you for the opportunity to appear today.

There is an appendix dealing with conservation authority matters, which I won't go into at this point. It is attached to my report, and I would just urge the committee to take those considerations into account, by way of regulation or otherwise. There are certain unfairnesses that will occur as a result of the legislation if further amendments aren't brought to bear.

The Chair: Thank you. We'll start off with the official opposition.

1730

Mr Eddy: Thank you, Controller Hopcroft, for appearing before the committee to give us the advantage of your insight, your experience and your knowledge. It's very helpful.

I know you would want to be fair and would admit, I hope, that the reason for the quick response of the OPP within the town of Westminster is simply because the OPP detachment is stationed very close to the town of Westminster, with Highways 401 and 402 right there. That does help substantially, I suspect.

I thank you for the conservation matters. I will look with interest and read those. I'd like to look at them.

The dictate of the government is to transfer 64,000 acres, the entire town of Westminster and some other municipalities adjoining the city of London. I believe 7% of that, some 4,000—why does the city want 57,000 acres of permanently zoned class 1 to 3 agricultural land? Why would they want that if it can't be developed? The city of London needs and wants, I think, land for development.

Mr Grandmaitre: It can't be developed for now.

Mr Hopcroft: I think the key answer to your question, Mr Eddy, is that we need to do proper planning. Many of the annexations in the past have been piecemeal; they've had to be planned in a piecemeal way. Putting a larger tract of land within the city's planning boundaries does allow proper wide-ranging and broad-based servicing and planning studies to be done.

Mr Eddy: It's a matter of planning for services.

Mr Hopcroft: It's a matter of planning for services. It's a matter of planning for growth. It's a matter of allocating where development will take place. For the first time, with this amount of land coming with the city boundaries, I think the city is really, truly going to have to deal with agricultural and rural concerns in a permanent way rather than treating it as land that's just there to be gobbled up until the next annexation.

I see a benefit from that, because the city will have to recognize in a very permanent way, in a real way, that there are going to be lands within the city of London that, for our lifetimes and probably the lifetimes of our children, are going to remain in active agricultural production.

Mr Eddy: Please don't—

The Chair: I've got to cut you off; I'm sorry. Mr Murdoch.

Mr Murdoch: I'll continue on, then. I mean, you talk with a forked tongue; there's no doubt. You're saying in one way you're going to service all this area, yet you're not going to use agricultural land. Give us a break. Are you going to use the agricultural land for agriculture or are you going to service it for development? Which are you going to do?

Mr Hopcroft: Mr Murdoch, you've known me long enough to know that I don't speak with a forked tongue—

Mr Murdoch: You just did to Mr Eddy, and I am questioning that.

Mr Hopcroft: —or whatever euphemism you want to put on it. I am suggesting to you that we recognize that there are lands that will come within the city under Bill 75 that will remain agricultural in perpetuity. They will be designated as such.

Mr Murdoch: Until they're serviced.

Mr Hopcroft: They will not be serviced. They will remain agricultural. But it does allow us to properly plan without having the constraints of a boundary that may be half a concession or one concession.

Right now we have services—we have pipes that go right to the edge of the city; we have streets that end at the edge of the city—in anticipation that the city will grow beyond those boundaries. I'm suggesting that that sort of piecemeal planning, based on ifs, ands and buts of whether that land will be annexed in the future, won't be part of the equation any longer.

Mr Murdoch: You've basically said the people who had the land before couldn't plan and you have to annex it to plan it. That's what you're saying.

Mr Hopcroft: I'm not suggesting that the people who were there couldn't plan. I'm suggesting that there were financial constraints in terms of their ability to properly service. The inability to properly service meant there was a wastage of land because of lack of urban services. You know as well as I that to properly provide for services and growth without sewers, without water, gobbles up land at an incredibly inefficient rate.

Mr Murdoch: One quick one before he goes: There's going to be a compensation package from London to Middlesex. Is London prepared to pay the full cost and the Ontario taxpayers won't have to pay any of that? Are you guaranteeing us that, as a controller?

Mr Hopcroft: I am suggesting to you, and I made it part of my presentation, that in fairness to London taxpayers, there should be compensation to London taxpayers for some aspects of the annexation.

Mr Murdoch: From whom?

Mr Hopcroft: From the province of Ontario.

Mr Murdoch: That means everybody's going to pay for London, then? Is that what you're saying?

Mr Hopcroft: Well—

Mr Murdoch: Okay, that's fine. I just want that on the record.

Mr Hopcroft: The province, in view of the commitment it has made to the residents of the county in terms of the tax impact they will suffer, particularly when you consider that there's been free policing in Westminster that shouldn't have been free for at least the last three or four years, that an element of fairness to London taxpayers should require some transitional assistance. We're not looking for permanent assistance; we are looking for transitional assistance to carry us through the difficult period of growth that we're going to be dealing with.

Mr Winninger: It's always a treat to go last, Mr Chair, because all the good questions have already been asked. I do have a couple, however. Certainly, as chair of the task force on restructuring and as a member of the board of control and a member of the boundary negotiation committee, even though you don't speak for the city of London, your views and opinions carry a considerable degree of weight.

I'm wondering, first of all, what safeguards the city envisages to prevent the widespread urban sprawl that Professor Troughton referred to. I'm wondering, secondly, whether you disagree with Warden Gare's position that coservicing agreements would have been appropriate in this instance.

Mr Hopcroft: To answer the last question first, I think the warden's suggestion and concept of coservicing simply is not workable in many ways, particularly given some of the new planning and environmental constraints we all know we're going to be facing as a result of the deliberations of the Sewell commission and many of the other reviews going on. That is not to suggest we, as a city, are not prepared to cooperate with the county. The landfill site, I think, is an obvious example where we can and will work out a local solution in terms of access to the landfill site, but to suggest that city taxpayers should be paying for extension of services or capacity that would be used to the benefit of taxpayers outside the city, to me, there's an element of a lack of fairness there.

On the first question you asked, which is with respect to the city's intentions with respect to protection of those agricultural concerns and our committee structures, if I recall the question correctly—

Mr Winninger: It addressed urban sprawl.

Mr Hopcroft: Urban sprawl? We will be dealing with that through our official plan review. The minister, in the act, has set forth almost extraordinary powers in terms of an ability to direct that if he feels we're getting off the rails. We feel that, given the servicing issues that are going to have to be dealt with, the planning issues that are going to have to be dealt with and the structures we're going to put in place in terms of our new environmental advisory committees, a technical advisory committee on natural areas, where we're looking at creating inventories of environmentally sensitive areas, that we are going to ensure that the horse doesn't get out of the barn too early, that in fact it doesn't get out at all, by properly identifying areas that need to be protected, by properly identifying prime farm land for protection and directing growth away from it to the extent possible.

Clearly we recognize, and I think municipalities across this province recognize, that growth at the type of low densities that has been apparent across the province in the past is not going to continue; it's simply too expensive. I suggest to you that the city recognizes that. We have infilling policies within our official planning now that provide for intensification in already developed areas. You're not going to see just reckless, galloping growth and sprawl over good agricultural lands. We recognize a responsibility there, and that's not going to happen.

We intend to have an advisory committee or some form of committee on agriculture. We haven't determined yet whether it will be an advisory committee or a standing committee of council, but we are committed to a process of consultation over at least the next month to ensure we get input and properly consult with the agricultural interests. I'd like to thank Irene Mathyssen for chairing a meeting about a week and a half ago between representatives of the federation, the city, the county and the town of Westminster in an effort to try to resolve some of those concerns. While I would be premature in suggesting there is consensus now, I'm confident that some form of consensus can be reached to ensure that there's meaningful input on those issues.

Mr Mills: Thank you very much, Mr Hopcroft. I heard your concerns about compensation. I can tell you that negotiations are continuing on compensation issues and a solution is being sought that will minimize the impact on the taxpayers. That's assured.

Mr Hopcroft: Thank you very much. I'm very pleased to hear that.

The Chair: Thank you for appearing before the committee.

1740

LONDON CHAMBER OF COMMERCE

The Chair: Would Mr Ed Holder of the London Chamber of Commerce come forward, please; the other gentleman is Mr Frank Berry, I take it. We have 20 minutes all together, until 6 o'clock, unless the bell rings. Sir, you might as well start because of the time factor.

Mr Edwin A. Holder: The London Chamber of Commerce appreciates the opportunity to make its views known to the committee. We're certainly pleased to do that tonight.

If I may tell you, the position of the London Chamber of Commerce is very clear. We support the passage of Bill 75 to take effect January 1, 1993.

The London Chamber of Commerce, along with other interested parties, has had several opportunities to participate in hearings convened to discuss the aspects and implications of annexation in the greater London area.

In July 1991, the London Chamber of Commerce provided to Mr John Brant, arbitrator, a position paper outlining the principles necessary in reaching a final boundary adjustment solution. Our position paper outlined a number of points of interest and concerns to the greater London business community regarding annexation. A copy of that report is included for your consideration in my package tonight.

On February 18, 1992, the London Chamber of Commerce made representations to Mr Brant to advise that the chief negotiator's report of January 1992 was generally consistent with the London chamber's statement of principles. The chief negotiator's report effectively ruled out two-tier regional government and confirmed that airport lands and the Highway 401-402 corridor should be within the urban municipality's jurisdiction.

We applauded the program of public consultation that had been launched. On September 24, 1992, the London Chamber of Commerce again made representation at public hearings in London hosted by Minister David Cooke. At that time, we made a number of points, and again for your purposes I have also included that position paper in your package tonight.

The thrust of our comments was the London Chamber of Commerce's support and commitment to legislation which created and maintained employment in the greater London area. We also spoke about the positive reaction from the business community in greater London and the ability, as a result of Bill 75, to contribute to economic revitalization and job creation.

At that time, we also expressed concern about the potential for stunted economic growth in our region due to moratoriums on all development at or immediately outside the city's boundaries until the new official plan was prepared to cover all of the land.

We were confident at that meeting of the minister's assurance that greater local autonomy would be considered on the issue of serviced development on our existing boundaries. With that assurance, it is incumbent on the business community to initiate and deliver well-planned, environmentally responsible and economically stimulating development for the greater London area.

To provide some history—I'm sure you've heard much of this over these hearings—the boundary adjustment process formally, although not initially, was started by the council of the city of London in January 1988. Through the Ministry of Municipal Affairs, local governments were given the opportunity to come with their own local solution to boundary adjustment and associated issues of servicing. A deadline of December 31, 1990, was extended to April 26, 1991. No local solution was found, however.

Ultimately, the report of the greater London area arbitrator, Co-opportunity, Success through Co-operative Independence, was released in April 1992. It was clear from the arbitrator's report that what was necessary was a long-term response for growth and economic development. It was determined that an expanded city of London was the most appropriate means of delivering the service and infrastructure requirements necessary for our area's long-term economic needs.

The analysis has been extensive. The public hearings process has been considerable. Most parties have come to terms with the decision as recommended by the arbitrator and put into legislative format by the minister. With all of the actions taken to date, it would be irresponsible to speak in terms of other thrusts and other ideas that would serve only to delay the important steps necessary for economic growth in our area.

We wish to make it clear that the solution developed for the greater London area is just that: for the greater London area. It would be inappropriate for this chamber of commerce to comment on what is right for other jurisdictions, but this is right for London, for our area, and it makes good economic sense.

As we press on with our January 1, 1993, time frame, it is important to acknowledge that there must be fairness in dealing with the important issues in the county of Middlesex, and we must also look to the greater good of citizens in greater London. To delay or further amend boundaries at this very late date would be a disservice to our citizens and to the business community.

It has long been our view that a leader's role is to lead. You have shown that leadership and you have the opportunity to maintain that leadership role and carry on with the successful resolution of Bill 75. The citizens of greater London and our business community deserve no less.

Mr Frank R. Berry: I might add to Mr Holder's comments, Mr Chair. I want to pick up on two or three items in the legislation which the chamber has taken a great interest in for many years—probably, as Ed mentioned, prior to even the 1988 formal submission.

First of all, with respect to the public utilities commission, we have been on record for quite a long time as being in favour of the city taking over at least the parks and recreation component. To us, it made no sense to have a separate elected body in the city running a function which was clearly a municipal function.

With respect to some of the planning issues, Ed has already referred to a couple, but we've had some concerns with the wording of the proposed legislation, Bill 75, with respect to provincial authority and provincial control over the official plan process. We have been reassured—I'm prepared to take Minister Cooke's word for it—that the province will act in a very pragmatic manner with respect to approval for development in an appropriate and timely manner.

We're satisfied with the provisions of Bill 75, with the protection that's built in there for agricultural land over the long term. We think, again, it's a very fair and a very pragmatic approach to that.

With respect to the buffer issue, we are in favour. We know it's not specifically a part of the legislation. The minister may establish a buffer zone. We would urge the minister to give that very serious consideration.

One of the very major problems, if you look at cities and municipalities throughout the province, is the urban sprawl immediately beyond the cities' boundaries. Controller Hopcroft referred to some of that earlier. The buffer zone will give that protection; it will make things a little easier to handle.

Finally, in terms of the development charges reference in the legislation, we have in the past urged the city to keep development levies at an appropriate level. We recognize, however, that with the expansion, with the need to extend these services now into areas beyond the existing city boundary, development charges will have to be looked at again, and we're fully prepared to support a reasonable approach to financing the infrastructure development on development levies.

The Chair: Thank you. We'll start off with the third party. Mr Murdoch.

Mr Murdoch: In your presentation you mentioned that this was good for the people of London. Are you concerned about the people of Middlesex also and their concerns? I noticed you didn't mention that.

Mr Holder: I think it would be fair to say, from our perspective, not only are we absolutely concerned about their interests, I wonder by the implication of the question if you're suggesting that we are trying to do otherwise. I don't think that's a fair presumption.

Mr Murdoch: No, I just noticed you didn't mention it and I thought maybe you'd forgotten and I wondered if you were.

Mr Holder: No, we are not.

Mr Murdoch: You are not concerned with them?

Mr Holder: I beg your pardon.

Mr Murdoch: No, I think we got that mixed—

Mr Holder: No, I think that's quite rude. In fact, we are quite concerned about the citizens within the whole jurisdiction that's responsible for this legislation, sir.

Mr Murdoch: All right, and then they're going to annex 96,000 acres. A lot of that land is farm land. I notice you didn't really say too much about whether you're concerned that some of the best farm land in Ontario may be gobbled up. It's going to be serviced, and what's going to happen then? From what I've heard, I don't think London is going to go into the business of being a rural municipality. It is a city.

It was a good presentation. I just wondered if you had anything to say about the protection of farm land in there.

1750

Mr Berry: If I may comment on that, sir, the farm land is not going to be gobbled up. The London area is going to grow regardless of where political boundaries are drawn on the map.

Mr Murdoch: That's true.

Mr Berry: Would you rather see that farm land consumed by rural subdivisions and septic tanks at a rate of three to five units per acre, as opposed to 15 to 30 units per acre? I suggest to you, the continuation of the status quo will gobble up prime farm land at a far faster rate.

Mr Murdoch: Obviously, you're saying then, this is a better way to get rid of farm land.

Mr Berry: We're not getting rid of farm land.

Mr Murdoch: You just said, which way do you want to do it? You said you want to do it this way.

Mr Berry: Excuse me, sir. I would much rather—

Mr Sutherland: Come on.

Mr Winner: Ask a fair question.

Mr Murdoch: I asked a fair question. He answered it.

Mr Berry: If I may answer the question, farm land will be protected for a much longer time when development in the London region is on full urban services.

Mr Murdoch: It's still going to be gobbled up. It's going to the city of London. London is not a rural municipality. You said you didn't want to see it done by rural development; you want it done by urban development. The same way, we're going to lose farm land, and that's what the concern of a lot of people is, because it's some of the best farm land.

Mr Berry: At a much slower rate, sir.

Mr Murdoch: Yes, okay. It's a slower rate. It's still going to be gone, and once farm land is gone, it's gone. A slower rate is better and I guess that's what you have.

I notice you say that you're impressed with the way the government is forging ahead with Bill 75, and you give a lot of credit to the government for doing this. I notice at some other times there are other bills that you're not so concerned with, that sometimes you come to us and say, "Well, they don't want them to do this." I just wondered how all of a sudden the chamber of commerce got so much confidence in the government that it can do something so wonderful.

Mr Mills: Well, naturally, of course. Don't be so negative.

Mr Holder: Actually, sir, if you assisted in passing the bylaw we have regarding your decision as well—and I'm not trying to be trite by the response—I suggest to you it's like dealing with any government group; there are some things that we are in agreement with what governments do and some things that governments don't do. It is not our role to be the cheerleader for the government of the day, whether it be at the local, provincial or federal level, and when it does things right we think that it should be acknowledged, and when it does things wrong, as members around this table will note, we're not shy to tell it either.

Mr Murdoch: Okay, that's fine.

The Chair: I know you're not used to severing farm land but only the Niagara Escarpment Commission lands.

Mr Sutherland: I was just going to make some comments, and we all know Mr Murdoch is an expert on effective and efficient planning in rural areas, and I know he was glad to share his advice here. I just wanted to make an additional comment that I hope both members of the opposition will take back to their party leaders: the realization here that we've had a presentation that indicates that this government is being pro-business, and these constant attacks on the government being anti-business may not always be appropriate.

Can I just ask the chamber one other thing: Sorry, your official title, is it the London Chamber or is it the London and District? Do you have members who are actually outside the current boundaries of the city, who are out in the county?

Mr Holder: Absolutely. The formal title is the London Chamber of Commerce.

Mr Sutherland: Okay. London and District?

Mr Holder: No, sir.

Mr Sutherland: Just London.

Mr Holder: London Chamber of Commerce.

Mr Sutherland: Okay, all right.

Mr Will Ferguson (Kitchener): I just have one very quick question. As you know, people from the county have expressed a lot of concern about urban development of prime agricultural land. It's been suggested on a number of occasions, of course, that this can be protected through the official plan. Of course, as you well know, in the official plan that exists in the city of London under the Planning Act currently, it's up to the local municipality to interpret the official plan. I can understand the concerns there, because I know in some municipalities the official plan has been interpreted in very strange ways.

What kind of guarantee do you think we ought to be giving the county population to ensure that the official plan will only be interpreted in a very strict and fair manner? Would you agree that we ought to be enshrining in this piece of legislation some sort of guarantee that it is a pretty strict interpretation? I have seen lines being drawn and pulled over, lines and boundaries defined where nobody sees them on a map etc. I'm sure you're aware of that as well.

Mr Berry: I think, if I can answer that, the official plan, obviously, of a municipality is only as good as the strength of the resolution of that duly elected municipal government to enforce it or to ensure it's implemented.

In the provisions of Bill 75, specifically with respect to the role of the ministry, which is somewhat unique—it's a new departure, certainly in my experience, in planning and engineering in the province—at least in the initial stages will go a long way to ensuring that the official plan doesn't become just papered on the wall and then totally ignored afterwards. As I said early in my part of the presentation, we have a great deal of confidence in the statements of the minister with respect to carrying out the objectives of the annexation process.

Mr Holder: If I might add to that as well, we feel it's important that current members from the county participate in the official plan. May I also say that our belief is that having a single jurisdiction to control development and all that goes into the implications of an official plan would be preferable to what we consider as piecemeal development, with the various municipalities competing for assessments and other aspects of their tax base. Certainly, from the standpoint of the official plan, we think they should have a more comprehensive program under one single jurisdiction.

Mr Eddy: I have to follow up. You'll always find municipalities competing for industry and commerce right across this province, with the help of the government to hurry it along in some places more than others.

My only question is about the London PUC. I wondered if the members realize or feel, I guess, that it's better for the government to impose the dissolution of the London PUC, a body elected at large, or maybe by wards, by the citizens of the city of London and indeed established by the citizens of the city of London. Many PUCs were established by plebiscite at the municipality.

It's had several studies, but it seemed to me the city of London council voted just three or four years ago and the vote was to keep the PUC. It is rather a strange organization. I was amazed, when I arrived to work in the city of London, that there was a PUC that had so many responsibilities. I said, "That's the way city council or the city people must want it." I don't know; it's a locally elected body and it must be under the statutes, the Power Corporation Act and maybe by plebiscite.

My position on the whole thing is that it's an internal city of London problem and I think maybe it should deal with it, but maybe you don't agree with that. Do you want to comment on that one?

Mr Berry: Yes. In some respects I think your point, Mr Eddy, is well taken; it's a body. However, to say it was the way it was chosen or the way the people of the city of London wanted it, I think, is perhaps a moot point.

The PUC started in 1911 as the hydro-electric provider and from there grew just like Topsy. It kept adding little pieces, for whatever reason. London's always had a reputation here at Queen's Park of doing things differently. I don't know why, but we have. We always do things differently. The PUC grew into a rather unique form, different from any other municipality in the country.

I think inevitably the PUC's functions, other than those provided for by statute, such as the power supply, would have been taken over by the city, regardless of whatever else happened. You referred to a council decision a few years ago. You're probably as well aware as I am that that's come up before council several times, every so often, because there is always the concern: "Why are we doing it this way? Is this the most efficient way to deliver services?" Like everything else that's been entrenched in tradition, history and everything, it's difficult. It's like the Gordian knot: You can fiddle around with it and try to untie it until somebody comes along with a sword and, there, the problem's solved.

Mr Holder: We'd like to stress as well, it's our view that the services currently provided by this PUC will certainly not mean, by virtue of the change, any less service to the citizens of London and, may I also say, to those residents who are in Middlesex county who would be brought under the city's jurisdiction.

We also have to believe that there are going to be efficiencies. From a business perspective, where we and governments and other organizations are trying to be so mindful of dollars spent, you can't help but believe that a variety of services that are currently provided can certainly be financially benefited by virtue of the amalgamation.

I can tell you that the intention certainly is that no one will lose his or her job as a result of this; that's clear. Through attrition and good planning, I think it's very clear, even when you look to the extent of the new city engineer for the city of London. Based on the recent retirement of Darcy Dutton, our city engineer, that's been taken over by the PUC's chief engineer. We think that's good planning. So to the point that there will be efficiencies associated with this, that's good for business and certainly good for government as well.

The Chair: Thank you, Mr Holder and Mr Berry, for appearing before this committee.

Mr Eddy: I want to add my thanks for the presentation and the information.

Mr Ferguson: I would like to add my thanks as well. I just wanted to mention that I don't think any party is pure in this hearing or this process, before anybody starts throwing stones, let alone boulders. The Conservative Party has members who don't support this bill, we have members who don't support this bill and the Liberal Party was suggesting, when we were in the fight to preserve agricultural land in Ottawa, that we ought not to be in that battle.

The Chair: I'd also like to say to the committee members that there's a letter here from Mr Stewart McColl.

Everyone should have a copy. There were some press releases from the London region that were sent to my office and a press release also from the London-Middlesex coalition. There's a package there. There are responses to the questions from Irene Mathyssen this morning. If you take a look in your package, they're all there.

This committee will be adjourned until 10 o'clock Thursday, whatever date. We'll proceed with the subcommittee meeting right now.

The committee adjourned at 1803.

ERRATUM

No.	Page	Column	Line	Should read:
F-9	F-145	2	44

Mr Otterman: I would just comment that when you say the books are cooked, I think you've got to be careful of that, too. It's a little generic. If you're talking about the budget and the estimates therein, fine.

Mr Stockwell: That's what I'm talking about: They're cooked.

Mr Otterman: But if you're talking about the financial statements of this province, they haven't been cooked.

Mr Stockwell: That's what I'm talking about, the budget: The numbers are cooked.

Mr Otterman: Okay.

CONTENTS

Thursday 29 October 1992

London-Middlesex Act, 1992, Bill 75	F-151
Ministry of Municipal Affairs	F-152
Brian D. Riddell, assistant deputy minister, municipal operations
Taras Myhal, negotiator, municipal boundaries branch
Zdravko Weing, senior planner, plans administration branch
Dr Kathleen M. Chinnery, senior economist, municipal finance branch
County of Middlesex	F-166
Frank Gare, warden
Michael Troughton	F-173
Grant Hopcroft	F-175
London Chamber of Commerce	F-178
Edwin A. Holder, chairman of the board
Frank R. Berry, board member
Erratum	F-182

STANDING COMMITTEE ON FINANCE AND ECONOMIC AFFAIRS

- Chair / Président: Hansen, Ron (Lincoln ND)
- Vice-Chair / Vice-Président: Sutherland, Kimble (Oxford ND)
 - Caplan, Elinor (Oriole L)
- *Carr, Gary (Oakville South/-Sud PC)
 - Christopherson, David (Hamilton Centre ND)
- *Jamison, Norm (Norfolk ND)
 - Kwinter, Monte (Wilson Heights L)
 - Phillips, Gerry (Scarborough-Agincourt L)
 - Sterling, Norman W. (Carleton PC)
 - Ward, Brad (Brantford ND)
 - Ward, Margery (Don Mills ND)
 - Wiseman, Jim (Durham West/-Ouest ND)

Substitutions / Membres remplaçants:

- *Cooper, Mike (Kitchener-Wilmot ND) for Mr Christopherson
- *Coppen, Shirley, (Niagara South/-Sud ND) for Mr Wiseman
- *Cunningham, Dianne (London North/-Nord PC) for Mr Sterling
- *Eddy, Ron (Brant-Haldimand L) for Mr Phillips
- *Ferguson, Will, (Kitchener ND) for Mr Christopherson
- *Grandmaître, Bernard (Ottawa East/-Est L) for Mr Kwinter
- *Mathysen, Irene (Middlesex ND) for Mr Ward
- *Mills, Gordon (Durham East/-Est ND) for Ms Ward
- *Winninger, David (London South/-Sud ND) for Mr Wiseman

*In attendance / présents

Also taking part / Autres participants et participantes:

- Klopp, Paul (Huron ND)
- Murdoch, Bill (Grey PC)

Clerk / Greffier: Decker, Todd

Staff / Personnel: Campbell, Elaine, research officer, Legislative Research Service

F-11

F-11

ISSN 1180-4386

Legislative Assembly of Ontario

Second session, 35th Parliament

Official Report of Debates (Hansard)

Thursday 5 November 1992

Standing committee on finance and economic affairs

London-Middlesex Act, 1992

Chair: Ron Hansen
Clerk: Todd Decker

Published by the Legislative Assembly of Ontario
Editor of Debates: Don Cameron

Assemblée législative de l'Ontario

Deuxième session, 35^e législature

Journal des débats (Hansard)

Jeudi 5 novembre 1992

Comité permanent des finances et des affaires économiques

Loi de 1992 sur
London et Middlesex

Président : Ron Hansen
Greffier : Todd Decker

Publié par l'Assemblée législative de l'Ontario
Éditeur des débats : Don Cameron

Table of Contents

Table of Contents for proceedings reported in this issue appears on the outside back cover, together with a list of committee members and others taking part.

Index inquiries

Reference to a cumulative index of previous issues may be obtained by calling the Hansard Reporting Service indexing staff at 416-325-7410 or 325-7411.

Subscriptions

Subscription information may be obtained from: Sessional Subscription Service, Publications Ontario, Ministry of Government Services, 50 Grosvenor Street, Toronto, Ontario, M7A 1N8. Phone 416-326-5310, 326-5311 or toll-free 1-800-668-9938.

Table des matières

La table des matières des séances rapportées dans ce numéro se trouve sur la couverture à l'arrière de ce fascicule, ainsi qu'une liste des membres du comité et d'autres personnes ayant participé.

Renseignements sur l'index

Il existe un index cumulatif des numéros précédents. Les renseignements qu'il contient sont à votre disposition par téléphone auprès des employés de l'index du Journal des débats au 416-325-7410 ou 325-7411.

Abonnements

Pour les abonnements, veuillez prendre contact avec le Service d'abonnement parlementaire, Publications Ontario, ministère des Services gouvernementaux, 50 rue Grosvenor, Toronto (Ontario) M7A 1N8. Par téléphone : 416-326-5310, 326-5311 ou, sans frais : 1-800-668-9938.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

STANDING COMMITTEE ON FINANCE AND ECONOMIC AFFAIRS

Thursday 5 November 1992

The committee met at 1008 in committee room 1.

LONDON-MIDDLESEX ACT, 1992

LOI DE 1992 SUR LONDON ET MIDDLESEX

Resuming consideration of Bill 75, An Act respecting Annexations to the City of London and to certain municipalities in the County of Middlesex / Loi concernant les annexions faites à la cité de London et à certaines municipalités du comté de Middlesex.

The Chair (Mr Ron Hansen): Good morning. I'd like to call the standing committee on finance and economic affairs to order. It being Thursday, November 5, we're going to be on Bill 75, An Act respecting Annexations to the City of London and to certain municipalities in the County of Middlesex.

CITY OF LONDON

The Chair: This morning, the first witness is Mr Tom Gosnell, mayor of the city of London. Your worship, would you identify your colleagues also for the purposes of Hansard? You may begin. You have one hour, until 11 o'clock.

Mr Tom Gosnell: Thank you, Mr Chairman. Joining me today in putting forward the city of London's presentation is our deputy mayor, Jack Burghardt, and Councillor Paul Yorke. Our city administrator, John Fleming, is also here to answer any questions that you or the committee may have for any of us.

At the outset this morning, let me say that the issue of boundary adjustment or annexation has been on the table in the London-Middlesex area for over a decade. Deputy Mayor Burghardt, myself and, over the years, various members of city council and city administration have been involved in open, extensive, intensive negotiations that bore little fruit in the way of a made-in-London-Middlesex solution.

We, as a committee representing London, come to these hearings not only to demonstrate the need for boundary adjustment but to point out the substantial amount of work that is already under way to facilitate the future.

Following our brief, we look forward to answering any of the questions you have on these issues.

The city of London views annexation as the key issue facing both London and Middlesex. Bill 75 will have a dramatic and positive impact on the development not only of London but the entire region.

With all due respect, the real issue before you is the question of urbanization: orderly urban growth to meet the economic, environmental and social wellbeing not only of the city of London but the entire London-Middlesex area. A wide range of sensitive issues from land use to environmental controls to social planning must be addressed so that the citizens of London and our neighbouring municipipalities clearly have a vision for tomorrow. A shortsighted, piecemeal solution is simply not adequate.

London firmly stands behind Bill 75's proposal for a one-tier government system responsible for a large urban area, for several reasons, including a reduced cost in delivery of service and duplication often found in two-tier systems.

Bill 75 accomplishes a broad spectrum of answers to serious concerns. It places lands having the greatest potential for industrial development, like those abutting the Highways 401, 402 and 100 corridors, as well as the London airport area, under the city's control, thereby improving viability of servicing for these areas and taking full advantage of the city's economic development services and programs. We believe London is in the best position to provide services efficiently and reap the benefit of economies of scale necessary in this competitive marketplace.

In fact, in recent months the positive impact of Bill 75 has already come to the forefront. Dimona Aircraft of Austria has purchased a vacant manufacturing facility and will begin the construction of light aircraft, hopefully within the year. This plant requires municipal water, sewers and services to become operational, services that only the city has the wherewithal to provide. Without boundary adjustment, this facility and the potential for literally hundreds of jobs and millions of dollars in investment would have been lost, not only for London but our entire region and Ontario as well. It is the confidence of investors like Dimona that built this province. We simply cannot lose sight of that in an economy that is facing unprecedented challenges from a global market.

Annexation—the clear delineation of the urban and the rural—including the buffer zone that Bill 75 creates while new official plans are being developed, will eliminate much of the intermunicipal planning disputes and competing interests for development by placing the urbanizing areas along the city's current boundary under the city's control. Further, it provides greater consistencies in policies, procedures, permit fees and development charges in the area subject to economic development pressure. We believe that too will maintain investor confidence in our area.

Boundary adjustment also enhances the city's ability to implement transportation and transit planning to improve the efficiency of the movement of goods and people within, through and around the urban area.

The passage of Bill 75 should facilitate the extension of city sewer and water services within our existing capacity to accommodate development in substantial portions of the boundary expansion area, thereby expediting the creation of growth opportunities, investment and jobs.

The strategy also incorporates all of the drainage areas that are serviceable through the extension of existing city sewer systems as identified in the pollution control planning study currently being carried out by the city of London through McLaren Engineering. City water services can also be extended to these areas.

Bill 75 provides sufficient lands suitable for urban development to provide for a minimum of 20 years' growth and a potential population growth of 100,000 and more, while allowing for a reasonable element of choices among sites with various locational attributes.

Mr Jack Burghardt: We strongly believe that every measure must be taken to protect the environment. Bill 75 avoids urban sprawl and improves the efficiency of land use by providing for development on full municipal services at appropriate densities in an orderly sequence of development. It reduces the competition for assessment growth and the resulting potential for the introduction of urban uses at inappropriate locations. And Bill 75 provides the optimum solution for existing and potential environmental problems associated with the inadequacies of private waste disposal systems in the Lambeth and Hyde Park areas with an extension of city sewer systems.

Another important factor is that it will allow for the creation of affordable housing opportunities in all parts of the urban area.

Bill 75 recognizes that London has an appropriate policy framework and planning capacity to provide for the protection of natural features such as flood plains, ravines and steep slopes, wetlands, woodlots and other areas of ecological significance. Designated open space systems or areas that extend to the current boundary, such as the Medway Valley, Meadowlily Woods, Warbler Woods, Westminster Ponds complex and the north branch of the Thames River Valley, can be appropriately extended into the annexed areas.

The city of London will provide for the protection of farm land and rural character in the areas not required for development through the adoption of appropriate official plan policies. Such policies would require the orderly staging of development and infrastructure expansion, area planning to achieve reasonable densities of development, and the adoption of consent policies and zoning for the rural areas that will discourage non-farm-related land uses and land severances.

The orderly management of growth within the urban area will discourage land speculation and encourage the retention of land in agricultural production.

Some basic facts simply cannot be overlooked:

The city is the only municipality within the greater London area that has the financial resources to undertake the cost of the major infrastructure projects necessary to achieve effective growth management and environmental protection.

The extension of city services to the serviceable portions of the proposed amalgamation and annexation areas is the appropriate form of infrastructure investment to expedite economic growth.

Amalgamation of the city and Westminster avoids the problem of assessment loss to the town and provides some cost saving by eliminating the duplication of some administrative functions.

Bill 75 will result in a more equitable distribution of social program costs across the whole of the urban area.

The assessment loss to the surrounding townships is kept at manageable levels by not expanding the boundary to include communities such as Arva, Thorndale, Dorchester and Delaware.

As deputy mayor of the city of London, I'm also charged with the responsibility of being budget chairman. During the past few months and in conjunction with ministry staff, our city administrator John Fleming has presented our council with a sketch of the potential impact of Bill 75 on London ratepayers.

In 1993 the service levels to be provided in the merged areas will be the same as what was provided in 1992. Our research indicates that the costs of providing these same service levels in the merged areas in 1993 will not be significantly greater than what was incurred in 1992.

As a major consideration, council will have to determine the appropriate levels of service for the annexed areas and the rate at which improvements will be phased in. It should also be emphasized that any capital costs will be financed in accordance with the city's financing ratio.

A chart prepared by our city administration and provincial staff is attached for your review as part of our brief. Taking into account the proposed compensation package to the annexed municipalities and transition assistance from the province, the bottom line reveals a 2.7% increase in costs directly attributable to annexation. On an average property tax bill in the city of London that translates to $23.40. That quite clearly dispels rumours of taxes doubling overnight as a result of annexation. And those figures reflect a level of service to annexed areas that in many instances is beyond levels enjoyed today.

The figure of $23.40 reflects the long-term fiscal responsibility and planning demonstrated by the city of London for many years. As a matter of fact, we have already received reports from our various department heads that show the figure of $23.40 can be pared down.

Londoners already enjoy the lowest municipal taxes of any city over 100,000 in Ontario. With annexation, that position will only strengthen.

Mr Paul Yorke: Mr Chairman, it would be remiss of us if we did not also mention the extensive work that is already under way in an effort to facilitate the January 1 deadline for boundary adjustment. Various committees, boards, commissions and councils have come together to begin the planning necessary to bring about as smooth a transition as possible.

Council has approved this week the mailing of offers of employment to all those affected by Bill 75, subject only to the bill becoming law. We have done that because we believe that staff affected by the bill deserve some certainty about the future of their employment and their careers. The task force on local government restructuring has already made several substantial motions which have been adopted by council.

The interim boundary transition committee, established by the London city council, is well into reviews of matters concerning not only social planning, but emergency services, human resources, financing, the buffer zone and the public utilities commission amalgamation.

1020

In the area of that amalgamation a coordinating group, consisting of senior city officials and the PUC, has been established to work out the details of the appointed hydro-electric commission.

Several resource groups have been established and are currently meeting to:

(a) verify the services that have been identified as being provided;

(b) determine the recommended allocation of services, whether to the hydro-electric commission or the city, or whether they are shared and delivered by the hydro-electric commission or the city;

(c) identify staff required for each service.

It should also be noted that the city council supports the concept of an appointed hydro-electric commission, for reasons I can elaborate upon later, if you wish.

As well as those efforts, city staff and Mayor Gosnell have been actively involved in ongoing boundary transition meetings involving technical and related matters with elected and administrative representatives from all municipalities affected by annexation. Under the guidance of ministry staff, those sessions have produced excellent results.

There has also been a great deal of conjecture about land use and planning by the city of London within the lands annexed in 1961. We have the evidence for you that demonstrates responsible densities and population projections.

First and foremost, London compares favourably to other municipalities. The built residential density in London is comparable to other municipalities: for example, London, 16.4 units per hectare; Kitchener, 14.4; Etobicoke, 14.1; Windsor, 17.9.

London has provided for higher-density residential development. The planned residential density for new areas in London is even greater than the present residential development densities: in our new subdivision to the south-east, Jackson, 28.6 units per hectare; for Kilally Road in the northeast, 25.6 units per hectare.

London acquired already developed residential areas in the 1961 annexation that had low-density residential development. Most of them were on septic systems. Some areas that were already developed at the time of the 1961 annexation at generally low densities were Byron, 7.9 units per hectare; Oakridge, 6.2 units per hectare; and, Orchard Park, 5.7 units per hectare.

Since 1961, new development has been at higher densities than existed in the annexed areas. The residential density in annexed areas of London developed since 1961 exceeds the density of annexed areas that were developed prior to 1961: in Stoneybrook to the north, 15.4 units; Westmount to the southwest, 18.9 units; White Oaks, 24.3 units per hectare.

It should also be stressed that the recent development activity outside the city has been at lower densities than development within the city. The residential density in new subdivisions in areas adjacent to the city have been low-density residential developments: for example, Lambeth

Walk in Westminster, 5.8 units per hectare; South Winds in Westminster, 5.4 units per hectare; the Monteith subdivision in Thorndale, 5 units per hectare; proposed OPA number 12, Westminster, 12 units per hectare; and, OPA 25 in London township, 4.3 units per hectare.

The composition of housing stock indicates that there is less single detached housing stock in London than in other Ontario municipalities. The percentage of single detached units in London is generally lower than in other Ontario municipalities: London, 50.5% of our housing stock is single; Hamilton, 52.1%; Waterloo, 56.5%; Sarnia 68.5%; and, Windsor, 62.7%.

Also, London provides proportionately more apartment units of five stories and greater than other Ontario municipalities: London, 19.8% in apartments; Hamilton, 18%; Waterloo, 12.3%; Sarnia, 9.5%; and, Windsor, 13.7%.

We believe this data graphically show responsible planning, responsible land use and a rational projection for future needs.

Mr Gosnell: In conclusion, boundary adjustment is essential. London has demonstrated since the 1961 annexation an excellent fiscal, land use and planning strategy. This community is one of the top Canadian cities, not only from an economic standpoint but from a planning and lifestyle standpoint as well. Annexation will not only solidify but improve that position.

London is poised to provide the municipal leadership and infrastructure needed for responsible growth in this vital part of southwestern Ontario. We are challenged and excited by the opportunity and the need to plan in an entirely new way.

As I said at the outset of my remarks today, this is an issue of urbanization and of which community is best poised to provide affordable municipal services. It is our belief that following January 1 of this upcoming year, the strong and prosperous relationships that have grown and developed between London and its rural neighbours over many generations will continue to thrive.

Londoners, under Bill 75, have many challenges to face but will continue to prosper. We are committed to supporting the efforts of Middlesex county as it too defines a new role for itself in southwestern Ontario. Middlesex will prosper, with expectations and responsibilities clearly defined, not only for the remainder of this century but well into the next as well.

Thank you for the opportunity of making this presentation.

The Chair: Thank you. We'll have about 10 minutes per party, and Mr Mills has some comments from the ministry.

Mr Gordon Mills (Durham East): To enable the committee to focus and perhaps understand the overview of the financial impact sheet, page 12 of the presentation, I'd like to ask the assistant deputy minister for Municipal Affairs, Mr Brian Riddell, to come forward and expound on that financial impact for a few moments, if that's agreeable.

Mr Brian Riddell: I'm Brian Riddell, assistant deputy minister, Municipal Affairs. Further to the comments made by Controller Burghardt about the compensation and the work that's been done in cooperation and partnership between the city and the Ontario government, I just want to say that a lot of work has been done to try to put some precision to the compensation figures. The reality is that people in the area are very concerned about what the impact of the annexation will be, and particularly concerned about the impact on their taxation. That was a concern the minister certainly had when he made the announcement, that the annexation in the London-Middlesex area shouldn't have an impact in the area on municipal tax bills. Certainly, the work the city has been doing is working along to try to minimize that.

I should say there's a fair amount of additional work to be done. The work you see in that table is based upon some preliminary information. There is more work that has been done to put some precision to those figures, but I think we have to recognize that there are some unknowns. Things like the new official plan in the area is one that neither the city nor ourselves are able to put any precision to at this time, but we're working towards doing that.

There are other elements of the compensation or the cost elements, particularly in 1993 and 1994, which really require more what I refer to as pre-engineering or detailed design. The new communications system is one that involves a new technology in terms of providing those kinds of communications services for protecting the area, and there has to be a lot more work done to determine the actual cost implications of that. At the same time, the city is looking at some of its other departments in terms of how they might respond as well in terms of the services they will provide in the annexed areas.

The Chair: For the committee, has there been any ballpark figure of the mill rate increase? There was $23.40, which would look like an increase. Are there any ballpark figures?

Mr Burghardt: If I may—

The Chair: No, from the ministry. Have they done any studies on that?

Mr Riddell: No, the information provided by the city is really the information as we know it now.

The Chair: Fine, thank you. We'll start off with Mr Eddy.

1030

Mr Ron Eddy (Brant-Haldimand): I'd like to welcome the delegation from the city of London. I appreciate their input and a well-prepared brief.

As an opposition member, of course, I find myself at a great disadvantage when it comes to talking about the compensation to and by the city of London, noting that the parliamentary assistant has said that compensation will be paid to county and, I believe, affected local municipalities now by the city and/or the province. Were those the words: and/or the province? I believe that's because negotiations are presently ongoing, so we may not know what that actually is by the time the government passes this act. I'd like to ask a few questions primarily about the compensation package.

Realizing that the amount of land is far in excess of what was requested and perhaps wanted by the city of London, I can understand the council's acquiescence to the package, because it's being offered on a platter. But I wonder, first of all, if you could comment on the compensation package. I don't know what it really is at this point in time. Does the city find the compensation package for the deal proper and acceptable?

Second, on the matter of compensation, realizing that the city is taking on tremendous additional responsibilities, and I expect will want to proceed with considerable development, and being advised by individuals, and knowing indeed, that the water supply is in question at the present time and that sewage treatment facilities are, in some cases, either at or over capacity, I've been advised, does the compensation deal include very large provincial funds for those particular services? I hope you've nailed the province to the wall for an additional Great Lakes water supply, because now's your chance, this is the chance—and the sewage treatment, realizing that the town of Westminster does have a sewage treatment plant that's shared by the city and the county.

Mr David Winninger (London South): Is there a question in this, Ron?

Mrs Dianne Cunningham (London North): Three, David.

The Chair: You have 10 minutes.

Mr Eddy: We can start over and do it one by one, if it's confusing to the member opposite.

Mr Gosnell: I think I kept track of the questions. We don't want anyone to have the misunderstanding that the package that's being put forward in terms of land is one being foisted upon us. This reflects what we asked for in April 1991, prior to the arbitrator being appointed, so it's very consistent with what we had asked for, and we stand very strongly behind that request, which is what is in Bill 75.

Secondly, on the compensation package, we're satisfied that the numbers that we've worked out are responsible and reasonable. London never did this as a tax grab, and we said that right from the beginning, that we wanted to show fairness and equity as it related to the neighbouring municipalities. Our understanding is that that has been accomplished.

Further to that, we've agreed that the suburban road payments, which Mr Eddy of course would be very familiar with, being clerk-treasurer of Middlesex, would continue not only for the 10 years that we've agreed to but in perpetuity, as it has for so many years in the past in London's area; that will continue. So we feel confident that in reviewing the services we're providing, we've been on the small-c conservative side of the estimates. We've made sure that we've accounted for as many different costs as we can, including over $3 million for official plan work, and we have no questions or reservations that we have adequate services for the expansions within the next five to 10 years.

In fact, by the summer of 1994, we anticipate picking up an additional 11 million gallons per day of water from the Elgin pipeline system. That has now gone out to engineering and environmental review; it's basically completed, the environmental part. We expect to have that supply of water in place by the summer of 1994.

In terms of sewage, we have capacity in our system. It's something that we are continuing always, as most cities do, to upgrade and review from time to time.

That's why it's so critical that we determine now the extent of the land. The piecemeal solutions of the past don't work, because we cannot adequately plan for the tens of millions of dollars of future service requirements for urbanizing in the London area. By knowing the area of the watershed and the areas that can be urbanized, we can make the proper planning decisions, which not only saves the taxpayers of London dollars, but also saves the province of Ontario many hundreds of thousands, if not millions of dollars worth of expenditures.

We've given a lot of thought, Mr Eddy, to your considerations. We recognize the responsibility we're taking. As most members here will recognize, larger cities develop new areas with development charges, which are those charges placed on the sale of lots or apartment units or commercial development, paid for by the consumers of those new products at the time of development or purchase of the property, so we've taken that into consideration.

London is in a unique position. It's very strong financially. It has an AAA credit rating and the lowest taxes of any city over 100,000 in Ontario. In no way do we wish to jeopardize that, but it's given us an opportunity to financially and responsibly plan for the future.

The Chair: Mr Eddy, you still have some time left.

Mr Eddy: We note the fiscal responsibility of the city of London as you've set out in the paper and that's certainly to the city's credit.

In regard to the Lake Erie water pipeline, will the province be participating in that? Maybe you've said that. I'm not clear on that. Who will be paying the costs of the extension of the east Elgin water system?

Mr Gosnell: The total cost of that system is, I believe, 10% to 15% provincial and the rest is user pay. As you know, with the Huron system, which is about $60 million to $70 million, the taxpayers of London, who are about 95% of the use on it, have paid for that system. Any review of the need for that system clearly indicates that it's required. It can be financed properly and it keeps the water rate to the municipalities of London and surrounding areas which can avail themselves of that service among the most enviable in the province in terms of cost.

Mr Eddy: That's important news. In view of the fact that we are told the negotiations, with the city at least, are ongoing regarding the compensation package, I'd like to know if that's so. I suppose as changes are proposed, that's up to city council's approval and we'll be hearing more about that. Is it ongoing or finalized?

Mr Gosnell: I can give you an example if you look at the sheet that we provided, page 12. When it relates to policing costs due to annexation and the improved service levels, the 2.7% we're talking about has a positive impact on the areas that are being annexed in terms of fire protection and police protection, just two of those services. Now if the city wants to go back to providing on January 1, 1993, no more than the services that are being provided now just for policing, that mill rate increase would drop from 2.7% to 2.2%.

The question that we'll be asked by our council at budget time is, at what level are we going to provide services to the new area? Obviously, they're paying for X level now. Our intent is to try, over a very short period of time, to bring it up, as much as possible, to the level that's enjoyed by the city of London, within reason. You obviously cannot have the same response times on fire and police calls as you do in a more dense area. I think it's an indication that we have overestimated the costs, that we have not underestimated them. On the other side of the ledger, it's very difficult for us to predict what the new revenues will be.

The reason we're here and the reason the government—not only the past government but this government—is proposing this type of an annexation or boundary adjustment is for the opportunity for enhanced revenue to the province. That will mean revenues not only to the city of London but to all taxpayers in the province of Ontario. I think all of us, whether we're at the local level or the provincial level, have a responsibility to create jobs, to create investment opportunities and to get our public back to work. London represents that opportunity.

The Chair: I'm sorry, Mr Eddy, that I have to cut you off; the time's up. Ms Cunningham.

Mrs Cunningham: Welcome. I thought I did a good job of talking about London down here, but you guys really do a very good job, so that's nice.

Mr Eddy: Is this London day?

Mrs Cunningham: I was about to give you a good one too, Mr Eddy. The member for Brant-Haldimand has been so involved in this for so many years that I appreciate the questions he asks, because they're very technical and not the kind I could ask. You're going to notice a distinct difference in the questioning now.

This is a very important issue, of course, both to Middlesex county and the city of London and there's no one questioning the tremendous need for annexation or the long overdue decision on this. Certainly, we all know what it's going to do to the southwest Ontario economy, hopefully, and those are certainly the projections we have. But there are some concerns, and I'm glad the mayor and the deputy and the councillor are here today, because I want to get their responses on the record. It'll help me in my work as I try to represent the citizens of London, and many in Middlesex, who are writing.

1040

I'm just going to ask four questions and you know you can take your time in responding to them. The biggest issue I have to respond to is the size of the annexation. I think that almost without exception, and it may be your view as well, people are concerned about the large size. I'd like you to respond to that in any way you feel is appropriate.

I'd also like you to respond to the process, because that's the next largest concern I have, in two ways: first of all, the timing. There's a great deal of confusion as to how many times the county and the city have gotten together, and the length of time. Sometimes there's a great deal of animosity around the use of the terms "10 years" or "5 years," if you could clarify that.

The second part of the process question that I think is extremely important to the members of the Legislature who represent rural Ontario, which may be facing this kind of an amalgamation in the future, is that they want to know if you think this is a good precedent, meaning "arbitration," for future annexations. If I could get your opinion on that, it would be helpful, because you've now gone through it and you've watched other annexations in the past.

The last question, and I think equally important, is the whole issue around the preservation of farm lands as far as possible, whether it be within the annexation area or in this belt thing around us, which I don't understand.

I've given you three things to talk about. You can imagine that we need them to be clarified. We just simply haven't had the opportunity, your worship, to have you speak directly to these.

Mr Gosnell: Maybe we can divide these questions up. I'll start off, if I could, with the question of size. Again, I would not want this committee to misunderstand, other than that London is very much in favour of the size of this annexation. There were obviously discussions over many years as to how big that would be, and there's been some discussion recently that while the city would be prepared to negotiate something different, that's not the case.

We are satisfied with this recommendation by the minister. It is consistent with our recommendations in April 1991. There was an opportunity at one point to look at a lessening of the size to the south end. I believe you called it the Mathysen response. We had some discussion by the minister on that.

We had a meeting here in Toronto with the minister and the deputy minister at the end of June or the first part of July—I'm not sure which—at which one of the members here, the minister and the reeves of North Dorchester and Delaware and the mayors of Westminster and London spoke and directed us to that request to look at a lessening of the area that would be taken in Westminster. All four parties agreed in writing that it should be part of the city of London and should not be left on its own, that it should be part of the new city of London because it would not have the assessment base or the tax base to stand by itself as a township. Neither Delaware nor Dorchester were interested in acquiring it because of the costs that would be incurred by those townships, and they obviously would need to bring in development to pay for those costs if they were to assume it.

At that point it was recognized that this area in Westminster would remain as part of the new city. Further to that, for years we had heard from Westminster: "It's all or nothing. We don't want our township being apportioned and piecemealed and put into different directions."

To make sure we're very clear on the question of size, we're satisfied with it. It gives us a long-term horizon for planning and it allows us to do the servicing and engineering studies required, and we believe it's very much in the interests of our region.

On the question of process, maybe I could ask the deputy mayor to answer that one.

Mr Burghardt: Thank you, your worship. To Mrs Cunningham, we certainly went through an extensive process. As you're well aware, the most recent position of course came about in 1988. Prior to that, the city and county had negotiations dating back 11 or 12 years. Mr Eddy will remember that. The most recent one began in 1988, when we put forth a proposal to the county, to the surrounding townships. At that time we did not include two of the townships which are now involved. It was to Westminster and also to the county as a whole and to London township to the north.

Unfortunately, Westminster at that time wouldn't talk with us—plain, simple, and I can't put it any more simply than that—it would not talk with us.

[Interruption]

Mr Burghardt: The county would certainly talk with us—

The Chair: I'm sorry, there can't be any catcalls from the audience.

Mr Burghardt: I'll go on with it. The ministry established a fact-finding process that we went through. We sat around the table. All parties were represented. We put forth position papers. Ministry staff of various departments—agriculture, finance, the environment—many of the ministries took part in that process. From the fact-finding a position paper came out and then we began negotiations that went on for an extensive period of time, again under the chair of the Ministry of Municipal Affairs.

As we're all aware, of course, we couldn't arrive at a local solution. We were given a deadline of April 26 of that particular year, but I have to say that following that we still had informal, ongoing discussions with the county and with some of the townships involved. Again, it did not involve the town of Westminster. You know what happened then. The ministry and the minister appointed an arbitrator and here we have Bill 75. But the process was extensive, Ms Cunningham, and we tried our best to work out a local solution. Unfortunately, that didn't come about.

Mrs Cunningham: Could you just respond on the future? Could this be used elsewhere, do you think, or is it unique to London? Just take it a step further. I get asked that question all the time. What's your view on that?

Mr Burghardt: That this is unique to London, this particular process?

Mrs Cunningham: I don't know if it is or not. What would you recommend? We've got a lot of rural people saying this could happen again.

Mr Burghardt: No, I don't see this as a precedent; I really don't. I believe it is unique to London because of our location, because of Middlesex county and because of the importance of southwestern Ontario. In my personal view—people may not agree with me—I don't see it as precedent-setting.

Mr Yorke: As it relates to farm land, if I can answer that particular question, Londoners do not have the perspective of regional government like you do, because there are no regional governments around London. So they really—

Mr Eddy: Amen.

Mr Yorke: I beg your pardon?

Mrs Cunningham: We all say amen to that.

Mr Yorke: As a result, then, they don't understand the concepts. As soon as they think of an urbanization, they think of it going right out to the boundaries.

Those of us who have been around for a while know what happens in regional governments. We know, like the regional municipality of Niagara, that when you enter into Niagara, you enter the fruit land long before you get to the Falls and urbanization, and that there are policies to protect the rural areas.

We look at ourselves as a single-tier regional government. We're going to put those kinds of protections into our official plan. We're mandated under section 30 of the act.

In addition, we have established already the principles for a rural agricultural committee to report to council, and we're looking forward to make sure that the leap-frog type development that's been taking place in our area doesn't take place and that we have a logical development from the centre. We feel that in the long term the farm land will be more protected by a single-tier regional government to the scale with proper planning policies than what would take place now.

Mr Kimble Sutherland (Oxford): I want to pick up on that question. First of all, thanks for coming and for your presentation.

In the brief, Mayor Gosnell talked about the annexation, about an issue of urbanization. You've talked about some of the things in process in terms of what the city is going to do to protect the farm land.

I live in a town now, but grew up in the country, and certainly all the rural people I talk to are always very sceptical about how urban people will protect agricultural land. I think that's a reality in this case. It would seem too, though, that regarding the most southern part of Westminster, primarily farm land, there isn't going to be a lot of development there. Why would the city necessarily be interested in the most southern part?

Obviously, we know you need some land to expand and have some annexation, but I guess people really want to know how the city is going to prove it actually can manage that type of agricultural land. Would it not possibly be better run by some type of rural municipality? I guess what really people have a lot of scepticism about—I would say the people I've heard from would have that scepticism as well. The track record of urban municipalities looking after agricultural land leaves many people sceptical. What assurances are you giving to everyone that this is going to be a different situation?

1050

Mr Gosnell: That's a good question. It's very much to the point of what's gone on for the last year in terms of discussions in our area. Right from the beginning, the Ministry of Agriculture and Food indicated to the discussions at the fact-finding that Controller Burghardt spoke to you about that agricultural lands can be as well protected in a city official plan as a county official plan. Those aren't my words; those are from the ministry representatives who appeared at the fact-finding.

It's interesting that once those discussions were held, never again with our discussions, until the very end, was there any discussion about farm land. This has been an issue about development and urbanization, who best was in a position to provide the resources, the planning and the finances to make it happen. But our new official plan—and it's mentioned for Bill 75—must include not only official plan land uses and a social plan; it also has to have some discussion on agricultural zones and how we intend, within a city official plan, to protect and preserve farm land within the community of London.

With our new committees we have gone as far as to look at how we can make sure we have representation from the agricultural and rural communities on the committees that affect these new lands that are coming into London. One of the opportunities, as I'm sure you're aware, Mr Sutherland, is the county-city liaison committee, which should really have more opportunities to communicate and to discuss these issues between the county of Middlesex and the city of London. We see it providing the leadership in areas such as regional environmental planning, waste management, transportation planning and certainly as it relates to the agricultural and rural character of the new lands coming in.

We take that seriously. We know that it's a very divisive issue. As I said earlier, we had an opportunity, through Ms Mathysen, to look at some of those lands in the southern part of Westminster being in other than London. But the tax base was not there to allow it to continue even as a separate township, and the townships to the east and the west, Delaware to the west and Dorchester to the east, felt that it would be inappropriate and signed off on their interest in having those lands come into their jurisdiction. That was looked at. We're trying to make sure the people in that area are protected. Our official plan is required to show how we do it and we think we can meet that challenge.

Mr Winner: I too would like to thank the city for its very detailed and well-prepared presentation. From time to time we have our disagreements, but I'm still hoping the city will see the light with regard to our proposal on apartments in houses, which I think ties in very nicely with the strategic vision that the city is engaging in for the greater London area.

I think one thing we do agree on is that we need to develop the new official plan within the context of a strategic vision for London. I know there's a lot of work going on, and of course that strategic vision has to combine opportunities for economic growth and development with protection of environmentally sensitive areas and agricultural lands.

So my question to you is, is it your understanding that the development of the new official plan that's required under Bill 75 will address not only the land to be annexed but also the lands that are currently within municipal boundaries? That was one part to the question. The other part is, do you agree with my understanding that development will not go ahead in the annexed areas until the official plan is complete and until we've identified with the very real inventory of environmentally sensitive areas and agricultural lands that need to be preserved and protected?

Mr Gosnell: To your last question first, the city and the province are committed to no major development in the new areas that will be annexed into the city until the new official plan is adopted, unless it is something of a very urgent nature. A new manufacturing facility could come in and be on our boundary, contiguous to services, and perhaps could have ministerial regulation or order to have it proceed. Unless it was something urgent—and I think we'd all have to agree that there are some areas that could be urgent—the new official plan will have to be in place. We expect to have that done by January 1, 1996.

Regarding the new official plan, the province is challenging the city of London to come up with the idea of a social part of the official plan, which is really quite new in Ontario. At first blush we didn't know what it meant and we didn't know if we'd be very enthused about it, but it really does provide an opportunity to look at things we are already doing in terms of affordable housing, intensification and a number of different programs.

The new official plan will contain land use, environmental and social issues in parts for the new area. The only part that will affect the existing city will be the social part because, as you know, we just passed a new official plan within the last year or two. I think we're quite comfortable that our intensifications and zonings are appropriate for our city, but we would then still apply the social part of the new official plan to the entire area of the city.

We think it's an opportunity to really put into words some of the things that we think are important for our communities that we sort of take for granted and perhaps had never really characterized before in a plan. We think it's quite an interesting challenge, quite frankly.

Mrs Irene Mathyssen (Middlesex): I appreciate your coming here. I'd like to begin by saying that I must disagree. I don't think if we were to ask the people of North Dorchester or the councils of North Dorchester and Delaware whether they wanted that land in Westminster to go to the city of London that they would be all that enthusiastic.

Secondly, on this whole question about OMAF, under its mandate OMAF cannot comment on agricultural lands until they're in jeopardy.

The Chair: Irene, could you hold on for a second.
[Failure of sound system]

The Chair: Could you start over again?

Mrs Mathyssen: All right. Basically, I disagree that the councils of North Dorchester and Delaware would want that land to go into the city. Secondly, on this whole question about OMAF being quite content with the city being the stewards of agricultural land, the reality is that OMAF's mandate is such that it cannot comment upon the situation of agricultural land until it's in jeopardy.

But my questions are a little more specific. I'm quite pleased that the city has the financial wherewithal to meet the compensation needs of the county. That leads me to a question regarding servicing, particularly in South Winds and in Canterbury Estates. They have very real and significant environmental needs there.

My question is, when will those pipes be in the ground? Obviously, that should be very soon. Secondly, this rural agricultural committee is very important. I wonder what your perception is of its mandate and how it will be constituted, how it will effect a voice for those people in rural areas to be annexed within the city of London council.

Mr Gosnell: The first part relates to the sewage problems at South Winds and Canterbury. I think this highlights the reason why we're here today, that you can't have urban development taking place outside a municipality on anything less than municipal infrastructure or you end up with the environmental nightmare that happened to the residents in South Winds development in Westminster.

I think the question is very appropriate. We intend to have that done as soon as possible. An environmental review will have to be done on that line to make sure it's put in the right place under the Ministry of the Environment guidelines and we would expect that to be within the next couple of years. But certainly, we would be interested in doing it as soon as we can. The province has already indicated, through the Ministry of the Environment, that funds would be made available to do that. We obviously have the capacity and we have the will to do it as quickly as possible.

I would just correct a couple of things. North Dorchester and Delaware signed off wanting to have these lands in their townships. That's on record. I don't know where the member gets the supposition that they would want it. They've already signed off and said that they did not want it. In fact, the ministry of agriculture—

Mrs Mathyssen: That wasn't my question.

Mr Gosnell: —was brought in not by the city of London but by the negotiations branch to have some input into the whole question of agricultural land. It was their view that whether the agricultural lands were part of a city official plan or a county official plan, measures can be put in place to protect those lands. That was, again, not the city's position, that was from the ministry of agriculture representatives at that meeting.

Finally, I think the most important question is, how can we make sure that we represent the agricultural and rural communities and the lands that will be brought into the new city? We've asked our interim task force on standing committees to look at that whole issue.

As well, Controller Burghardt and I are members of the county-city liaison committee and we see, through a number of our advisory and standing committees of the municipality and through that liaison committee, an opportunity to make sure that men and women are represented from these areas on very important committees as they relate to land use, the committee of adjustment and environmental advisory committees.

1100

So it is our intent to respect very much that we have a difference in the way land has been treated outside our boundary. It has a different flavour in terms of agriculture and rural, and we intend very much to listen and to work with our friends in the county and the township around us to make sure that there's representation as it relates to those very important issues that you've outlined.

Mrs Mathysen: But this was to be a separate committee.

The Chair: Excuse me; time's up. I'm sorry, Irene. Mr Mills.

Mr Mills: A couple of points I'd like to make in closing: One is about the impact of annexation. Based on the city's current figures, because the city's portion is only part of the property tax bill, the impact of annexation is only $23.40 per household, or 1.3% of the total tax bill.

Secondly, to a point that you made, your worship, any new urban development within the annexed area that could occur before the approval of the new official plan, one, would have to be on full services and, two, would require the approval of the Minister of Municipal Affairs.

The Chair: Okay. I'd like to thank you for appearing before this committee, your worship, and your colleagues.

Mr Gosnell: Thank you, Mr Chairman.

Mr Eddy: Mr Chairman, before the delegation leaves, a point of information: I think it's very important to correct the record. It's information, I assure you.

I wanted to clear up this point about the role of the township of Westminster in the previous council and to state that the officials, the elected and appointed officials of the town of Westminster, participated fully in the fact-finding process, number one. Number two, they participated fully in the boundaries negotiations process and Mr Taylor was present as the negotiator. Negotiations were not successfully concluded; there's no doubt about that.

Mr Gosnell: That's true. It would be a fair characterization.

Mr Eddy: Okay, and I know we're all in agreement.

Thirdly, I must recognize the role of the council and the appointed officials of the town of Westminster in subsequent meetings following the breakdown or the discontinuance of the boundaries negotiations process. Indeed, all of those people were on call to come to meetings organized by the county at any time, almost. So I just wanted to clear the record in that regard, and I know we're all—

The Chair: Okay. Irene wanted to make a comment to clear something up there, I believe, when I cut you off.

Mrs Mathysen: My concern was that I asked about the constitution and mandate of the agricultural committee and I didn't receive an answer about how they would be determined.

The Chair: Okay, fine.

Mr Gosnell: Mr Chairman, did you wish a little bit more clarification on that?

The Chair: Yes, just to cover that, since you didn't. So we've gone back and forth here to be fair to all sides.

Mr Gosnell: The province has put the onus on the city to indicate how we can represent agricultural and rural interests. We're still working with that with a standing committee of our council to find every way that we can to involve them.

We've already passed a few things at our council to include representation on advisory committees, on the committee of adjustment, and we're trying to find the best vehicle, whether it's the county-city liaison committee or a new committee, to represent those interests. We're still working on that. We take it very seriously, and we want to make sure that whatever committee structure we come up with, it's not just for window dressing, but that it has some real impact on the decision-making in London.

The Chair: Okay, thank you for appearing before the committee.

Mrs Cunningham: Mr Chairman, while the other group is coming forward, could I just have a clarification on process today? I think we should do it now or we're going to miss an opportunity.

As you know, there's been some discussion around people not being able to be heard, and there's a great deal of controversy. Whether we like it or not, that's the case. It's nice to go along in a nice, neat way, but I have to answer my phone and deal with people. So I want to just have a brief discussion. Perhaps the government members can respond to this.

If there's going to be any change, and you know there was a window for another day if necessary, it's going to have to be done this morning. So I just want you, as the chairperson, or the government to let us know, because I am going to leave for about 10 minutes to go to a House leaders' meeting and I can tell you that I have not been satisfied as to the way people have been invited to appear before this committee. I want you to make some kind of ruling or have a discussion. I don't care what you do, but I need some direction.

The Chair: Perhaps we could meet just after the last witnesses are in. Having a discussion on extending the time frame for submissions made to this committee also could be looked at.

Mr Sutherland: If I can make a couple of comments, I think everyone's aware that the amount of time that's been allocated for witnesses and what have you is negotiated between the three House leaders. If there are to be specific changes to that, it needs to be discussed at the House leaders' level and should be done there.

I've had phone calls as well, and it needs to be put on the record that written submissions become part of the official record as well. Many people think the only way they are officially heard is by actually appearing, but any written submissions are a part of the official record. I'm certainly open to extending the time on the written submissions.

The Chair: That's important. The written submission either comes out of Hansard with the research staff and presented to us or it comes out of their briefs, so it's exactly the same.

Mrs Cunningham: If you'll just allow me 10 seconds, if I were to tell somebody he could have a written submission, I'd be laughed off the other end of my phone. That's the first thing. The second thing is that I am going to the House leaders' meeting right now, so I will be taking my concern, and they can negotiate what they like. I will only be gone for 10 minutes, and I will be back, because I want to hear the submissions. But that's my role in my party, so you know my feelings on this.

Mr Eddy: There is a great deal of concern, and we've heard it in this caucus as well. I've taken the liberty of talking to the other members of the subcommittee, including Mrs Cunningham, Mr Sutherland and Ms Mathysen, on the matter, and we are all agreed that the way it has to be handled, if there's more time, is by the House leaders. I've advised my House leader that we're in some agreement that they deal with the matter and hopefully approve some more time.

Mr Sutherland: I'm sorry that people may not have the perception that a written presentation is just as important and is still part of the official record; it always has been for every committee and shall continue to be. So people need to be aware and take that seriously, that a written submission becomes part of the official record on this issue and is a chance for people to be heard who can't make a presentation in front of us orally.

Mrs Mathysen: I would like to table a written submission for the benefit of the committee members from the Citizens Against Annexation.

The Chair: I have a list I'm having the clerk make copies of, of all the calls I've received at my office, either as Chair or as a member of the government, and I will share that and the comments made with all members of the committee. I think there are approximately 12 people who have written to me or called me on the telephone, so I'll be tabling those and putting them on the record.

LONDON HOME BUILDERS' ASSOCIATION
LONDON DEVELOPMENT INSTITUTE
SPEYSIDE CORP

The Chair: We'll start with the next group. I'd like to welcome the London Home Builders' Association and the London area developers. We have a half-hour. I would like you to introduce yourselves for the purposes of Hansard, and your position also.

Mr Ric Knutson: My name is Ric Knutson, and I represent the London Development Institute.

Mr Michael Zebregts: I'm Mike Zebregts, the president of the London Home Builders' Association.

Mr Lars Bygden: I'm Lars Bygden, first vice-president of the London Home Builders' Association.

Mr Ben Lansink: My name is Ben Lansink, Speyside Corp. I own land in the town of Westminster.

The Chair: If you can start your presentation, and leave some time at the end for the three parties to ask questions.

Mr Zebregts: I'm Michael Zebregts, president of the London Home Builders' Association. First, we would like to express our sincere appreciation for giving LHBA the opportunity to express our support of the recommended annexation.

I represent over 200 member companies made up of home builders, subtrades, suppliers and professionals. Over the last 10 years, we have expressed our great concern to the city of London about the declining available serviced land in this area.

We at the London Home Builders' Association believe there are two fundamental principles to approaching the housing needs in our city: the right of all our citizens to decent, safe and appropriate housing, and the right of all Londoners and newcomers to our city to a reasonable opportunity to own their own homes.

We strongly believe that with the annexation that has been proposed in the report by Mr Brant, it is not only timely but essential for the provincial government to grant the proposed annexation as submitted.

At the present time, our city has vacant land available for approximately 10,000 to 11,000 housing units. We have built, on average in the last 10 years 2,688 units per year. We believe the land supply is at a critical low point. There is only a four-year supply, as submitted in the consultant's report to the city of London for the lot levy study. Let us not forget that any annexed land will take a minimum of four years before zoning and services are in place to start new housing units on any new annexed land.

1110

In most parts of Canada, land supply is one of the key elements of the affordability problem. The solution lies in ensuring an adequate and timely supply of serviced land.

Effective leadership does not come about accidentally. Rather, it is the result of deliberate actions and policies. We therefore respectfully ask this committee to recommend to the Legislature to proceed with the annexation report submitted by the Honourable Mr Cooke.

In the last piecemeal annexation a couple of years ago, one developer had control of the majority of the land annexed, thereby creating an unhealthy situation. With single-family housing starts rebounding at the present time, without sufficient annexation, this will dramatically increase land prices in the present city, in our opinion.

Some of our members were forced to start building outside the city boundaries at a greatly increased level to provide the housing which our customers were looking for.

Mr Bygden: The London Home Builders' Association members did not cause the growth in our area. We only serviced the levels that our customers demanded.

As you are well aware, all this building on the outskirts of the city of London has caused environmental problems. Septic tank failures are a common thing. It's getting so bad that the Ontario New Home Warranty Program is now demanding, in some instances, that builders of new homes provide a $5,000 bond for septic tank failures for a period of two years, thereby causing housing costs to increase once again.

We all know that Canterbury Estates, a subdivision just on the outskirts of the present boundaries, already has major septic tank bed failures, with only 14 homes built in this 73-house subdivision. Let's not forget that presently, governments are spending millions of dollars to rectify environmental problems in South Winds subdivision in the town of Westminster.

Proper and long-term planning would have avoided wasting taxpayer dollars. Unless annexation is allowed to proceed, the London Home Builders' Association believes that we are inviting more environmental problems.

Existing services, like police, fire protection, water and sewer services, just to mention a few, will be much easier to expand and less costly to provide than providing all these services in the surrounding areas. Proper annexation will enable the planners and politicians a much better way of planning the future of this whole area for a better environment. Our city needs sufficient land to properly plan long-term growth for the future generations in the years to come.

We at LHBA do not believe the municipalities outside the city of London have the financial capabilities to provide us with a reasonable alternative at an affordable cost.

One of our greatest concerns should be the environment. Building on unserviced land no matter what the soil conditions are has put a tremendous strain on our area. There are soil conditions that have worked well in the past and will work in the future, but as the demand grows to the levels of the past 10 years and we start to build full subdivisions on all kinds of poor soil conditions, the environmental problems will start to surface.

We at LHBA respectfully urge this committee to consider our opinions and give our customers in the future the affordable housing units they deserve.

Again, I would like to express our deep appreciation for providing us with this opportunity to voice our support of the annexation as submitted by the Honourable Mr Cooke.

Mr Knutson: While I share the views of the members from the LHBA, there are a number of additional issues I wish to raise on behalf of the LDI. I'll be concentrating on five general points and two specific issues on the draft legislation and amendments thereto.

The first point I wish to raise is affordable housing. Annexation will provide for a secure land supply for all land uses into the future. The result of that promotes healthy competition between developers and builders in reducing the speculation value of land prices, thereby keeping the cost down.

The city in the past has tried to ensure a healthy supply of approved land, resulting in London not having the land price fluctuations that many municipalities such as the GTA have experienced, particularly in the last boom. The net effect of this, measured statistically, is that 58% of London's total supply of housing in all forms is affordable under ministry guidelines as set out under section 36 of the Planning Act and the policy statement under section 3.

The second area I wish to speak to is the land supply issue, and elaborate on some of the points my colleagues from the LHBA have addressed.

The ministry has undoubtedly provided the committee and the Legislature with a vast array of statistics dealing with the uptake of land over the past number of years, the supply of land that's approved, draft approved and raw land. At an average utilization rate, we have a 2.1-year supply of approved land and a 2.3-year supply of draft approved land. We are critically short.

The average time it will take to go through the planning exercise in the new area will be a minimum of four years. If we use the recent official plan in London as an example, it was enacted by council in 1989. That's after the study period, and that study period started approximately four years before that. That official plan is still in front of the Ontario Municipal Board, with the last remaining issues to be resolved. The total time frame for that planning exercise was about seven years. Subdivision approval after that planning policy work is done will require a further two to three years.

We are pleased that the draft legislation includes amendments to section 31, to allow adjacent land that is non-agricultural, based on the approvals, to come on stream in a quicker time frame. That may help alleviate a very serious supply problem if a 10-year or longer horizon would be required.

I'd like to speak to you about planning for a moment. My background as a developer is that I have a degree and am an experienced planner.

We've seen over the last number of years many government initiatives where we can no longer take a neighbourhood approach to planning but rather a more holistic approach based on ecosystem planning, and having concern and regard for a wide variety of environmental, social and other features, including transportation etc.

The area proposed to be annexed provides the city with an opportunity to develop that vision and to put the approvals in place in terms of where a variety of land uses should go.

It has a further benefit. Many of us have seen hotly contested debates before the Ontario Municipal Board, where an environmentally sensitive piece of land takes great time and expense to adjudicate. Having the planning put in place at the outset will avoid many of these. Developers will simply avoid it in terms of their acquisition schemes.

Further on the planning, related to section 30 of the bill, we are concerned that there's been a new layer being applied to the city of London, treating it as a special situation, in that special policies, regulations and ministerial control are being exercised. We believe there is sufficient control currently in the Planning Act, through provincial policies, through the issues in section 2 of the Planning Act and the general requirements of section 17 to put an official plan in place.

While we certainly understand that London is setting some level of precedent with the size of annexation, we caution greatly against significant time delays by greater intervention of Queen's Park. Further, London does have a very competent planning staff, and we've had situations in the past where those from Queen's Park, who may not be as familiar with local issues, thereby have a shield in advancing certain solutions that may be appropriate in the GTA or in other municipalities but may not be appropriate in local London circumstances.

You've heard at length about servicing. London does have the ability, both technically and financially, to extend services to bring new lands on stream. The adjacent rural municipalities, as we've heard about their environmental problems, do not.

We've heard about the cost of retrofitting these areas that have environmental difficulties.

The net public cost of servicing is reduced when we have large centralized facilities as opposed to small remedial treatment plants to look after issues.

1120

One of the greatest benefits in an urbanizing municipality is the efficient use of land. We, the development industry, are in fact the stewards of that land, controlled obviously by official plans.

Due to land loss for septic tanks and typical rural development forms, we believe it's inappropriate to waste land, as it has been in the past.

For example, residential development can occur at a maximum of 1.3 units per acre, and medium-density forms of development cannot be accommodated when septic systems are the servicing scheme.

Full municipal services allow for densities up to a planning maximum of 60 units per acre, and single-family development will achieve up to eight units per acre. It's altogether an efficient service. Outside of sanitary sewage concerns, water would be available for fire protection, roads would be of sufficient quality to handle the traffic demands etc, and there's a long list.

The absence of services is now causing havoc with a number of industries that are currently not able to expand due to environmental problems. These are issues which will have to be remediated in the near future.

The last major point has to do with industrial land supply.

One of the reasons for London being a growth centre has been an adequate supply of industrial land.

The city has played a strong leadership role in the direct development and marketing of industrial land, resulting in low land costs, therefore an encouragement of new industries to locate in London.

We at the London Development Institute, and in fact the London Home Builders' Association, enthusiastically support the city's initiative in this.

The result of new industry through more jobs being created is a corollary need for housing and commercial and office space provided by developers and builders, their subtrades and suppliers. The net effect is more jobs through all sectors of London's economy.

These jobs, with a healthy economy, require far lower levels of social assistance and a further ability for the city to provide a higher level of service generally.

A specific comment I wish to make on a draft regulation is regarding section 18 of the draft bill with respect to development charges.

The city of London has in place a development charge bylaw. The town of Westminster has in place a development charge bylaw and it's currently under appeal to the Ontario Municipal Board. That hearing is scheduled for February 11 for two weeks. We believe a lot of expense can be avoided by trying to rationalize and favour urban forms of development charges in favour of the city of London at the regulation stage.

We believe that the bill as it currently exists, where the city of London simply inherits the development charges bylaws of adjacent municipalities, will cause some level of chaos.

At the same time, we understand that no development will occur unless it's on full services. But there are a number of issues, and we will be going back through the whole issue of development charges between our industry and other parties involved in the city in the very near future.

We would ask that you consider changing that proposed regulation so that development charges be in accordance with the city of London standards and perhaps ask the city to add one section that deals with rural and farm-related development on which their bylaw is silent.

Thank you very much, Mr Chairman, for your patience. We'd be pleased to answer any questions you might have.

Mr Gary Carr (Oakville South): Thank you very much for your presentation.

The Chair: We have about three minutes each.

Mr Carr: Okay. I'll go very fast then.

If this proceeds and goes through, how many homes do you anticipate being built over what period of time? Could you give us a ballpark figure?

Mr Zebregts: We have built an average of 2,688 units per year, depending on the economy. If you take the last five years, the average has been 3,900 units.

Mr Carr: Yes, but knowing the economy and knowing your projections now last year, what do you anticipate coming up over the next couple of years, knowing the interest rates—

Mr Zebregts: Each year, 2,600 to 3,000.

Mr Carr: So it would be about the same as it has been. Even in spite of the fact that we've had some problems with the economy and so on, you still anticipate the same growth?

Mr Zebregts: Well, we went through a recession in the 1980s, which is part of this 10-year average, so we feel confident that we're still going to be needing those units.

Mr Carr: And if it doesn't go through, knowing the amounts you need and the land available, what do you see happening?

Mr Zebregts: Land prices will definitely increase, because there are only a few controls on the remaining land.

Mr Carr: How much land would you say would be available for homes?

Mr Zebregts: About four years' supply.

Mr Carr: Four years' supply regardless of the cost, based on the gross numbers, you anticipate.

Finally, with regard to the industrial base, knowing that regionally things are very different, you drive around the greater Toronto area and you can't go past an industrial area without seeing "For Lease," "For Sale." There's a tremendous glut on the market in the greater Toronto area. Knowing that situation, maybe you could fill us in on what is happening in London, specifically with regard to the industrial, what you presently have. Looking at the two scenarios, if you stay where you are and if we go ahead with this bill, could you give us a little bit of an update—I'm running out of my three minutes—just on the industrial side of it? Again, how many years do we have if we don't go ahead, and what do you anticipate happening if we do?

Mr Knutson: Mr Chairman, I'll field that question. To the member: The company that I work directly for, Z Group, has a significant supply of light industrial space. Our vacancy rates are about 6%. The Toronto vacancy rates, I understand, are significantly in excess of that. The London light industrial market has not seen the vacancy rates that you've seen in the GTA. We've seen a continuation of building. In fact, our company has built two buildings during the last two years and one's currently under construction. We anticipate a continuation of that. With a number of potential announcements that we're aware of, there could be a significant shortage of industrial land very shortly.

Mrs Mathysen: A quick question: The question about the supply of industrial land has come up, and I would suggest that probably the most optimal use of industrial-commercial land is something London should strive for, and I'm wondering if you could comment. There is a head office, 3M, actually, in the city in London east that has quite extensive land holdings, a vast expanse of lawn. Is that the best and most optimal use of commercial and industrial land? Does London need to do better than that?

Mr Knutson: Through you, Mr Chairman, a very difficult question to answer. The industrial parks that have been developed by the city are developed at a very efficient level and at approximately 40% coverage. A head office of international exposure having a wide boulevard in front of it for aesthetic reasons to encourage an attractive approach I don't believe is a waste of land. If that were the situation generally, there would be a difficulty if we were wasting land. But typically the densities we develop on are 40% to 50% on full municipal services. On the other hand, in the Westminster industrial park those densities that have been achieved are in the order of 15% to 20%. The rest of that land is being taken up by septic systems.

Mr Winninger: I just have one question about development charges. Correct me if I'm wrong, but the last time I checked, London had the second-lowest development charges, apparently, of any municipality in Ontario. I think that has generated quite a bit of criticism, given the high cost of sewer and water hookups, roads, schools and so on. So some people are suggesting that in London, new home owners aren't paying their fair share of the increased cost to the municipality of all of those hookups and services. I wonder if you could comment on whether it's myth or reality.

Mr Knutson: Mr Chairman, if I might try to field that question, London has been involved in development charges through a variety of forms for in excess of 20 years, starting with the boundary roads and outlet sewers bylaw passed in 1968 and actually going back to 1927 on the sewer rental charge bylaw that it enacted.

We believe we've kept our fund in reasonably healthy shape over that time, or at least over the last 10 years, to provide for the physical infrastructure. We have a pooled financing, where the municipality receives the money on each individual building permit, pools those funds and then pays developers for the oversizing that they provide. It has worked well. We've been able to install services, and I believe we have had a fair situation.

Our advantage is the history that we have with it. When development charges were reviewed by London council a year ago, they were frozen at that time, having regard to a deep recession that we're still experiencing. It was also known full well at that time that development charges were going to be reviewed as annexation proceeded, because there are costs that have to be accounted for, and we have no difficulty, as an industry, paying our fair share for the physical development and the infrastructure needed to accommodate that development.

1130

Mr Bernard Grandmaitre (Ottawa East): I understand that the serviced land supply of any municipality is critical to make it a viable community. But I also understand that of the 64,000 acres, only 7% of those lands are presently developable. Don't you think that 7% is very low, and that you're depending on a new official plan to create more developable land, commercial and industrial?

Mr Knutson: The 7% are those lands that are currently designated for non-agricultural purposes. As London grows over time, there will certainly be increased demand for land over that 7%. What this gives us an opportunity to do is to develop a vision for the future, to understand those lands which should in fact be developed for urban purposes and those which should not. It gives us opportunities to do planning on a watershed basis and deal with environmental issues far more fully than has been done in the past. The 7% currently designated in official plans I think is misleading. London will have an ongoing need for land as long as it's a growth centre, and that will be able to be accommodated and staged and dealt with through a vision that's created through the new official plan which has been mandated by Bill 75.

Mr Grandmaitre: If you think that the 7% is misleading, then the Ministry of Municipal Affairs is misleading us. Is that what you're telling me?

Mr Knutson: No, sir. What I'm suggesting to you is that 7% of the 64,000 acres is now currently designated for non-agricultural uses. The remainder, the 93%, is likely in some open space or agricultural designation. With the new official plan, there will be a vision into the future which will apply to those agricultural lands, and some of them will be redesignated.

On the issue of agricultural lands, although a fairly small percentage of the 64,000 acres has been owned by members of our institute for many years, we are some of the largest agricultural producers in the county of Middlesex. We've continued to do that for many years and will continue to until those are needed for urban land uses.

The Chair: I'd like to thank you, gentlemen, for appearing before this committee. What we have is a vote coming up at 12 o'clock, and I want to make sure that the other party has an equivalent amount of time. Yes, sir?

Mr Ben Lansink: I haven't spoken yet, sir. We still have another 10 minutes.

The Chair: Oh, you haven't—

Mr Lansink: No, I haven't.

The Chair: I'm sorry, but we are going to have to go with half an hour on each group.

Mr Lansink: We started at 10 after and my paper will take five minutes. I'm on the agenda.

The Chair: I didn't realize that there were—we won't have time for any questions after. Just go on with your short brief there.

Mr Lansink: It will take about five minutes.

The Chair: Okay. I just took it that everybody had spoken because that's when we got into the questions.

Mrs Cunningham: In fairness, the half-hour isn't up, because I know when I left. On the other hand, they've come a long way and we've asked them to be here, so I don't think any of us are going to be arguing. If we have to come back after the vote, then so be it.

The Chair: Okay, if the committee is agreeable to come back after the vote then go ahead, sir.

Mrs Cunningham: I never used my five minutes.

The Chair: I just took it that all people had presented. I was out of the room for about five minutes.

Mr Lansink: My name is Ben Lansink.

It's time to end the boundary adjustment debate and adopt the Brant report and Bill 75. Growth in the metropolitan London area will occur with or without annexation. By arguing against boundary adjustment, environmentalists and others are advocating the pollution of our environment.

I am president of Speyside Corp, the owner of 233 acres located in the town of Westminster. Our land is situated on Colonel Talbot Road, between the South Winds subdivision and the city of London. In addition, my family's corporation has an interest in an 18-acre vacant development parcel situated in the hamlet of Lambeth.

I am strongly in favour of Bill 75.

A Ministry of Treasury and Economics demographic bulletin dated July 1989 suggests Ontario is projected to grow from 9.1 million as of June 1986 to 12.8 million by June 2011. A paper prepared for my company, Speyside Corp, by Strategic Projections Inc of Oakville estimates that Ontario will grow by 2.2 million in the 1990s, double the 1980s pace. Metropolitan London, in other words, Middlesex county, is expected to increase its population by more than 100,000 persons between 1991 and 2001, driven in part by an industrial base that favours job creation and the attractiveness of its relative income and house price position within the province.

South Winds Village is a recently developed subdivision of about 165 upscale homes in the $250,000 general value range. Local wells supply the subdivision with water that is treated, at this time, to remove iron. Sanitary sewage disposal is individual-lot septic tank leaching and sub-surface disposal. The area has encountered a major problem of seepage to basements and surface ponding.

Assessments by the Middlesex County Health Unit and the Ministry of the Environment have resulted in both agencies supporting a program for remedial measures. South Winds has been declared a public health hazard. The solution will cost Ontario taxpayers $3.6 million and local taxpayers $1.6 million, for a total of $5.2 million. If you include interest at 10%, based on a 20-year amortization, the total cost is about $11.8 million.

Westminster's solution is a gravity sanitary sewage collection system and local sewage treatment plant, with discharge of the treated effluent to Dingman Creek. Additional future development needs will not be met to any significant degree by the proposed limited-capacity plant. In other words, much of the cost is wasted unless the plant can be readily upgraded. The problem would not have occurred had South Winds been situated within the boundaries of the city of London.

Private sewage is a pollutant and is probably the largest contaminant that is discharged into the ground. The cumulative effect of clustering septic systems, each with its tile bed emitting waste in a small-lot subdivision, has proven too much for soils to bear. In the short term, septic system failures mean public health hazards from exposure to sewage and its attendant diseases. In the longer term, drinking water is at risk of contamination.

The town of Westminster does not have the financial resources to create the infrastructure necessary for development. The city of London does.

Environmentalists and other groups show an uncanny willingness to accept the environmental damage now being wreaked upon the aquifer systems surrounding the greater London area by arguing against boundary adjustment. It is difficult for me to understand their agenda. The continued use and aging of septic and leaching beds will ultimately cause major health problems.

Opponents argue against destroying farm land, but crop and food production are more efficient now. Farm income is at all-time low because Canada can produce more food than we can consume. The food market is now global in scale and our international competitors are similarly more efficient. It takes fewer farmers to feed more city folk every day.

Is the land within the proposed boundary adjustment Canada's best farm land? The land has been fragmented into many smaller parcels over the years. Use of large, complex farm equipment is prevalent. It is not economically feasible to farm on small parcels. With minor exceptions, farms that raise animals for milk, eggs or slaughter are not operating in the areas close to the city.

Much of the annexed land is traversed by ravines, both branches of the Thames River, Dingman Creek and Medway Creek and their tributaries. Large areas adjacent to these waterways are not farmed and will remain in their present natural state once development occurs. Protection is afforded through agencies such as the Upper Thames River Conservation Authority. Large portions of the land to be annexed is used for Fanshawe Lake, London airport and the hamlets of Lambeth and Hyde Park. Substantial industrial areas are in the vicinity of Hyde Park and the southerly boundary of the city, White Oaks Road and Highway 135. Some land is recreational, such as golf courses. Yes, there will be some excellent farm land lost, but on a percentage basis it is quite insignificant.

It has been suggested that London for the last 30 years has wasted land and should not be rewarded with future annexation. Containing the city within its present boundaries will damage its society, its economy and the environment. Land scarcity will occur and the value of real estate will increase dramatically. Affordability will decrease and the need for subsidized housing will go up.

If annexation does not occur, people will be forced to live in outlying communities that would ultimately take up more land than what is proposed by Brant or Bill 75. This is already evident in the hamlets of Lambeth, Dorchester, Kilworth, Komoka, Arva, Nilestown and Melrose.

To conclude, London is financially sound, well managed, responsive and accountable to the electorate. The city has the assessment base and financial strength to create the necessary infrastructure for future expansion. Economies of scale to ensure the lowest possible cost are available to the city.

The Chair: Thank you. I'm sorry you were overlooked at that time.

Mr Lansink: That's quite all right.

The Chair: Thank you for appearing before the committee.

1140

LONDON PUBLIC UTILITIES COMMISSION MUNICIPAL ELECTRIC ASSOCIATION

The Chair: The next group we will hear from is the London Public Utilities Commission. Would you come forward, please. I'd like to welcome you to the standing committee on finance and economic affairs.

If the bell goes for a vote around five to 12 or 12 o'clock, we'll come back for the remaining time to ask questions after. We might wind up stopping in the middle of your presentation. It's like being at school: The bell rings and we have to go up there.

Mr George Avola: I understand your predicament, Mr Chair.

The Chair: That's why I've been trying to move the groups along.

Mr Avola: We may pick it up afterwards then?

The Chair: Yes. Would you introduce yourselves and give your positions, for the purposes of Hansard.

Mr Avola: With me are Mr Al Gleeson, assistant general manager of the London Public Utilities Commission; Alex Dobronyi, general manager; Maurice Chapman, commissioner; and Tony Jennings, the executive director of MEA, the Municipal Electric Association of Ontario.

I've kept my presentation a little shorter so that Mr Jennings, when I'm finished, can put in the five minutes we'd like from his organization.

I appreciate the opportunity to appear at these hearings and provide input on behalf of the London Public Utilities Commission.

There are two separate issues in Bill 75: the original and main issue of London's annexation, and the briefly considered issue of the status of the London PUC.

The passage of Bill 75 as proposed will eliminate the London Public Utilities Commission. The responsibility for water, parks and recreation will go to municipal council, leaving a hydro-electric commission of undetermined status.

While claims have been made that the dissolution of the PUC will result in better planning and the saving of millions of dollars, none of these claims has been verified. The fact is that just as annexation costs money, the dissolution of the PUC must cost money. These costs might be justified if the result were going to mean a better service delivery system to the community, and that point has not been proven at all.

In our opinion, the dissolution of the London PUC, with the separation of electricity and water, as proposed in Bill 75, is a step backwards, especially if such a move is looked upon as setting a model precedent for other PUCs in the province. The PUC issue requires far more in-depth consideration in order for an intelligent, informed decision to be made.

Common sense would have determined that the annexation recommendations be implemented before the status of the PUC was considered. Doing both things together against a very tight deadline has prevented thoughtful analysis. People would not deal with the PUC issue for fear that the annexation would be scuttled. This is evident in our own city council, where it was a 10-9 vote in favour.

That is our main quarrel with the process. Much has been made about the fact that the provincial arbitrator, John Brant, arrived at his recommendations without consulting the PUC or its ratepayers. These protests are valid. Mr Brant, while he lives in London and is the owner of a local travel agency, does not have the experience, background or knowledge to make such a far-reaching recommendation as the dissolution of the London PUC without appropriate consultation of the other bodies affected.

Obviously, if the boundary adjustment issue had been settled by the London politicians, as it should have been, then the status of the London PUC would not have been an issue at all. It would never have arisen.

The status of the London PUC was never discussed during the 11-year boundary adjustment dispute—never. Nor was it brought to the table by the city of London during the negotiations or at the hearings conducted by Mr Brant. The PUC issue came into the annexation process, in some puzzling fashion, in the final 60 days. This was at a time when the city and the PUC were working together, through a unanimously approved joint task force, to achieve a better delivery of services. We had already taken these steps through a mutually agreed committee, with council and the PUC, to go forward. Neither the PUC nor the task force were alerted or consulted by Mr Brant regarding the future of the status of the PUC.

The arbitrator's role in this instance approached a judicial form of decision-making, in view of the acknowledged intention of the minister to implement whatever decisions were put forward by the arbitrator.

Reaction right across the province was swift and predictable. People objected not only to what was done but to how it was done. This autocratic approach not only disengaged the PUC and its ratepayers from the process but averted meaningful, factual input. It would have been far more productive if those embroiled in the issue had been able to direct themselves towards setting up a utility delivery system that would meet the needs of its customers and be in tune with today's market.

The implementation of Bill 75 as proposed will meet neither of these criteria. As it applies in the utility business, Bill 75 is out of tune with the direction of forward-looking businesses. Successful businesses in the 1990s are moving away from centralization and bigness. They are decentralizing and layering bureaucracy in order to become more flexible and more responsive to customers' needs and expectations. Businesses today, in order to survive, must put the customer first. Bill 75 is a step backwards because it ignores the customer. In fact, the arbitrator's report never once even mentions the customer.

The London PUC wants what is best for the customer. We believe there is a better way of meeting their needs than what will result from the implementation of Bill 75. The question now is, will anybody listen? We present our recommendations to you in the hope that goodwill and common sense will prevail.

We put forward our belief that an independent public utility responsible for electricity and water, under a separately elected commission, will provide the optimum utility servicing to the customer. Keeping water and electricity together as a PUC will eliminate many of the operational and human resource problems now surfacing during the city-PUC transition meetings. Water and electricity are a natural fit, because they are purchased by the same customer and they share the same customers and operational support systems, thereby creating great economy of service to the customer. There's no duplication.

These are strong arguments in support of the public utilities. Here are additional factors:

Water and electricity are essentially businesses, which differ significantly from other services provided by the municipality such as roads or solid waste management. Specific expertise and enterprise are required to manage water and electricity, especially in today's environment. If the PUC is dissolved, the water enterprise will merely be another function among a multitude of others with which the municipality must contend.

There's a significant difference between serving a taxpayer and serving a utility customer. The utility customer pays for a specific product through user fees and has a set of needs and expectations that the utility must satisfy continually. The utility is a business enterprise and is measured by the customer at every point of contact. The utility organization must be aligned to meet the needs of the individual customer. The taxpayer does not pay a fee for service and is not regarded as a customer. As a result, the municipality is not set up as a service organization.

1150

Separate bodies that are responsible for their own budgets are better able to account for their funding, services and projected costs. This statement is argumentative to those who believe that special service bodies should be eliminated, but we are talking practical business sense here, not espousing an academic philosophy.

In Metropolitan Toronto in 1991, money was diverted from environmental services revenue to cover costs in other areas of municipal services. This was an attempt by politicians to keep tax increases to a minimum and yet provide a "balanced" budget. Needless to say, such a move was met with great protests.

There is nothing to prevent future municipal councils in London from diverting water revenues to other municipal purposes, and this is one of our main concerns. Pressure to do so will build as financial constraints escalate the war between the hard services, such as water, and the multitude of soft services that councils must finance.

A separate utility must operate from its revenue base. It is directly accountable to the ratepayers and therefore can operate far more effectively. You heard our mayor say earlier today that our rates are among the most favourable in all of Ontario, and that's only by good management, not by politicians.

This initiative calls for utilities, primarily water purveyors, to be established independent of other budget centres—

The Chair: You are not knocking the chair, are you?

Mr Avola: Hey, listen, you've got to wear the hat.

The Chair: Carry on. Sorry.

Mr Norm Jamison (Norfolk): Try wearing it.

Mr Avola: I have, probably longer than you, sir.

The dissolution of the PUC is contrary to the current provincial initiative through the Ministry of Natural Resources, which is entitled Toward a Water Efficient Ontario. This initiative calls for utilities, primarily water purveyors, to be established independent of other centres.

Two principles established in the initiative, namely full-cost pricing and dedicated funding—water funding used only for water purposes—are best guaranteed through an independent utility.

One could argue that it could be more productive to incorporate waste water issues under a PUC than to transfer water responsibilities to a municipality. This provincial initiative has been under review for some time, whereas the decision to dissolve the PUC was made in simply 60 days.

Let's take a longer look at water management and the role of local utilities. An electric and water utility in London is the best structure for providing quality customer service. Mr Brant's rationale for transferring water to the city is that water and sewage are a single subject in both the planning and provisions of an area's infrastructure and cannot be managed independently. He ignores the fact that they have been operated independently, and successfully, for years by the London PUC on the water end. He might be right from a technical perspective. However, he is wrong from a customer perspective.

The question is: Who do we serve, the customer or the engineering system? You must understand that all the customer services for both water and electricity will continue to be provided by the customer services department at the hydro-electric commission. Mr Brant's approach joins the operational end and disjoins the customer service end.

Currently, through cooperative integration, the customer service, electric and water departments of the London PUC deliver quality utility services at rates and delivery costs that are among the best in the province.

To tear apart and duplicate the existing customer and operational support systems will only add to the delivery costs for water and electricity. It can only add to the costs.

On that one issue, we had a directive from board of control in our last commission meeting instructing us to raise the water rates to the consumer in London a little more than we normally would to cover some additional cost of piping.

It's easier to join pipes than to coordinate service to the customer, which is ongoing and constant. Mr Brant's recommendation to separate water and electricity creates confusion for the customer, especially given the annexation and a host of problems for staff.

In summary, including the dismantling of the PUC in the annexation issue has proven to be the wrong approach. It introduced an issue requiring consultation and analysis into an already confrontational area. Whatever chance existed for reasonable dialogue was pre-empted by the arbitration process which was not inclusive, but in fact exclusive.

Something has gone terribly wrong. A successful business employing some 540 full-time people is about to be dismantled and restructured without one single piece of evidence on how that will impact on delivery costs and the quality of customer service.

The Chair: I'm going to have to call for a recess, in time for the vote. There are five minutes until the vote and maybe another five minutes on the vote, so we should be back between 5 and 10 after. Okay? This committee is recessed until a little after 12.

The committee recessed at 1158 and resumed at 1224.

The Chair: We'll bring this committee back to order. Would you like to carry on where you left off.

Mr Avola: In summary, including the dismantling of the PUC in the annexation issue has proven to be the wrong approach. It introduced an issue requiring consultation and analysis into an already confrontational arena. Whatever chance existed for reasonable dialogue was pre-empted by the arbitration process, which was not inclusive but exclusive.

Something has gone terribly wrong. A successful business employing some 540 full-time people is about to be dismantled and restructured without one single piece of evidence on how that will impact on delivery costs and the quality of customer service.

We concede that it's too late in the game to start all over. With regret, we accept the transfer of parks and recreation to the city. But it's not too late to pause and to do what is right for the electricity and water customers. Moreover, this can be done without obstructing the transition process. In fact, removing water-related issues will facilitate a smooth transition.

The committee should know that notwithstanding the good efforts of both administrations, the transition of most of the functions will not take place before January 1, 1993. Those transitions cannot be handled until well into 1993, and possibly even beyond.

Leaving water and electricity together will eliminate a host of problems. It will alleviate employee problems, both union and non-union, and minimize customer confusion. Finally, it will send a message to other utilities across the province who still feel threatened that reason can prevail and that cooperation and consultation can work.

We request the members of this committee to support our sensible position by recommending the appropriate amendments:

(a) That a public utilities commission responsible for electricity and water be established (subsection 21(1)); and

(b) That the public utilities commission shall consist of five persons, of whom the head of council shall be one by virtue of his or her office and others shall be elected by general vote at the elections held under the Municipal Elections Act (clause 21(3)(b)); or

The question of elected versus appointed commission be put to the electors for decision by way of plebiscite during the 1994 municipal elections.

With that, I will pass it over to our executive director of the MEA at this point.

Mr I. H. Jennings: We appreciate the opportunity to be here. I'm here for our chairman, who's elected by the 312 municipal utilities that MEA serves. Doug McCaig is an elected commissioner in Fort Frances Public Utilities Commission. We also have an elected president, who currently is Keith Matthews, the general manager of Brampton Hydro-Electric Commission, which has an appointed commission.

As you might expect from that, the MEA is not taking a position consciously for or against PUC versus HEC, for or against the elected or appointed nature of commissions, but we have responded to concerns expressed by our member utilities across the province about the process, and you have a brief in front of you.

Just a quick word. The Municipal Electric Association, as I mentioned, serves 312 municipal electric utilities, about half of which also provide water and/or other services. That's not our area of responsibility. Most of MEA's activities are focused on cooperative action to reduce costs or improve services within the member utilities. But on issues where there is a collective concern, we also try and serve as the voice. The spokesman would normally be here. Let me, if I may, draw your attention to just a couple of points in the brief you have, towards the bottom of page 2 and the top of page 3. As I've said, we've not taken a position except on the process.

1230

Bill 75, as it's currently worded, would override the local ratepayers' past choice of how the utility is organized and their right to elect a local commission.

As recently as the last municipal election, such issues were on the ballot in two municipalities. The Public Utilities Act processes are there and can serve this purpose. As it says at the top of page 3, it is important to recall that the restructuring of the utilities commission was not an issue before the arbitrator. It's our understanding that the public utilities commission provided input at the staff level simply to indicate that they were capable of handling the service in the expanded area.

At the bottom of page 3, I think you'll see several things which Mr Avola has already referred to, so I won't run through them, but there have been several indications that the citizens strongly support maintaining the status quo. For instance, at the open meeting held with the London city council, in the over two hours of discussion of the PUC, it's my understanding that virtually all of the 30 presenters spoke in favour of the PUC. Only one person questioned the process; nobody spoke against it. The impression our board of directors has is that the citizens who are interested in the issue have expressed a strong interest in maintaining the current arrangement.

We've made some recommendations. I won't go through them in detail. They or other wording would suggest simply amending part II of the bill to allow the PUC to carry on. We have not spoken about the annexation issue at all. We've also offered an alternative, which relates to what Mr Avola has just said to you. If in fact you don't believe that the citizens have had an adequate opportunity, or that the expressions they've had in the petitions and so forth are not adequate, then there is the possibility of a further referendum.

Mr Avola: If I may add just one thing, in an official poll that a pollster was hired to do, the percentage was astounding: 79% of the people polled favoured an elected commission and favoured that the PUC be left where it is and not be taken over by city council.

The Chair: Looking at your amendments at the back—just for some clarification, I don't know—in London would that be elected by wards or at large?

Mr Avola: At large.

The Chair: Okay, fine.

Mr Winner, I thought you had a question there.

Mr Winner: No.

Mr Eddy: Not on this issue he doesn't. He's afraid of this one. He knows he's wrong.

I calmly approach this, of course, but I want you gentlemen to know and appreciate that what the people want has nothing to do with this bill whatsoever. You better realize that right now. What the citizens want has nothing to do with this process.

I would like to ask, because I cannot find out, how did this issue of the PUC become part of this bill? PUC was never mentioned by any person at any time, elected or appointed, during the fact-finding process, the boundaries and negotiations process and all the negotiations afterwards. I don't know, but it's my understanding it never came up in any of the arbitrator's hearings. Perhaps it did. But enlighten me.

The title is wrong. The title of this bill does not recognize that the PUC is involved. If there's one thing a local council is capable of—because we've heard of many things that the city of London is equipped and capable of doing—it should be dealing with an internal city of London position. Could you tell me, did you ask for this to be included in the bill? Where did it come from?

Mr Avola: The date that we found out that the PUC was included in this annexation paper was the day the minister came to London and read the report to us, to all interested parties of the annexation process, and in that there was a paragraph that said "and the PUC." That was our first knowledge the PUC had any involvement in this whatsoever.

Mr Eddy: So it wasn't part of the arbitrator's hearings, it wasn't in the arbitrator's terms of reference or mandate or anything like that.

Mr Avola: Nor one interview nor one question.

Mr Eddy: Do you believe it's time for the New Democratic Party to change its name to the New Dictatorial Party?

Mr Sutherland: Excuse me, Mr Chair—

Mr Eddy: That's what it is.

Mr Sutherland: Let's be quite clear that all governments have to make decisions. I can cite examples from when the Liberals were in, from when the Tories were in, when people didn't feel—

Mr Eddy: There were many mistakes made and that's why we're not the government.

The Chair: We have questions of the witnesses here, not the performance of past governments or this government.

Mr Avola: Thank you. I agree with that.

The Chair: Just to clarify for me, what is the date that you first found out about this? Was this in April or was that in September?

Mr Avola: April 3.

The Chair: Okay, fine. You know, the two dates when the minister was down there for the hearings—

Mr Avola: Which was the announcement date of the decision.

The Chair: So you had a chance at the end of September to make a submission to the minister at that time in London?

Mr Avola: This past September?

The Chair: Yes.

Mr Avola: Yes.

The Chair: I was a little confused with the questions that Mr Eddy was asking there.

Mr Eddy: We weren't invited.

Mr Avola: No. It was more or less a one-man commission. I believe Mrs Cunningham was there.

Mr Sutherland: And Mrs Mathyssen, Mrs Boyd and Mr Winninger.

Mr Avola: Yes. But the minister had mentioned it was a done deal, as far as he was concerned.

The Chair: Mrs Cunningham, would you carry on?

Mrs Cunningham: Yes. It's interesting, Mr Chairman, our former mayor of London here sitting so nice and calmly in his new CEO position, as opposed to our former, illustrious CEO from Middlesex. You can see the stress it does take when one becomes an elected official. Having said that, we get along very well.

I have a couple of questions, because I think I'm on record as saying I was absolutely shocked to see that this became part of the process. It was a very grey area, I felt, in the mandate, if it existed at all, and I think it's really shed a negative light on what could have been a very much more positive end result with this, because it was the biggest issue in discussion for a number of months, and now some of the concerns have been discussed, so that at least employees have a feeling that they know what may happen.

I know one of the reasons the public is very concerned about an arbitration process—and we talked about the land before—would be this one, and that's the dismantling of an elected body. So I want you to speak to that and talk about it in the future. I don't know what we can do about the present, but we are going through clause-by-clause and I do thank the Municipal Electric Association for its amendments, which I hope will be taken seriously.

The second one is on the whole process of this public utilities commission affair and I'd like to ask you what you think the best organization would be, either for London or anywhere, because a lot of people are confused about who should be responsible for water, electricity and, in our case, parks and recreation. I'm sure you've given it some thought.

Mr Avola: As an elected person, I've been sort of on both sides. I was on city council for many years. I was on city council when we first started talking about this annexation. This next annexation that was to take place some time in the 1980s was to be sufficient to provide land to the city of London to the year 2020. Mr Gleeson there was mayor at the time, as a matter of fact. At that time it was determined that we would ask for 15,000 acres, and that would do us to the year 2020. We could in fact be argued down to 7,500 acres.

As it's turned out, and I don't know how, some 73,000 acres have been turned over to the city of London for annexation purposes. That should last them to the year 2200 and something, I would guess. But that's neither here nor there.

As far as operating the public utilities commission, the water is concerned, let me give you a brief example of what happens now with electric and water when we are budgeting. Our budgets are set, they're brought before us, we go over each item and we try to be very responsible in setting budgets. They're pretty well determined by Ontario Hydro and the ministry here as to what your water rates or electric rates are going to be. We will then budget for that year. At the end of an operating year, if there is money left over—and oftentimes there is—in either electric or water or both, that money is reduced from the next rates that are given to us by Ontario Hydro or the ministry for the water. So we reduce the rate by whatever happens to be left in that budget. That will never, ever happen again if the water's taken over by city council.

As I said earlier, in our last meeting of the public utilities commission, the mayor came in with a directive from board of control asking us to increase the water rates an extraordinary amount to look after the pipes, the new water connection. The mayor's been on the public utilities commission for seven years because he's been mayor for seven years. He should know that the business end of this, which is run by these people, the administrators, had looked into this many years ago and they had made provisions for a slow increase in rates to look after the expansion of the water required for the city of London and the annexation.

We have in fact in excess of a $14-million reserve to look after these costs. Right away the politicians in council want to raise rates. I'm going to tell you, every percentage it goes up, that just keeps multiplying, Mr Chairman, as you well know. This is happening, and going to happen, with electric, though electric isn't really affected, because you're going to have a hydro-electric commission. It's going to be stripped down so much, but you still have over 300 employees who will remain with the hydro-electric commission.

They say there's not going to be duplication of services. That's not possible, not to have duplication of services. So it's going to cost us more to give electric to the users in the city of London. Down the road five years, I'm going to tell you, we won't be able to sit before you and brag about the reasonable cost of providing water and electric to the citizens of the city of London if you separate water and electricity. It's just foolishness to even think about it that way. It's like saying, "I've got to go get a tooth out, but I'm going to go to my general practitioner."

The Chair: I'd like to thank you for appearing before this committee. The clock has run out. I think actually we gave overtime because of the break we had there.

Mr Avola: On behalf of the MEA and on behalf of the public utilities commission, I wish to thank you and all of your members, Mr Chairman. You've been very fair with us and very kind.

The Chair: Thank you for appearing.

This committee will be recessed until 3:30 this afternoon.

The committee recessed at 1243.

AFTERNOON SITTING

The committee resumed at 1551.

The Chair: I call to order the standing committee on finance and economic affairs, on Bill 75, An Act respecting the Annexations to the City of London and to certain municipalities in the County of Middlesex.

Mr Sutherland: Just a point: I think it's important to let people know at this time that the House leaders did meet this morning. What they decided is that while we originally were going to have two days of clause-by-clause vote, we'll only be having one day so we can have one more day of hearings from interested parties. Is that your understanding?

The Chair: That's my understanding, and I'm glad you brought that up at the beginning. The other thing is that we agree that written submissions handed in until next Friday will also be on the record; it is extended from this Friday until the following Friday. Agreed? Okay, fine.

MIDDLESEX COUNTY BOARD OF EDUCATION AND TEACHER AFFILIATES

The Chair: The next group we have is the Middlesex County Board of Education and the teacher affiliates, if you could start off.

Ms Donna McIlmoyle: My name is Donna McIlmoyle and I am the chairperson of the Middlesex County Board of Education. With me are Mr Ted Anderson, the director of the Middlesex County Board of Education; Ruth Jackson from the Middlesex Women Teachers' Association, who is representing the three affiliates; and Jack Sifton, the president of Ontario Secondary School Secondary Teachers' Federation for Middlesex, and chief negotiator for the teachers.

The Middlesex County Board of Education wishes to extend sincere appreciation for the opportunity to submit its position on the London-Middlesex Act and its impact on our education system. We hope to represent the interests of a number of stakeholders in our county education system, many of whom made impressive presentations in support of the system during the arbitration hearings held at numerous locations throughout the county.

For the benefit of the standing committee members who may not be familiar with the county's school system, we would like to provide some detail. The Middlesex County Board of Education provides education to over 11,000 elementary and secondary students, as well as adult students, in a number of sites throughout the county. These services are provided in 27 elementary, five secondary and five special-program schools as well as an adult education centre.

Students come to these community schools from both small urban and rural settings. As a result, the schools have a noteworthy community atmosphere that is valued by county residents. In many situations, these schools are central to community activities.

In 1969, the province joined many small school boards to form the Middlesex County Board of Education. Our system has grown since then to the point where, within the province, we are an average-sized board with an average assessment base. The board's staff and its ratepayers are justifiably proud of the county education system that has evolved and are eager to maintain its viability.

Excessive adjustments to municipal boundaries will diminish the capacity of the board to continue to provide quality programs. Therefore, trustee concerns as they relate to the institution of education centre around such issues as assessment, school size and availability of community schools.

Indiscriminate adjustments of boundaries have the potential to reduce dramatically the commercial-industrial assessment base of the board, to take away some schools and to reduce the enrolment of other schools, making their operation educationally and economically difficult.

The lines established in this legislation do just this, so we must clearly indicate that we are not insignificant in this whole issue. While the Board of Education for the City of London has over four times as many students and staff, it is not operated in isolation from the Middlesex County Board of Education.

For instance, in areas where the county board of education is unable to mount special education and French first-language programs due to insufficient enrolment, the Middlesex county board has been able to purchase programming from the Board of Education for the City of London.

Furthermore, a number of cooperative projects have been undertaken by the boards over recent years. For the past year, the two boards, along with the London and Middlesex County Roman Catholic Separate School Board, have initiated numerous detailed studies of areas where cooperative services can enhance the delivery of service within the systems while reducing the cost to local ratepayers. Both boards recognize that this matter is not one of their own making, but is brought on by municipal action. Neither board has had any strong desire to alter its current jurisdiction.

Both boards were pleased that the Minister of Education agreed to adopt one of the arbitrators' recommendations, that being that the two boards be left to reach a local agreement on the educational implication of annexation.

At the hearings held in London on September 24 and 25, 1992, the Minister of Municipal Affairs admonished the Middlesex county board for its interpretation of his very important open letter that was published in the London Free Press regarding the impact of legislation on boards of education. He indicated that while his letter stated that there will be no changes to the two boards as a result of the legislation itself, the two boards should be meeting in order to resolve educational boundaries.

A review of the ministry amendments to Bill 75, finance, page 11, confirms that the legislation has no direct application to educational jurisdictions, "Given that school board boundaries are not changing by virtue of this act."

The boards have also been criticized for looking for a solution out of Toronto, when that has not been the case at all. What the boards have been looking for is some guidance or guidelines out of the ministries that would help us get on with the local solution. Asking for such guidelines and guidance should in no way be interpreted as trying to hand over the decision to provincial officials so that the boards can criticize any decision after the fact.

On the surface, it may sound easy for such negotiations to take place and an amicable solution be reached forthwith, but it must be recognized that local municipal discussions on annexation have taken place for 10 years, and intensively within the past four, with no local resolution.

The county board appreciates the dilemma its county officials have faced, since it is apparent that when you enter such negotiations that you do not do so to win or lose but to determine just how much you are going to lose.

We would like to outline some of the difficulties in coming to a local agreement. First, we like what we have, and ratepayers and the parent community have solidly supported this board in its efforts to maintain its viability in this process. Where there is a lack of support for our board's position, it is clearly understood by the board as to the circumstances for this position. Furthermore, there is confidence that this lack of support is confined largely to one area of the county.

Any people—educators, politicians—who tour our schools are impressed by the quality of programs and services offered to students. While these schools may not have as extensive program offerings as in larger urban centres, they have received program recognition at both the regional and provincial levels. Only those familiar with the funding limitations on rural boards of education truly appreciate the quality of programs offered while responsible financial limitations are maintained.

1600

Second, we realize that to accept the unusual provision of school boundary legislation currently represented by the new Bill 20 under the Education Act has serious implications for our board. Specifically, if we were to concede the area to be annexed as outlined in the legislation, we would be giving up educational tax revenues from the most assessment-rich commercial and industrial land in our county. Coupled with the loss of residential revenue in the affected areas, the very viability of our board is threatened.

Those who suggest that educational grants will make up the difference because we become a poorer board would be wise to understand that such grants will not cover the over-ceiling expenditures of the board. We trust that you are aware that almost every board in the province is operating over Ministry of Education ceilings. In short, the commercial-industrial assessment included in the annexation legislation is critical to the operation of the Middlesex County Board of Education.

Third, we have had no encouragement from the office of the Minister of Education that any type of compensation would be awarded to the board, in spite of the precedent being set in the municipal provisions of this legislation. It is our position that enhanced revenues are necessary for our Middlesex County Board of Education to continue to offer the quality of programs that it has over many years.

The spectre of amalgamation looms large in the minds of many involved in the educational aspects of this matter. Both boards involved are on record as opposing this alternative, for reasons that become readily apparent on the financial as well as the jurisdictional side, yet we are negotiating with this provincial interest hanging over us.

Finally, if we were to take the alternative that suggests that Bill 75 has no impact on the jurisdictions of the two affected boards, we run the risk of alienating the ratepayers in the annexed areas. These people would be asked to pay the city level of taxes without access to the city level of programming and services. The county would not be in a position to offer such enhancements either to the annexed areas or to the whole Middlesex system. The Middlesex board also fully appreciates the London board's concern over this alternative, as it clearly interferes with any desire that it might have to operate all schools within the boundaries of the city.

In summary, we submit that as the affected boards attempt to work their way towards a local agreement, the Middlesex County Board of Education retains its vision that the appropriate political structure requires that the future needs of the public school ratepayers be met by two viable public boards of education, one for Middlesex county and one for the city of London.

The tremendous impact of the legislation on Middlesex county is exemplified by the expectation that approximately 29% of the county's tax assessment base will be lost due to annexation. As a result of this dramatic loss in the tax assessment base and the serious loss in revenue, the county has expressed genuine concern to the Minister of Municipal Affairs about its ability to provide quality services to the residents of the county.

If the county cannot continue to provide services to its residents without financial assistance from the city of London or the province, then the county school board is in no different position. Applying the boundary lines established in the London-Middlesex annexation bill confirms that the Middlesex County Board of Education stands to lose approximately 35% of its commercial-industrial assessment and approximately 10% of its residential assessment base. These two figures combined indicate that the board would lose approximately 24% of its assessment base, when in fact it would be reducing its costs by somewhere between 6% and 9%.

It is our opinion that the extension of the educational boundaries to the new municipal boundaries would in fact end up as a windfall of revenue for the city board and a threat to the viability of our county board. We do not believe that this was the intention of those setting out to establish new boundary lines. In short, it supports the position that the county board of education is most reasonable in seeking enhanced revenue to replace that loss if educational boundary lines were consistent with municipal boundary lines.

The Middlesex County Board of Education must remain on record as opposing the current annexation boundary lines. We feel this is a land grab of excessive proportions. We find it difficult to believe that city officials are seen as better planners for agricultural land development and more concerned about protection of the environment. We believe it is more a response to the developer lobby.

We join with the county of Middlesex in supporting the option of the boundary lines suggested in the 1988 city of London proposal to the then Minister of Municipal Affairs, John Sweeney. At that time, even the city was satisfied with requesting the annexation of approximately 23,000 acres of land. This proposal also included the recommendation of coservicing and a shared cost-of-service arrangement between the city and the county. This proposal was, we understand, unanimously accepted by London city council, but did not get beyond the proposal stage because of the opposition of the Ministry of Municipal Affairs.

We believe this 1988 request by the city of London would still provide the city with enough land to expand and is the least costly proposal for the citizens of London, since residents would not face large increases in their municipal taxes to cover the cost of a compensation package to the county. This proposal would also leave the three schools included in the current annexation boundaries within the jurisdiction of the Middlesex County Board of Education. All schools would remain viable institutions and the retained industrial-commercial assessment would continue to ensure the viability of our Middlesex County Board of Education.

We understand there is a reluctance to consider such proposals at this point in the legislation due to your time lines, but we also respectfully submit that the 1988 proposal was never given a full hearing, just as the submission by county council over three months ago does not appear to have been given any serious consideration.

We conclude with the strongest exhortation for a reconsideration of boundary lines and a reduction of this excessive land grab. Failing any consideration of such a reduction, we must seek your support for a resolution of the educational matter that will satisfy the ratepayers within the annexed area as well as those in the remaining municipalities of Middlesex county.

We reiterate our vision that the appropriate political structure required to serve the future needs of the public school ratepayers is that of two viable public boards of education, one for Middlesex county and one for the city of London. I thank you for your attention and consideration of our presentation.

The Chair: I just want to say to anybody standing back there, you can take some of these chairs and just move against the wall. It'd be a lot better. You'd be able to hear better, too.

It looks like we might have about three minutes for questions from each party. We start off—

Ms McIlmoyle: Mr Chair—

The Chair: Sorry, I thought that was the end of the presentation.

Ms Ruth Jackson: This brief is being presented on behalf of the three Ontario Teachers' Federation affiliates of Middlesex county: the Middlesex Women Teachers' Association, the Ontario Public School Teachers' Federation, Middlesex district, and the Ontario Secondary School Teachers' Federation, district 41.

Collectively, these groups represent over 800 educators who provide learning opportunities for the more than 11,000 students served by the Middlesex County Board of Education, the largest employer in Middlesex county, with an annual budget approaching $75 million. Thank you for affording us the opportunity to speak today on behalf of our members.

We also made our concerns known to the annexation arbitrator, John Brant, during the hearings last March. For too long the impact of annexation on the operation of the Middlesex County Board of Education and its students and staff had been overlooked while city and county municipalities have met privately trying to reach a consensus on the future shape of the county and, until last April, denying board officials and the general public access to the debate.

During the process of creating the Middlesex County Board of Education in 1969, the Ministry of Education responded to pressure from Middlesex county, recognizing that the residents wish to maintain a school system which could better relate to and empathize with the needs of rural students. The ministry recognized the immensity of the area to be administered and that special leadership needs different from those of a large urban school board would better serve the rural community. In the 23 years of its existence, the county board has developed both a philosophy which recognizes the unique nature of rural education and a variety of programs geared to the needs of county students.

1610

Children in Middlesex county schools are well-rounded students, receiving an education that goes well beyond the basics. The bond between the school and the community seems to be stronger in rural areas than in large urban centres. The Middlesex County Board of Education delivers the special kind of spirit that lives in our schools. The strong relationship that exists between the schools and their communities allows the schools to tap into resources unique to a rural community. These special resources only serve to enhance the programs, many of which reflect the historical, agricultural and natural resources found in our small towns and villages.

In his April 3 report, which made recommendations leading to Bill 75, John Brant stated, "The Middlesex county board is justifiably proud of its distinctive character responsive to community needs throughout the county."

In many cases, schools provide the focal point of the community. Programs are tailored to rural needs, parents take an active role in school programs and small schools thrive and provide a special education in small communities.

In her comments to the Legislature on October 19, the member for Middlesex indicated that "the Middlesex County Board of Education provides a very unique service for our children and for the county of Middlesex, inasmuch as it provides the kind of education that is geared for rural students and meets their needs in a remarkable way."

It's a board that has provided the kind of education our children need to take their place in Ontario society. Inasmuch as 35% of the tax base on which it depends will be gone, lost through this annexation, we have serious concerns whether our children will continue to receive the excellent quality of education we've come to expect and appreciate from the Middlesex board.

I'd like to outline some concerns of our Ontario Teachers' Federation staff members:

(1) Career aspirations: Many teachers have already made or have begun to make plans for career advancement within the Middlesex County Board of Education.

(2) Attitude towards staff: When the county board was created in 1969, there was a merging of equals into one board, where all learned from the experience of others. There were neither large nor small boards.

(3) Staff adjustment: If schools are annexed into the city, staff will experience stress as a result of the clash caused between the distinct corporate cultures of the London and Middlesex boards of education.

(4) Loss of identity: Being associated with a small rural board has permitted staff members to appreciate the close-knit relationships that have developed with other teachers, administrators and elected trustees over the years.

(5) Employment conditions: Although the continued employment of annexed teachers is guaranteed through the Ministry of Education, regulation 56, section 3, teachers are concerned about maintained seniority, transfer policies, placement in appropriate salary categories and contractual benefits.

The teachers of the Middlesex County Board of Education, while not being immediately affected by the enactment of Bill 75, have an interest in that section 56 of the bill empowers the Minister of Education to alter the boundaries of the school divisions of the Middlesex County Board of Education.

There are no historical or legislative precedents that would lead teachers to believe that altered school board boundaries would be allowed to differ markedly from municipal boundaries, and in fact, politically, have every reason to believe that the London board of education would expect that its boundaries would coincide with those of the city of London. Although the local boards have been directed to arrive at a local settlement, we believe that outside constraints from the province, and the interests of city residents, will in fact mandate the nature of that settlement.

Since the release of Brant's report, our concerns have been heightened by the large area of the county to be annexed under Bill 75, the major impact of the loss of taxation revenue without a corresponding loss in responsibility to provide services to residents and by the continued failure of the government of Ontario to provide or mandate a funding model to keep Middlesex county and its component municipal jurisdictions viable entities.

In fact, the arbitrator suggested restructuring and looking for new partners, which has already resulted in talks such as those between West Nissouri township of Middlesex county and Zorra township of Oxford county. This could only lead to a further breakup of our county.

We, as teachers, have every reason to believe that the provincial government will take the same approach to educational jurisdictions. No additional external funding will mean that the Middlesex County Board of Education will no longer have access to sufficient revenue to offer the same high-quality programs county students need and want. It also seems clear to us that the London board of education would have little or no reason to forgo any of the additional revenues that would be generated from the additional assessment it would require.

What choices are there then to be made to provide educational services within the remnant Middlesex county? We offer three.

Choice 1: Maintain the current boundaries of the educational jurisdictions, both from a student and an assessment perspective. But there are problems. City of London residents would be without the London board of education services. There would be an inconsistency of boundaries as compared with those of the Education Act. London city council would indeed be setting the mill rate for the Middlesex County Board of Education levy and therefore there would be two educational mill rates within the city of London.

Choice 2: Alter the educational boundaries according to the municipal boundaries. Again, there are difficulties. The Middlesex County Board of Education would require additional funding to maintain services, either from the province and/or the city of London board. Other problems would include: increasing average per-pupil costs, especially at the secondary level because of smaller-school student populations; the transferring of three elementary schools—students and staff—to the London board; and losing up to 35% of the commercial-industrial assessment of the county.

Choice 3: Amalgamate the boards of education. However, this would create problems by creating many extra costs to make the systems compatible—staffing, busing, collective agreements, levels of services and types of services—which will not nearly be offset by any economies of a large system, and dramatically decreasing the representation on the board from rural areas.

It should be noted that this process is an almost exact parallel to the municipal regional government difficulties where the overwhelming population numbers from the city of London would result in those representatives dominating the board. We'd like to point out that during the Brant hearing this municipal scenario was strongly repudiated.

We as representatives of the teachers of Middlesex county strongly support maintaining the current boundaries or, failing that, adopting the new educational boundaries to coincide with the municipal boundaries, provided that adequate compensation for current and further funding needs are forthcoming from the province and/or the city of London.

It also seems obvious that the best way to achieve these objectives would be to greatly reduce the area to be annexed under Bill 75, as we proposed in our presentation to the arbitrator, John Brant.

Thank you for your consideration.

The Chair: Thank you. One question, Mr Eddy, or Ben?

Mr Grandmaitre: One question?

The Chair: We went 25 minutes in the brief alone, so—

Mr Grandmaître: Can I take one half of the question and he take the second half of the question?

The Chair: One question.

Mr Grandmaître: I find it very surprising that two of the most important elements or components of a viable community, the county board and the PUC, were not invited to participate in this annexation, maybe the largest annexation to ever take place in the province of Ontario.

I was listening to the previous speaker, who mentioned the loss of 24% of your total tax base, was it? How will you be able to budget for 1993 with this kind of loss of assessment and no compensation coming from the provincial government?

Mr Ted Anderson: Essentially, I think we'd be in great difficulty to do it at all. I think that's the bottom line. Our per-pupil costs would be quite different—

Mr Grandmaître: Just a second—

Mr Anderson: Essentially, I'm saying that our per-pupil costs for what we could spend on our students in our area would have to be drastically reduced because the local taxpayer could not foot the load.

The Chair: Sorry I cut you off there short. Ms Cunningham.

Mrs Cunningham: I had the pleasure of visiting the Middlesex county schools a week ago on a Friday and it was just as you described them, so I thank you for being here today.

There is a sense of urgency here and I'm just wondering if you have heard from the Minister of Education at all since the last time we talked, which would have been two weeks ago now.

Ms McIlmoyle: No.

Mrs Cunningham: Mr Chairman, I would suggest that you as Chair make a phone call, because I've tried, the board has tried, the teachers have tried and I think it's high time the minister got together with these people.

Mrs Mathysen: Very quickly, Mr Chair, I have a number of questions.

The Chair: One question.

1620

Mrs Mathysen: I'd like to begin by acknowledging the excellence of the Middlesex board. I've been looking over some stats regarding skills with mathematics and science, and I note that Middlesex county students scored higher than the provincial average. So I think it speaks well of what happens in Middlesex county.

Very briefly, the cost of this annexation or amalgamation or whatever comes of this is going to be very high. What cost analyses have been done by the Ministry of Education? If, as was described, there is a dismantling of the Middlesex board as a result of this annexation, what do you think the ultimate results of that will be for students—and I think students are important—teachers and parents in Middlesex county?

Mr Anderson: It appears abundantly evident that the costing would be associated with some of the more enhanced programs that a city could provide, basically, technology into grades 7 and 8, instrumental music.

As far as basic programming is concerned, we feel that we would compare quite well, but those are very expensive programs. They are capital in nature and the supplies needed for those are very high.

As far as the amalgamation of the two boards is concerned, it would produce differences in representation. Related to trustees, for instance, three trustees would probably represent the county when right now 16 trustees overall represent the same area. So the individual's contact with the local trustee within communities would diminish.

As far as the staff and people within the system are concerned, I think it's very fair to indicate that probably everybody on the staff would receive a pay raise, and that raises the question as to why people teach in the county. It's essentially because there are other factors that attract them.

So those would be the major costs that we would see in any changeover as far as that is concerned. Teachers would benefit on that basis, but I think they teach in the county for different reasons, not better or worse reasons, but just simply for different reasons.

The Chair: I'd like to thank you for your presentation, and I'd like to have the PA give a few comments.

Mr Mills: I'd like to comment. Perhaps this will help with some of the comments that have been made. Bill 75 is designed to provide time for the two boards of education to negotiate a local solution, and we must assume that both boards are equally concerned with the provision of the best possible education to the students throughout the region and wouldn't be so parochial as to be unwilling to negotiate fairly to that end. That's the position of the minister.

The Chair: Thank you for your presentation and for appearing before the committee.

TOWN OF WESTMINSTER

TOWNSHIP OF LONDON

TOWNSHIP OF WEST MISSOURI

The Chair: The next group is the town of Westminster. Come forward, please. Everybody has the brief in front of them.

Mr Sutherland: Mr Chair, while they're coming forward, can I just clarify that you said each group now is having 25 minutes because we got started late?

The Chair: Yes.

Mr Sutherland: Okay, thank you.

The Chair: I'd like to welcome you here to the standing committee on finance and economic affairs. There's a time frame of 25 minutes per group, but we've had to cut it down. We've got a vote coming up at about quarter to six, and we want to make sure we get everybody on and get as much time out there as possible. I'd appreciate it if you'd identify yourselves from left to right. You may begin.

Ms Barbara Mitrow: My name is Barbara Mitrow. I'm a councillor for the town of Westminster. Douglas Stanlake is the town administrator. Mr Stanlake and I are here today on behalf of and at the request of the town council in Westminster to give an alternative proposal to Bill 75. Sharing the same time spot as the town are Mr Albert Bannister of London township and Allen Budden, reeve of West Nissouri township. Due to the brief time allotted for the town of Westminster, I'll be omitting some sections of our written brief during the presentation.

The council of the town of Westminster is on record as supporting a modest annexation of town lands, leaving the town economically viable. We do not believe that Bill 75 is in the best interests of the London-Middlesex area. A better agreement on annexation for the county and the city is available.

The municipal elections of November 1991 reflected the need for a change in the leadership of council and several new members of council were elected. However, the minister's action of directing a provincially imposed solution immediately after the election deprived this council of the opportunity to negotiate a local solution.

Recent Ministry of Municipal Affairs reports on the cost to implement Bill 75 have confirmed council's worst fears that the true costs of Bill 75 are not known. We are now aware the province is going to contribute a minimum of $7.5 million to offset the costs of annexation to the city. A better solution at far less cost to all residents of the area must be found as the correct solution.

Westminster council approved a November 1988 proposal of the city of London as a basis for consensus as an alternative to Bill 75. The 1988 proposal has received support from the Ontario Federation of Agriculture, the county of Middlesex and North Dorchester and West Nissouri townships.

The November 1988 proposal is a lower-cost alternative to Bill 75 for all taxpayers in the area. The proposal manages agricultural land in a more sensitive manner and allows the agricultural land to remain in the county of Middlesex. The growing city compensation package to the county, now to be added to by provincial grants, is an added tax which will further burden the property owners and businesses of the city of London and any lands annexed to the city.

A more equitable and fiscally responsible solution is available. Its basis is found in cooperative agreements and mutual use of resources for the area. A local solution could have been pursued except for provincial intervention in 1989 by the then Minister of Municipal Affairs, John Sweeney. His terms of reference, attached as an appendix, prohibited the alternative being discussed. The November 1988 proposal still represents the basis for a local solution which has the least financial impact on all parties, including the province.

Cooperative servicing and agreements can and do work and are the key to reducing the large costs of Bill 75. The 1988 city proposal recognized that the industrial base in Westminster is vital to the economic wellbeing of Westminster and the county of Middlesex. To quote from the city's proposal, "London has no wish to cause serious damage to the tax bases of Westminster and Middlesex through annexation." The city's proposal further states that the cooperative service area is not strategic to the city's land requirements. The city's offer was for shared service at fair cost to the town.

The minister's arbitrator, John Brant, in his report also endorsed shared services. He recommended that intermunicipal services be provided by the city to adjacent communities wherever possible, but only in circumstances where the city received complete cost recovery for services.

Joint service agreements do work, as exemplified by the town-city W12A landfill agreement and the town's agreement to provide the city with sewage treatment service, boundary road agreements etc. Brant recommended shared services be acceptable, the city offered to share services and surrounding municipalities have had a history of shared service agreements. The only party not willing to accept the idea of shared services was, and apparently still is, the province. It was not possible to develop a local solution when the provincial agenda dictated roadblocks to a local solution. Minister Cooke said he wants a local solution, and the November 1988 proposal is the basis for a lower-cost alternative based on shared but fair cost-servicing plans.

The city's 1988 proposal was based on future needs following existing policies and the total amount of land needed was 23,202 acres. The Sewell commission report, due out in early 1993, will serve as new policy direction for urban areas. No doubt the amount of land needed by the city will be affected by the Sewell commission report by reducing the amount of land required. Why make a major error now by allowing the city to annex nearly three times the amount of land the city says it needs for its purposes? The only practical answer that should be considered is the 1988 proposal.

The 1988 proposal would mean a loss of about 20% of the assessment and real tax dollars for Westminster. While this is a significant financial drain, there would be some savings on the expense side, but the loss would still leave the town as a viable municipal unit. The greater impact would be far fewer dollars to the county of Middlesex in the form of compensation payments. The result: The taxpayer gains in the millions as fewer nonproductive dollars are spent in the form of compensation.

The landfill site located in Westminster and nearly five miles from the city's current boundary is the subject of a shared service agreement, currently to terminate in 2006, between Westminster and the city. There is no logical reason to permit the annexation of an additional 40,000 acres of land from Westminster just to let the city control 500 acres of land it already owns. To address the city's concerns, the town is willing to renegotiate the shared service agreement to ensure the city of London has long-term use of this facility. This concession alleviates any need by the city to take a large portion of Westminster, of mainly farm land, just to ensure the long-term use of this existing landfill site.

1630

We believe the alternative now accepted by town council and adjusted to reflect any substantive changes since 1988 is a reasonable local solution, benefiting all in the London area, and is far less expensive a solution to the taxpayers than Bill 75.

Bill 75 is not based on the public hearings chaired by Mr Brant and does not represent the majority of public opinion presented on this annexation issue. The solution should not be a result of developer-driven objectives whose interests are not aligned with the general public interest. The people, if you care to listen, have been telling local politicians and members of the provincial House that they do not want this massive annexation. The rural community of Westminster is very fearful that under the control of the city of London council its economic survival will be threatened and its community will be shattered.

The November 1988 proposal is a local solution which meets reasonable growth expectations of the city of London, does not subject the city of London residents and any annexed residents to potentially excessive tax increases and further ensures the economic viability of the county of Middlesex.

I urge the government to give careful consideration to this proposal and the alternative contained herein and to show that it cares for and respects the wishes of the majority of the residents of Middlesex county.

Regardless of the extent of the annexation, town council supports area rated services which means, through the property tax bill, a property owner would pay only for the services he receives. Area ratings should be mandatory, not permissive. In addition, all costs associated with area rated service should be included in the area rates. Diverse interests of rural and urban mix require a different accounting and cost recovery process of services than those currently followed by the city. A complete paper on area rated services is attached.

The financial impacts of Bill 75 can only be determined by a full financial impact study based on accurate figures. This should be completed before proceeding. Council supports the federation of agriculture in its request that the right-to-farm legislation and the code of practice be part of Bill 75.

The council has been fortunate to have loyal and valued employees who are affected. They should not lose by the passage of any annexation legislation. We would urge that regulations be implemented under section 19 of the bill to protect security of employment and benefits.

To assist the committee, we have completed a clause-by-clause review and it is appended to this submission.

We believe a consensus and agreement on the principles to be included in legislation could be worked out in time to allow Bill 75, in an altered form, to be passed before year's end. We would respectfully request the minister allow the parties one last opportunity to formulate a proposal which would be a lesser cost proposal than Bill 75. Our concerns are for the people of the area and financial future they will face if changes to Bill 75 are not made.

Blind faith that the final legislation will be good for the residents of London and Middlesex is simply not acceptable. In general terms, we believe that a number of sections of the bill must be rewritten to delete reliance on minister's regulations and be replaced by specific wording in the legislation.

Thank you for your time. We would be pleased to answer any questions.

The Chair: We will be having three minutes per party.

Mr Albert Bannister: Mr Chairman and accompanying panel members, thank you for the opportunity to appear before the committee on behalf of the township council and provide comments concerning Bill 75.

London township has put forth its best efforts in arriving at a suitable solution to the boundary adjustment but still has concerns in the following areas: shared services; asset and liability adjustment; adequate compensation; buffer zone.

Shared services: The Brant report, pages 18 and 27, recommended shared services to Arva and Ballymote. There is no mention of the shared services in the existing legislation. The two areas recommended for shared services are within the proposed buffer area. The cost of connecting to the services of the city of London by intermunicipal agreement would be borne entirely by the township in conjunction with the development industry. Shared services are already well established both for the city of London and other municipalities; examples are gas lines and water lines. An agreement in principle for a boundary adjustment with the city of London dated September 13, 1991, provided for shared services for both water and sanitary sewers to serve Arva and Ballymote, with a maximum growth of 1,000 units for Arva and 500 units for Ballymote. The city of London jointly with the county of Middlesex and the townships of London and Delaware requested the Honourable Mr Cooke to conclude the boundary adjustment agreements in principle in September 1991.

Asset and liability adjustment: London township is concerned that assets vital to its future operation may be in jeopardy, and a particular concern is the existing township-owned sandpit, which also provides sand to the county of Middlesex.

London township will retain approximately 175 miles of roads, not including county and provincial roads, which will require winter sanding. London township has a total of 110 bridges and culverts. Only eight of this total will be in the annexed area.

The assets of London township were adjusted by the major annexation of 1961, which reduced the township of London from approximately 40,000 to 5,500. How many times must we give up our assets? The existing assets should remain totally with the township, except for those which are clearly area-specific, for example, water systems.

The sandpit should be excluded from the provisions of subsection 13(1) and remain in the ownership of the township of London.

Assessment revenue lost for all time would be considered as part of the asset and liability adjustment process. The tax base is an asset, as far as London township is concerned.

Adequate compensation: The ability for the township of London to remain viable is dependent to some extent on the compensation to be paid. The following is presented for your consideration:

The township's estimated shortfall after adjusting for reduced expenditures and loss of assessment revenue amounts to $501,256. The ministry has provided various analysis figures to demonstrate the annexation impact. None of those provided to date has been proven accurate. The ministry has tried to show annexation costs as net overall, when general municipal rates are calculated in some municipalities to increase by as much as 52%, according to the ministry figures. The public is being misled with the information being provided through the financial impact analysis. London township is losing approximately 35% of its tax base assessment.

The buffer zone: The buffer zone as it has been described will allow for growth on full urban services. The control of the buffer zone can be and is presently being provided for as follows:

The Ministry of Agriculture and Food requires justification reports for the use of agricultural land for purposes other than agriculture.

Ministry of the Environment approval is required for all water, storm sewer and sewer treatment facilities required to service any development.

The Minister of Municipal Affairs must approve all official plans to allow for any development not presently designated in an existing official plan.

Development on the boundary of the city of London since annexation in 1961 has been virtually nil.

The city of London has urban-sprawled to create the present situation and now wishes to further that urban sprawl on to the rural areas, including good agricultural land.

In conclusion, the township of London is of the opinion that Bill 75 presently before the Legislature, and the current Ministry of Municipal Affairs proposed amendments, do not encompass all of the matters set forth in the Brant report, nor does the compensation package offset the impact of the assessment loss over a reasonable period of time, and allows the city of London to virtually steal the jewels of the county of Middlesex and at the same time place an additional tax burden on the city of London ratepayers.

The legislation as proposed brings with it additional uncertainty beyond the Brant report, as a result of several sections giving the Ministry of Municipal Affairs regulatory powers.

In addition to the items previously mentioned in this presentation, we also draw to your attention the fact that the W12A landfill site is not made mention of in the legislation.

We appeal to this committee to bring forth amendments to Bill 75 before its third and final reading to reflect those issues which have been brought forward by the concerned parties, so as to maintain the financial stability now existing and the current level of service to the lands remaining after annexation; or, as an alternative, that the legislation provide for the boundary adjustment to reflect the agreement in principle, which would at least reduce the magnitude of the financial impact on the ratepayers of the township of London.

We strongly recommend that the members of this committee review the township of London presentation and accompanying documentation which was presented to the panel members at the public hearings in London on September 25, 1992.

I would be happy to elaborate on any of the concerns expressed in the presentation or answer any questions the committee may have.

The Chair: We'll have time for one question from each party.

Mr Sutherland: There's one more to hear.

The Chair: Oh, I'm sorry. West Nissouri.

1640

Mr Allen Budden: If the committee would like to follow along, it's the document with the township logo on it. The township of West Nissouri is pleased to have this opportunity to briefly outline our major concerns with the London-Middlesex annexation process in general and Bill 75 in particular.

It should be noted that the council of the township of West Nissouri has always been, and continues to be, opposed to the annexation of any lands from the township to the city of London. This position is based on the fact that neither London nor the province has ever put forth any compelling justification as to why a federally owned and operated airport has to be within the city of London municipal limits. Our submission to the office of the greater London area arbitrator in February 1992 outlines in detail our rationale for this statement. I trust that each member will review that submission, having regard to the original terms of reference, and I am sure you would acknowledge that West Nissouri's position is a valid one.

However, being in the situation we find ourselves in today, council has asked me to highlight its concern with Bill 75 in the event that it should become law.

Due to municipal restructuring, council has serious concerns over the fairness of section 13 of the bill, which may require a cash payment to the annexing municipality if a particular asset is not taken, but compensation has to be paid. The council also sees an inequity in the fact that no compensation is to be paid for any assets taken by the city.

Under planning, council continues to oppose the concept of the buffer area as being onerous on the remnant county municipalities and should not be necessary with proper provincially approved official plans, and many of them are just being approved now.

Council feels strongly that the W12A landfill site should be made available to all municipalities within the county of Middlesex, as recommended in the Brant report. The huge loss of assessment base in West Nissouri township, coupled with the closure of the Green Lane landfill, where we disposed of our residential waste, has made garbage disposal a very costly item. We now ship our waste to the Ridge landfill near Chatham, adding enormous transportation costs to our ratepayers. W12A seems to be a logical and reasonable solution to our waste disposal problem, which has been compounded by the financial impact of the annexation as proposed in Bill 75.

Council would formally request that this matter be included in Bill 75, permitting all Middlesex municipalities to use W12A.

Under financing, this is the most important aspect of what council feels about the position we are in. We have had a chance to review the financial impact documentation of the London-Middlesex annexation report from the Ministry of Municipal Affairs of October 1992 and would like to stress in the strongest possible terms our dismay with the quality of the report.

Staff have reviewed the document, and their comments are attached as appendix 1 to this submission. Without going into all the details, concerns have been raised over the accuracy of the demographic summary, the roads network transfer summary, the assessment transfer summary, the lower-tier adjustment summary, the local annex assessment impact calculation, the equalization factors used, and ultimately the overall compensation figure arrived at. Without clarification and justification by ministry staff, council is not satisfied that the $350,000 figure is accurate and reliable.

The document has raised, in council's opinion, more questions than answers and therefore begs the question, how reliable is the impact analysis and does anyone know the true cost of this massive proposal?

It is council's view that the financial impact must be accurate when it affects over 370,000 people and, until such time as it is, the process should not proceed any further.

Council also suggests that to evaluate the true impact and cost of this annexation, the school board taxes must be included. I think it's obvious to everyone that there will need to be a change of some sort with the two school boards involved, but we have been told that there will be no change as a result of Bill 75. The actual per cent of our school board's tax bill in West Nissouri is well over 60%, yet it is missing from the bill.

This does not, however, mean that there will not be a change in school taxes at a later date once the two boards go through essentially the same process the municipalities have gone through over the past two years. Council stresses that this is a cost of implementing annexation and it should be known before Bill 75 is enacted.

In summary, if Bill 75 does become law, council would urge this committee to allow the local municipalities to govern their own land use planning and therefore eliminate the buffer. They would urge you to, secondly, review the impact analysis for accuracy and completeness and, finally, ask you to include a provision in Bill 75 for the use of W12A for all local municipalities within Middlesex county.

The fact that there is no compelling planning or public policy reason for the city annexing the London airport; the fact that the city of London, in its own submissions, originally withdrew its demands vis-à-vis West Nissouri; the fact that these issues were only returned to the bargaining table by the initiative of the province; and the fact that to date, no compelling provincial rationale has been expressed for this can only lead one to conclude that there is no foundation or basis for boundary adjustments involving the London airport lands.

The township of West Nissouri is a rural municipality. It has never planned in any way for urbanization, nor has it ever threatened through urbanization or the demand for services the role of the city of London as the urban focus for Middlesex county. The township's lands adjacent to the city of London remain active and viable as rural agricultural lands and as lands to be used for their aggregate resources. There are no drainage or watershed issues which suggest annexation. There is no solid rationale for the London airport being within the city of London, and there is every financial reason for keeping it within the township of West Nissouri.

Without in any way meaning to intrude upon the interests of the city of London vis-à-vis other municipalities or the interests of those other municipalities, the township of West Nissouri respectfully submits that the only reasonable solution to be arrived at with respect to the city of London's boundary adjustment requests would involve a reduced annexation involving no annexation of West Nissouri lands whatsoever, all of which is respectfully submitted.

The Chair: Thank you. Do you have any comments, Mr Stanlake? No. Okay, I didn't miss anybody.

We've run up to 25 minutes; we won't have any time for questions. I think it would be appropriate if we had a telephone number to reach your group in case of any of the members want to call. Do you have that on file, Todd?

Ms Mitrow: May I make a comment? As a member of Westminster's council, I want to make a comment to all the elected people sitting around this table. We travelled down here this morning to make this presentation on behalf of this council. We are a 175-year-old municipality, and Bill 75, this proposed legislation in its current form, would erase this municipality from the map of Ontario for ever.

You have given us 10 minutes—no questions, just 10 minutes. I strongly object to that. I think it's an abuse. I am very angry about this. The city of London had a full hour. I don't know what this means. I suppose it means that to get the government's attention, you have to be a big municipality. Obviously, the small municipalities don't get any.

The Chair: I'm sorry, but this was decided by the subcommittee. I'm the Chair here. I run the time and that's—

Mr Sutherland: If I could just comment on that, let's be quite clear. We had more people than we could accommodate on the speakers list. It was agreed upon by the subcommittee, representatives from all three parties, that first of all the county would come in for an hour and that the city would come in for an hour. That was agreed by the representatives and that is what occurred, and then the other groups came in. That is how they were chosen.

We thought we were only going to have the one day and we tried to accommodate as many people as possible. I understand people's frustration. There are many committees where many people feel they're directly affected and they don't get as much time as they like. That's the unfortunate reality.

The Chair: A short response, Mr Eddy.

Mr Eddy: We could have arranged for more hearing time. That was a distinct possibility and should have happened, in my opinion.

The Chair: But we are following the House leaders on this.

Mr Eddy: Well, they've changed their minds now and there's more time; there is to be more time than we were originally allotted.

The Chair: I'm sorry. I just follow the direction of the House leaders. I'm the Chair and I follow the direction of this committee.

I'd like to thank you for coming before the committee.

CANADIAN UNION OF PUBLIC EMPLOYEES,
ONTARIO DIVISION, LOCALS 4, 101 AND 107
AND EMPLOYEES OF TOWN OF WESTMINSTER

The Chair: The next group is the Canadian Union of Public Employees and the Westminster employees group. Would you please identify yourselves. You have 25 minutes between the two groups.

Mr Doug Wheeler: I'm Doug Wheeler, president of Local 107.

Ms Mariana Grube: Mariana Grube, president of Local 101.

Mr Syd Ryan: Syd Ryan, president of the Ontario division of CUPE.

Mr Ken Brown: My name is Ken Brown. I'm representing the employees of the town of Westminster.

Mr Len Forster: My name is Len Forster. I represent CUPE Local 4, PUC.

The Chair: Fine. Who is starting off?

Mr Ryan: I'll start off. Before I get into the presentation, I'd like to make a few comments also. CUPE is the biggest union in the province of Ontario. I'd like to say that I find this process to be totally inappropriate, inexcusable and, quite frankly, an insult to the membership I represent.

I sat here this morning and listened to you say just a few moments ago that you gave the township and the city of London one hour to come in and make their presentations. We have had 15 minutes to make our presentation today. The insult I find is that we have Ken Brown, representing the unorganized workers, having to share a spot with CUPE. The employees who are most adversely affected by this process are the ones who have the least amount to say.

To be quite honest, I'm very very disappointed by the NDP, a party that I helped to elect and a party that I knocked on doors for. I'm absolutely shocked and dismayed that we would be treated in such a shabby manner. I tell you, you'll be hearing further about this beyond this process.

I'd like to get off by saying that this brief is presented on behalf of the Canadian Union of Public Employees Local 4, Local 101 and Local 107. Local 4 was created in 1945 and now represents approximately 400 employees of the public utilities commission of the city of London. Local 101, created in 1944, currently represents approximately 650 office, clerical and technical employees of the city of London. Local 107, organized in 1941, currently represents about 450 outside employees of the city of London. The history of these locals in the community is long and rich and they are among the oldest labour organizations in the area.

Bill 75 will dramatically alter the structure of municipal government and the provision of municipal services in the London region. Undoubtedly the legislation will have an effect on the citizens of the area, but certainly its most dramatic impact will be upon the employees of the municipalities and the local boards directly affected.

These individuals look upon Bill 75 with understandable anxiety, fearing a possible loss of employment-related benefits, opportunities for advancement or even their employment. Their anxiety is understandable because Bill 75 offers no concrete answers to their concerns. All it really contains is a promise that something may be done to address their concerns.

In particular, important matters such as job security, protection of benefits, seniority and pensions are not dealt with expressly in this legislation. Bill 75 provides only that these matters may be the subject of regulations to be enacted at a later date by the minister. In other words, these employees are expected to rely upon a leap of faith, and hope that satisfactory regulations will be enacted to address their concerns.

Similarly, their concerns have not been allayed by the city of London, which has responded to attempts by Locals 101 and 107 to address the workplace transition issues flowing from Bill 75 by suggesting that such discussions should commence after the legislation has been passed. It is unconscionable to expect our members to simply wait and hope that these issues will be dealt with at some later date in a way which protects their interests. Instead, we propose that Bill 75 be amended to deal expressly with the worker adjustment problems that may result from its impact.

We now turn to deal with these potential problems separately, so that jobs, working conditions, benefits and job classifications be preserved and guaranteed.

On job security, we believe the vital concern over potential job loss is probably held most acutely by those employees of the London PUC, currently members of Local 4, who, as a direct result of this legislation, will cease to be employed by their present employer. However, it must be recognized that there is also legitimate concern by the present employees of the city of London. These employees face the distinct possibility that as a result of the transfer of other employees into their bargaining units, some of them might be deemed redundant or surplus to requirements.

The job security protection contained in Bill 75 is very limited. It simply requires the city to offer employment to those employees of annexed municipalities who were employed as of April 1992 and who continued to be employed as of December 31, 1992. A similar provision applies to employees of the public utilities commission.

Apparently the only obligation imposed upon the city is to offer employment to these individuals. There appears to be no guarantee or assurance that these individuals will be offered employment in positions that are similar or comparable to those which they presently hold. Thus, a highly skilled person could be offered an unskilled position which would obviously be unsuitable, with the sole protection that his or her wage rate could not be reduced below its April 1992 level.

Secondly, there does not appear to be a continuing obligation to employ these individuals beyond January 1, 1993. If this is so, then the requirement that they be offered employment could be of little consequence.

Furthermore, we find the job security provision for surplus or redundant employees to be particularly weak. While the city or a local board is required to offer employment to any person deemed surplus during the six months following January 1, 1993, an employee declared redundant or surplus after that date does not appear to have any protection whatsoever. This short six-month period of protection can be contrasted with the Brant report, which recommended that such protection extend for a period of at least two years.

More alarmingly, even this very limited protection applies only to employees who were previously employed by one of the annexed municipalities. Specifically, this protection is to be found only in clause 19(2)(b). There is no similar protection for employees transferring to the city from the PUC or from the town of Westminster. Furthermore, there is no job security protecting employees presently employed by the city or the PUC who may find that their jobs are declared redundant as a result of annexation.

It is our position that Bill 75 should contain the assurance that any employee who may be adversely affected by this annexation should be provided with full and complete job security. In particular, the city or local board should be required to provide each transferring employee with a position that is equivalent or comparable to his or her previous position. In addition, there should be an express provision that no employee shall be declared redundant or laid off as a result of the annexation. The complete lack of such guarantees obviously fuels the anxiety of all concerned.

The employees of the affected boards and municipalities have neither initiated this annexation nor have they any power to stop it, but justice and fairness surely demand that they be protected from losing their employment as a result of it.

We note that there is legislative precedent for such job protection provisions. In particular, we refer to Bill 30, the legislation that dealt with the expansion of separate school funding and the transfer of employees from public to separate school boards. We also refer you to subsection 136(1) of the Education Act.

Protection for salary and benefits: Bill 75 provides only limited protection of the salary or wage of an employee transferred as a result of its effect and contains absolutely no protection for benefits.

With respect to benefits, we can appreciate that it would be difficult to draft protection for all the specific benefits currently received by employees. We also recognize that there may be some conflicts between the benefits currently received by employees and those which they will be entitled to receive as employees of the city of London. However, these technical difficulties cannot excuse the absolute failure of Bill 75 to deal with this problem.

It surely must be recognized that benefits form a substantial part of the compensation package received by an employee. In order to ensure that employees are not disadvantaged, we propose that Bill 75 be amended to include a provision for harmonization of benefits. Such a provision would require that where there is a difference in benefits, the city would be obligated to ensure that the affected employees receive the superior benefit.

Bill 75 does contain some protection for the salary or wage of the transferred employee. Sections 19 and 24 require that the transferred employee "receive a salary or wage at a rate no less than the person was receiving on the 1st day of April 1992."

It is our understanding that the date of April 1, 1992, was chosen to avoid the possibility that an employer might grant an exorbitant increase to its employees before the December 31, 1992, transfer date. While we can appreciate this concern, it does not seem to be relevant to scheduled wage increases under a collective agreement that was negotiated before April 1992. In such cases, there can be no suggestion that an employer has agreed to artificially inflate the wages of its unionized employees in contemplation of this legislation. In addition, this provision has an unfair impact upon an employee who has received a promotion to a higher-rated position after April 1992.

Accordingly, we suggest that these provisions be amended so that employees subject to a collective agreement be entitled to protection for their rate of pay on the transfer date of December 31, 1992.

Another problem which is not addressed by Bill 75 is the possibility of city employees being required to perform the same duties but receiving different rates of pay. The disharmony that could result from such a situation is not hard to imagine. Accordingly, we propose that provision be made for wage harmonization so that in such situations the affected employees will be entitled to receive the higher wage rate.

We appreciate that these amendments might involve some additional costs to the city, but we expect these costs will not be significant. If it is shown that these costs are significant, we would propose that the province assist the city with the cost of providing wage protection and benefit harmonization.

On the establishment of the hydro-electric commission, CUPE believes that the proposed hydro-electric commission be an independent commission, that it be deemed the successor employer of the London Public Utilities Commission and that the certification certificate be amended accordingly.

1700

CUPE also believes that the collective agreement negotiated between the London Public Utilities Commission and CUPE Local 4 be maintained, including all rights and benefits, and shall cover any employees working for the public utilities commission who may be affected by the annexation. Finally, CUPE asks that all rights, benefits, customs, practices and working conditions which employees now enjoy, receive or possess, shall continue.

On the question of retired employees, we recommend that the benefits negotiated for retired employees who have served the employers and the community faithfully be maintained and enhanced to the point that all retirees receive the best package available.

To assist those employees who are close to retirement or considering early retirement, Bill 75 should contain a severance package for those employees between the ages of 55 and 65, due to the fact that those who may qualify under the OMERS 85 factor do not qualify for Canada pension until 60, at the earliest. Also, many employees between the ages of 55 and 65 do not have the required years of service in the OMERS plan to qualify for early retirement under the 85 or 90 factor.

Over the next five years, retirees could solve many of the concerns the employers may have over retaining employees surplus to the requirements under the proposed annexation.

In general, we'd say that locals 4, 101 and 107 have jointly agreed to the following concerning employees transferred to the city:

(a) That the current Local 4 agreement be maintained for its duration;

(b) That locals 101 and 107 administer the agreement with the city of London under a letter of commitment; and

(c) During the time frame between this date and the expiry of the Local 4 agreement, locals 101 and 107 negotiate with the city of London to merge transferred employees into the city agreements, with the intent of maintaining the superior rights, benefits and wages for all employees.

This position was tabled with the representatives of the city of London and public utilities commission at a joint meeting held between the parties on October 27.

The remainder of our presentation deals with some suggestions we would have to improve the process. However, in the interest of getting on and allowing Ken Brown to make his presentation, we conclude by saying that we find the provisions of Bill 75 to be lacking in specific protection for the employees who will bear the greatest brunt of its impacts. It is absolutely unfair to expect these workers to continue to live with this uncertainty in the hope that subsequent regulations will answer their concerns. Therefore, we propose that Bill 75 be amended to include the specific protections suggested in this brief.

Mr Ken Brown: My name is Ken Brown. I am employed as a municipal law enforcement officer for the town of Westminster. I am here today representing the employees of the town of Westminster, who have identified several concerns that have very serious implications towards their careers within municipal government. Answers for these questions have not been identified from any party involved with the transition process.

My number one topic is to deal with the terminology "employees." The town of Westminster defines the word "employee" as any person who is employed as at the date of the transfer on January 1, 1993, and includes those working full- and part-time hours, permanent and temporary staff, voluntary firefighters and contract people. Under the definition section of Bill 75, it's suggested that the following definition should be included: "'Employee' is a person who is employed by the town of Westminster as at the date of transfer."

Item 2 deals with termination or transfer. The employees of Westminster concur and support the recommendations of the director of the TCOC in her report to the steering committee of September 22, 1992, in particular item 1, that legislation should state that all employees are transferred to the city of London—and not terminated by Westminster, to then take employment with the city of London.

Item 3 deals with benefits. There should be no loss whatsoever of any benefit coverage to an employee as the result of the annexation. It's conceivable that a give-and-take situation could occur. However, if the employee is to receive less coverage with the city, a compensation package should be addressed for each individual—for example, a payment into a retirement fund or a bond or an RRSP or something of that nature.

Item 4 deals with wages. Wages for all persons involved in the transfer should be the same as they are receiving on December 31, 1992, or the date of transfer. Westminster is a performance-based system for merit increases, and numerous performance reviews will be outstanding because of their anniversary date. There are 21, to be exact. The employee has worked for and earned any increase that was received during 1992 and should not be punished by losing any increased remuneration because of the annexation issue.

Item 5 deals with probation or initiation. No employee should be required to serve any probationary period with the city of London or any initiation period with CUPE. The employee's probationary period has already been served with the town of Westminster and any further proof of his or her capabilities would be a duplication and completely unnecessary.

Item 6 deals with seniority. It should be stipulated in legislation that each employee's seniority should be the same in the city as in the town of Westminster for all purposes. For example, five years' employment with Westminster should equal five years' employment with the city and five years' seniority within the union. If the union were to require a catch-up fee, this should not be the responsibility of the employee. "For all purposes" would also include vacation time, various allowances that are available, sick days etc.

Item 7 deals with job security. All employees at Westminster should receive job parity with all city employees. Job security should not be addressed by a time period: for example, 6 months, 12 months or whatever.

Number 8 deals with time-oriented jobs. If an employee of Westminster is involved in a time-oriented job, such as the transition process or some type of planning project that deals with the annexation process, what will happen to that employee when the transition is completed in one or two years?

Item 9 deals with overtime, vacation and sick days. An employee should be able to carry forth his or her overtime, vacation time and the number of sick days accumulated with no loss whatsoever to the employee. If this is not possible or proposed by the city, all of the abovementioned items should be bought out at no loss of any kind to the employee.

Item 10 deals with the offers of employment, which we have not received. Legislation should be amended to read, "All employees who are made redundant either by annexation or county restructuring within the next two years shall be employed by the city of London at salary levels no lower than those of December 31, 1992, or the date of transfer."

Employment offers should include: where an employee will be positioned, including the location; all conditions of the employment; the training available or what is provided. To effectively deal with the transfer, the benefits, wages and seniority, a separate section in Bill 75 should be created as follows: continuity of employment. In the next two paragraphs, it goes on to describe my suggestion for the transfer of employees into the city of London.

In concluding, as January 1, 1993, fast approaches, there are 76 employees of the town of Westminster and their families who are still asking the above questions and we're not receiving any answers from anyone involved in this transition process. I appreciate that we're all under a severe stress load and we, the employees, respectfully ask that this committee assist in lifting a big load from the 76 employees and families by providing answers to the concerns raised in this report.

In closing, I respectfully request that this committee take the necessary action to ensure that no employee will lose because of the actions of this annexation process. I thank you for allowing me to appear before this committee. I'd be happy to answer any questions you may have.

1710

The Chair: I'm going to go to Mr Mills, PA for the ministry.

Mr Mills: I'd like to make a few comments in relation to the statement that was made at the beginning of this presentation. The representatives of the government have spent many hours meeting with representatives of the affected workers in order to address their concerns and as the presenters well know, the government representatives have undertaken to ensure, through regulation if necessary, that any negative impacts on workers will be minimal.

I'd like to comment about the amount of time allocated to the presenters appearing before the committee this afternoon. To say that the lack of time is a reflection of a lack of regard for the affected employees and their welfare I think is grossly unfair. CUPE has been represented on the technical coordinating committee since May, and many of the issues that you've raised here this afternoon are in fact on the agenda of the technical coordinating committee at this time.

Mr Brown: I'd like time to respond.

Mr Ryan: You'd like a response. Gee, I've only got five minutes here, so maybe I'll respond and you can respond after me.

Gord, I don't know how much you know about the ongoing of the committees down there, but we've had nothing but problems from day one in attempting to address our concerns and get our concerns on to the table. We spent yesterday morning having meetings and discussions, attempting to get clarifications around wages and benefits. Now, it's a little bit late in the day to be turning around and saying we've had access to the system when in fact three and a half months after the system began we're still trying to get provisions and protections around the issues we've raised here today.

In terms of the process that's been followed, this is an open process. These are public hearings and our opportunity to have our say. I would expect that the employees, in terms of the pecking order, would at least rate up there with the employers. If you sit down and organize and give the employers one hour to make a presentation, I think it's a bloody damn—I won't get into it. I think it's wrong and I think it's inexcusable to turn around and give the employees 15 minutes and say to the unorganized employees, "You've got 15 minutes and both of you can go and share it." That to me is what I find unacceptable.

I find it unacceptable from a government that I walked the streets and knocked on doors and worked for and attempted to get elected. That's what I find inexcusable. What I say is that maybe you should take a look at who your friends in this room really are and stop treating them as shabbily as you've done in the past. That's what I'm saying.

The Chair: Mr Brown, do you have any comments to make?

Mr Brown: The only comment I have, sir, is that I would appreciate it if this committee would look at this report and give some serious consideration to bringing in some form of legislation to protect the employees. We did not ask for this annexation, and it would appear at the present time that there's a very good possibility we could lose as a result of it. I don't really think that's fair in terms of the employees.

The Chair: I'd just like to make a short comment on the presentations made by the city of London. These concerns were brought forward already in these particular areas and this are just more enlightenment a little bit further than they have, but they've touched on all these issues as they've come before the committee. They weren't there just for the city of London. They were concerned about the employees also. I'd like to thank you for appearing before the committee.

MIDDLESEX FEDERATION OF AGRICULTURE MIDDLESEX WOMEN FOR THE SUPPORT OF AGRICULTURE

The Chair: The next group is the Middlesex Federation of Agriculture. Would you come forward, please.

If you weren't in the room a little bit earlier, we've had to cut it down because we have a vote in the House and we got started a little bit late. If there's time left after your presentation, we'll go up to 25 minutes and have a question period, but you have a full 25 minutes for your presentation. I'd like to welcome you to the standing committee on finance and economic affairs. If you don't mind, identify yourselves and your positions.

Mr Doug Duffin: I am Doug Duffin of the Middlesex Federation of Agriculture.

Mr Bill Irwin: I am Bill Irwin, president of the Middlesex Federation of Agriculture.

Ms Carol Small: I am Carol Small, chairperson of the Middlesex Women for the Support of Agriculture. I'm going to start off tonight. I'm here on behalf of the Middlesex Women for the Support of Agriculture and wish to thank you for allowing us to speak and give our presentation to you today.

From the time of the Brant hearings until this hearing today, we in the Middlesex Women for the Support of Agriculture have opposed the annexation bid. Although we recognize that some annexation is required, we are opposed to the massive land annexation of 64,000 acres of prime agricultural land. Therefore, the first section of Bill 75 that we propose for change is section 2. An alternative proposal for this section, with which we are in agreement, is the Middlesex county proposal of July 1992. We have appended that to your brief.

We support the Middlesex county proposal for the following reasons: importance of agriculture in the life and economy of Ontario; London's record of land mismanagement; the lack of rural representation proposed for the new city, and a confiscation of 38% of the county's commercial and industrial tax base and the further confiscation of all of southwestern Ontario's tax base.

Let's discuss these issues in further detail. We have a valuable non-renewable resource. I stress that most emphatically: non-renewable resource. That resource is land. Not just any land, for in Middlesex county we have the good fortune to live in one of the richest agricultural areas in Canada. Middlesex county has the unique features of superior land quality, favourable rainfall and the moderating climate of the Great Lakes basin. These factors cannot be reproduced anywhere else in Canada.

When people eye our land for development, they are overlooking the fact that this land is already developed. That industrial development is agriculture, the manufacturing industry ranked second only to the auto industry in manufacturing in this province. In Middlesex county, 3,244 farms have $1.2 billion invested in this business of farming. In the London region, farmers produce $2 billion worth of products each year.

In Middlesex county, agriculture is a megaproject that happens every year, not as in the construction business, where it is the boom-and-bust cycle, or an industry that moves south of the border when the head office orders the branch plant closed. Every farm-gate dollar generates $7 into the economy. Job spinoffs in agriculture are significant. One out of five jobs, or 20% of the jobs, depend on agriculture. In the London-St Thomas area, more than 3,500 jobs are in the food processing and beverage industries alone.

Prime agricultural land is less than 1% of this province's vast land mass. The Ontario farmer, the most productive of all workers, has increased productivity from feeding four persons at the turn of the century to feeding 120 people per farmer now. Despite further improvements in technology and productivity, one essential key component is still necessary to produce food. That key component is soil. Recent research from the University of Guelph states that with the current land base—that's right now—and a 30% increase in production by Ontario farmers, in the year 2000 there will be a 4% food shortage in the province of Ontario. That's just eight very short years from now. And in Bill 75, you want to take 64,000 acres of prime agricultural land and give it to a major urban centre for eventual urban development and a regional garbage dump? Mind-boggling.

When you confiscate our Middlesex county land to create an enormous urban centre that will be 80% the size of Metropolitan Toronto, you confiscate the tax base not only for Middlesex county, but for all of southwestern Ontario. You intend industrial and commercial development to concentrate in London only, and not in the remainder of southwestern Ontario. London alone benefits from the larger commercial and industrial tax base.

We in Ontario have witnessed the concentration of a rich commercial and industrial tax base in the Metropolitan Toronto area deprive the rest of Ontario of equivalent services, no matter how many grants are given to try to equalize it in Ontario. A larger urban centre in our midst will further compound the issue and make remnant rural Ontario a deprived region. The remaining meagre tax dollars of the surrounding counties will not allow support of our schools, recreational facilities, senior citizens' homes and roads.

How will the province offset a 38% increase in county taxes or the 10% increase in school taxes and the local municipality tax? Surely not by trying to buy us off with some extra dollars for a few years. Here goes the seed money scenario again, and we all know who picks up the tab on that one: the local taxpayer.

1720

Long-term planning in agriculture is essential. Ten years and even 20 are insignificant in the time of the land. Agricultural stewardship and husbandry require time and money. Farmers living within the annexed territory are not going to upgrade their land or make improvements to their property, because ultimately that land will be within an urban area. The land, in effect, is in a holding zone for development. It is then mined, not farmed.

Speculators are buying and will continue to buy the land at high prices. This makes land too expensive for farming purposes. In the London area, the value of land for farming has already dropped to the point where the Farm Credit Corp has expressed concern over land values. Already apparent in the Toronto area, another effect of speculators' purchases is the cheap rental fee charged to renters of land waiting for development.

In our own province, where farming is in a a slim- or no-profit margin, this certainly upsets the level playing field, as farmers in the rest of Ontario cannot compete against these cheap rents. You can never, ever, protect agricultural land in an urban area. Can we afford to lose 64,000 acres of prime farm land?

One of Ontario's richest agricultural counties, the county of Middlesex, is to become an impoverished area because of Bill 75. Our county is about to lose 38% of its assessment and then is expected to be content with token dollars. Now London has asked for help to pay for annexation costs and you have given it money. So now, with the rest of the province, we are helping to pay for London taking our land and assessment base. The province really has lost its sense of economic reality.

Who is going to pay as the province continues to dictate yet shirk its duties at the same time? Can London even maintain the good services the annexed area currently enjoys?

In closing, WSA wants to caution you that Bill 75 is being watched carefully throughout this province. In its current form and the methods you devised for its conception, you have given a whole new meaning to democracy or the lack thereof. You have stripped a municipality of its duly elected council. Where in any democratic country could this happen? Why did our ancestors settle our country and why have we fought in many conflicts to protect our democratic rights? Surely not to have them taken away by our provincial government. Look at your poppy and think about that on November 11.

Remember, perception becomes reality, and reality is not set on Bay Street but on the concession roads and in the towns and villages of Ontario.

From a local shop window, I wish to leave you with this thought: "A country without farms is a country without a future."

Mr Duffin: At no time has London had to publicly justify anything in this procedure. London's record on maintaining densities and providing hard services is suspect at best. London's density has gone from 32.01 people per hectare in 1960 to 16.89 people in 1989. The average density in southern Ontario cities in 1989 was 27.7 people per hectare. In fact, if what we are to read in the London Free Press is true, the province is going to pay for London's costs in this annexation. A city assuming the tax base and ready to service such a large area should hardly need to be begging for handouts yet.

While Mr Cooke is officially on record as still welcoming a local decision, the actions of his ministry have greatly hindered any efforts. By not having proper figures available as to the net cost of compensation to London and therefore having to take compensation off the table for now, London council has no incentive to continue negotiations.

Level of service in municipal government: Under the present municipal government structure, the area to be annexed is served by approximately 12 elected officials. If people in that area have a concern to raise with council, they can establish personal contact with a councillor, or one phone call to the township clerk can usually get them on the next council agenda.

Under Bill 75, the annexed area, twice the size of the existing city, is represented by one appointed official on a council of 20. After the next election there is a distinct possibility, under representation by population, that there will be no one voice for that annexed area. Rather, the area will be split among several wards.

London city council operates on a standing committee and board of control system. Consequently, city council deals with recommendations from these bodies but does not hear delegations directly.

In matters of planning and policy, agriculture has only been offered advisory committee status. This means that the agriculture advisory committee would report to the appropriate standing committee, which will vary depending on the issue, and if that standing committee decides to take action, it refers the matter to board of control, which decides if this matter is worthy of the attention of council as a whole.

To ensure that agricultural concerns are properly administered and dealt with, we need a committee with teeth. We propose that included in the legislation is an amendment requiring the city of London to establish a rural committee with the appropriate powers to make representation directly to board of control and council on matters relating to agriculture, the environment, transportation, community services and planning for the rural portion of the annexed area. This committee would function as an equal to the three standing committees of council and also comment on its activities from an agricultural perspective. For the purposes of developing the new official plan, this committee would report to the special planning projects committee.

The city's arrogance and paternalism in any dealings we have had with it forces us to demand provincial inclusion of this matter. One city councillor went so far as to tell us that she could relate to agriculture: She had owned a horse that she boarded in the county during the 1960s.

Planning: Bill 75 as presented poses several problems from an agricultural viewpoint in the general area of planning.

(1) The perception of the province is that through the official plan process the city will be able to regulate the amount of land available for development. The reality of the situation is that at the present time developers are assembling tracts of land and they will lobby the city to get these included for development in the new official plan.

(2) There is no mechanism to regulate the amount of land moving out of agriculture and into commercial-residential use. City council has not shown itself able to regulate building to the appropriate density. In an interview this week, the mayor said that the combination of lots of available land and low development charges will be used to attract industry. Maybe the 100-year solution will only last 20 years.

(3) In the development of the new official plan, the city starts with a clean slate and can designate as little land "agriculture" as it sees fit. Those in the annexed area have no choice as to the future of the land they own. In the meantime, the city can get the minister to change zonings without any public input.

(4) When the zoning is changed on agricultural land without your consent, the tax rate goes up. Market value assessment will also increase annexed agriculture's tax burden.

At the time of the zoning change, the previous 10 years' farm tax rebate becomes due and payable without any offsetting increase in income or capital gain from the sale of the property.

(5) Lands designated "agriculture" in the city's new official plan maintain that designation for 10 years from the date of the new official plan, not the date of the zoning change. Any subsequent official plan requires only a five-year time delay. This gives agriculture, an industry with a very long-term vision, a minimal planning horizon. When John Brant proposed the 10-year delay in implementation, it was to take effect the day of the zoning change so that farmers always knew 10 years in advance.

Urban planning: Future planning for urban land use must have significant agricultural input. Development fees, densities and redevelopment will have an impact on the amount of land coming out of production. This annexation has been developer-driven. The city readily admits this and is pro development. The inclusion of such a large acreage in the annexation will entice larger developers with bigger projects. Without a tight rein on raw land supply, there is no pressure on redevelopment of the existing city.

The city's municipal tax structure must be reworked to end discrimination against higher-density housing such as apartment buildings. A city that claims to need more land when it still has enough zoned land for 50,000 units of higher-density housing needs significant provincial guidelines in planning. Once out of production, the land is gone for ever.

1730

On the buffer zone, we feel this is not needed if the official plans of the surrounding townships are as strong as we are led to believe London's is going to be.

County structure: The terms of reference laid down by the province from which Mr Brant made his report, the basis of Bill 75, were markedly slanted towards the development of a much larger and more powerful city of London. What was noticeably missing was an offsetting concern for the viability of the remnant county.

The minister has promised no annexation-related tax increases for the surrounding municipalities for a period of five years and then, on a declining basis, for the next five years. After the 1961 annexation, it took the surrounding municipalities 20 years to recover their tax base. London's large area will make it more difficult this time for the adjoining municipalities to attract new industry. With all the commercial-industrial assessment and the federal grant in lieu of taxes for the airport stripped from the municipalities, agriculture is the one left to pay, and believe me, the cupboard there is almost bare.

The magnitude of income losses for the surrounding municipalities has already prompted some of these municipalities to seek new alliances in regard to boundary restructuring. Bill 75 anticipates this and calls for restructuring within the county. However, the amalgamation of two non-viable municipalities does not create a viable municipality. The desire to maintain the continuity of community could lead to the splintering of the county, as municipalities would prefer to associate with their closer rural neighbour, not necessarily in the same county.

Conclusions:

(1) Implement an agriculture committee for the city of London.

(2) Before compensation is settled, ensure that the ministry numbers agree with the township and county numbers and that it extends until the remnant townships are viable, in whatever form they're in.

(3) The W12A dump: Amend the act to get the Ministry of Municipal Affairs to pressure the Ministry of the Environment to expand the dump for the use of the entire county. The Ministry of the Environment should fast-track this and do it at least cost.

(4) Development charges: Amend the act to force the city to charge realistic development fees. This will promote the conservation of land. Present city residents, some of whom have never received services from the last annexation, should not be forced to subsidize new, extravagant development.

(5) Official plan: Ensure that the redevelopment of the existing city is prioritized over new development. London is headed for a Detroit-ghetto type of downtown, as it is rapidly being abandoned. For this reason, the official plan needs to consider the entire city, not just the new parts.

(6) Amend the act to force the city to rework its tax structure that favours urban sprawl by discriminating against higher-density housing.

(7) Force the city to restrict the raw land supply for development. This will increase the price of land and promote conservation of land.

(8) Enact 25- and 50-year agriculture designations for remote lands. Major decisions are made on more than a 10-year time horizon in farming.

(9) Enact regulations to force the city to be a responsible steward of the land. We have improved the land in the last 150 years that we have farmed it. Do not give the city the right, in a two-hour council meeting, to destroy it for ever through urban sprawl.

(10) Show in the legislation that you are serious about allowing agriculture to flourish in the new city. As a start, put in the agricultural code of practice with the strength and right to farm in the city's new official plan. Do not wait for London's official plan to do this, as the ruination of the agriculture industry in the new city has already started. A 50,000-acre wasteland in the midst of southwestern Ontario, Canada's prime agricultural land, is quite a legacy for one man and one government to create.

Mr Irwin: In the interest of time, I'll just make a few points.

It strikes me that the rationale that agricultural land can be protected by being put within a city, the city of London in particular, is a little like arguing that you're making love for virginity. I just don't understand the whole concept of "We're going to save the land by throwing it within a large urban municipality."

To me, the Ontario Ministry of Agriculture and Food did the single biggest disservice to the rural constituents when it made the presentation to Mr Brant—and I believe it's the ministry's official position—that boundaries don't protect agriculture; legislation does. It seems strange that when we talk about protecting something, we're always protecting something somebody else owns.

As the president of the federation of agriculture—the Middlesex federation; I haven't gone beyond that yet—I think it's important that the only people, the only sector of society, that can protect agricultural land are the farmers, the people who own it. They will only protect it when it is worthwhile and they can farm it unhindered.

One of the most important things, in my mind, for agriculture is to be able to take the municipal concerns you have as a farmer before a council of peers, a council that understands your concerns, hopefully a council that knows exactly where you live and whether the problem you have is personality-based or drainage-based. There are a lot of things that can't be legislated, and it's attitude.

We have worked with the city of London to try to come up with some solutions that we think might represent agriculture and allow farming to carry on within the city of London. Doug has itemized those, and I believe everyone has a copy. We came in a little late. But it gets back to me that the Halton model keeps being put forward. I don't think it works. We're not dealing with a regional municipality here; we're dealing with a city that has a large area of farm land that will probably never be developed, by its own admission.

Representation by population is the ideal in our society, but it's based on the fact that the people within the constituency would be of similar social and economic backgrounds. We have rural municipalities for rural people and urban municipalities for urban people, and ne'er the twain shall meet, in my mind. There are very big differences between the levels of expectation. Carol has said that as rural people we tend to think two phone calls should do it, and those phone calls can be between the hours of 10 at night and midnight, and that's when your council had better be there and better be responding. I'm William the third, and William the second was the reeve, and there were a lot of wrong numbers between the hours of 10 and midnight.

Mr Veel has put forward an idea that bears some consideration. He's talking about equal representation on population within the annexed area. He'd like to see about three wards in the annexed 64,000 acres. That means three wards for 8,000 people. The city of London doesn't seem to be too enthusiastic about that. The idea put forward by the city of London really borders on insulting. They're talking about an off-the-shelf advisory committee—Doug explained it—that goes to this committee, goes to that committee and filters through a couple of levels of administration. That's not going to work. It's not very fast, it's not very effective, and at the end of it, you're going to hear, "I'm sorry, the councillor can't be with you right now."

By their own admission, their special projects and planning committee says, "This special committee has established a council to undertake reviews of the three matters mentioned above," those being commercial policy reviews, zoning reform and official plan review. It goes on to say, "It is anticipated that this committee will dissolve when these projects have been completed." That's the committee that they're going to have agriculture report to. That doesn't sound like a long-term committee with a long-term plan.

It's very frustrating. The other thing that they thought might work to represent agriculture on city council—there's a rumour that the Western Fair board was being considered. It seemed that they were already in existence, and they had some rural knowledge, you know.

The shortfalls in this committee structure were pointed out to Mr Hopcroft at a meeting in Irene's office. His response really offends me, and I think this is where we have real problems dealing with rural concerns in the city of London. He suggested that farmers would be heard because the best two rallies he had seen recently in Ottawa and Toronto were put on by farm groups and that the urban people had a nice warm feeling towards farmers, so you wouldn't want to tick them off anyway. So the rural community is being asked to give up representation by population and taking its concerns to a council of peers in exchange for our ability as activists and advocates and the nice fuzzy feeling urbanites have towards us. I find that insulting.

We're running short on time here, and I would like to have time to answer questions. I believe that an appointed advisory committee can never take the place of an elected council of peers. I don't understand the logic that some people have when they say, "I didn't like the township council I had, so put me in the city of London." One fellow said, "And if they start jerking me around, Bill, I'm going to phone you." That's not the way it works.

The way it works is that anyone should realistically be able to go to the council and be listened to. They should also have the ability, if they're really mad at their council, to stand and get elected and sit where either you people are sitting or the township councils are sitting. That is part of what we call our democracy, and I think it works reasonably well. We have two very different levels of expectations here, two levels of taxation, two levels of servicing. We've got two municipalities.

Any questions?

1740

The Chair: Thank you, Mr Irwin. We won't have time for questions, but we do have a comment from Mr Mills, the PA, and then you can comment back on his reply.

Mr Mills: I'd just like to refer to amendment 26. The bill is amended by adding the following section:

"57.1 The Minister of Municipal Affairs may by regulation,

"(a) provide for the creation, size, composition and functions of a rural issues advisory committee in the city of London;

"(b) require council of the city of London before passing a bylaw pertaining to a rural issue to consult with the rural issues advisory committee; and

"(c) define rural issues for the purpose of this section."

The Chair: Would you like to comment back, Mr Irwin?

Mr Irwin: Sure. That's a start, and I think we've been lobbying very effectively, but I don't think it addresses some of the concerns. First, you can argue that anyone can stand for election. It's an advisory committee. It's making comment to, and if you don't have a council that really understands your needs, you might as well make comment to these pictures on the wall. This is where we have to be careful, I guess. We might get a wonderful council, but I don't know. We haven't had a lot of luck.

The Chair: Ms Small, do you want to make a comment on that?

Ms Small: Yes. Mayor Gosnell might have something to say to you about that, Mr Mills, because the Middlesex farmer says, "Annexation destroys farm land but creates jobs." We don't think it, meaning agriculture, applies to the annexation talks. So much for city council.

Mr Irwin: It's very fine. You're talking legislation; we're talking attitude. I think there's a big difference. I applaud your endeavours.

The Chair: I'd like to thank you for appearing before this committee and for your brief.

BEN VEEL AND ASSOCIATES

The Chair: I'd like to welcome you here before the standing committee on finance and economics on consideration of Bill 75. I've got about six names here. Is there anyone else coming forward?

Mr Ben Veel: Yes, Mr Chairman, there will be later. As these people leave, the other people will come forward.

The Chair: Okay. You can take a spot at the end there, if they'd like to slip in the end there. But you can start. Would you please identify yourself from left to right so Hansard can pick up on who's speaking?

Mr Veel: We'll do that through the process as we introduce each person.

The Chair: Okay, that's fine.

Mr Veel: We appreciate the opportunity to present to you this afternoon some of our concerns. My name is Ben Veel. I am a long-time resident in the town of Westminster.

Annexation was not my choice, but a decision had to be made. Long-term planning is what I believe in: no Band-Aid solution, but planning for a future that amalgamates as equal partners the land of the town of Westminster with the services of the city of London. Bill 75 offers an opportunity of controlled growth into the 21st century.

I would like at this time to introduce our first presenters: Mr Bill Neville, vice-principal of Regina Mundi College, and Mr Tom Mulligan, chair of the parent advisory board of Regina Mundi College. Bill is immediately to my left and Tom is next to him. Go ahead, Mr Neville.

Mr Tom Mulligan: My name is Tom Mulligan, and I will start instead of Bill. Our support for Bill 75 arises out of our concerns for the safety of our children.

At the present time, those students attending Regina Mundi who don't have a full day of classes and either arrive late or leave late are obliged to take public transportation. Public transportation is approximately 4.5 kilometres from the school. It is on a very busy road. It has a great deal of commercial traffic. The road, for two kilometres, has an 80-kilometre-an-hour speed limit and for the bounds has a speed limit of 60 kilometres. They are obliged to cross through the entry to and exit from Highway 401, which is the busiest cloverleaf in the London area.

Because there are no sidewalks on this road, we feel that our children, the students, are at risk from the vehicular traffic. In addition, the road is bordered on both sides by open fields. This, we believe, places them at risk from physical attack and even, as is occurring, as we all know, abduction.

The winter conditions only serve to compound the problems that we see. We believe that if Bill 75 is inducted into law the city of London and the London Transit Commission, which has shown itself in the past to be very aware of community needs, will be receptive to an application for extending public transportation as far as the school.

Thank you for your attention and consideration.

Mr Bill Neville: I'm Bill Neville, vice-principal at Regina Mundi, and on behalf of the students and the families in our school community I'd like to thank you for the opportunity to address you today.

Regina Mundi high school is one of four English high schools operated by the London and Middlesex County Roman Catholic Separate School Board. The school is located in a rural area south of London's current city limits. The student population is drawn from the southern portions of London and the surrounding area as well as southern rural communities in Middlesex county.

Some of the highlights of the history and population growth of our school would be these:

In 1960 the school opened as a junior seminary housing 100 people. In 1969 it became a private high school housing 210 students. The growth in numbers will be increasingly important. In 1983 we continued to have a boarding school but admitted grade 9 day students. Between 1984 and 1987 there was an addition of one grade per year, to the point where we have students from grade 9 through OAC. Current student population has reached 1,800 students; we're over 1,800 students.

Picking up on what Tom mentioned about transportation, there are concerns from an academic point of view as well. It's our hope, as a school administration, that the current annexation will include Regina Mundi. We look forward to a time when the London Transit Commission will extend bus service to the school and its area.

Extending the bus routes to service an expanded south London, including our school, would meet a number of student needs. At present RMC offers over 100 activities that must be operated outside of school hours. As well, the extra help provided by staff and peer tutors must frequently fall outside the regular school day. These activities are available to every student in the school. However, the students and their parents remind us that a large number of the students must experience high school without the benefit of these services because of transportation problems.

While RMC is located outside the city of London, it should be noted that over 70% of our students and 70% of the families in our community live within the current city boundaries and pay residential and commercial taxes to the city. We also see that the 30% who live in Middlesex county would make regular use of transportation services to the city of London.

The second area I'd like to touch on is the area of water and sewage treatment. Regina Mundi high school utilizes a private water supply and sewage treatment system.

In September 1990 MacLaren Engineers was retained by the Catholic schools of London and Middlesex to evaluate and monitor the operation of the sewage treatment plant serving Regina Mundi. MacLaren Engineers is responsible for maintaining sampling records, interfacing with the Ministry of the Environment and preparing an annual status report. The monitoring program also includes maintaining well water pumping records and performing quarterly analysis to determine the quality of the well water.

The water and sewage systems are 30 years old—there's one well—and these currently provide adequate service for the school population. However, the systems are operating at maximum capacity. The age and the demand on the system are of concern. The city of London water and sewage services would be most welcome.

The water supply for fire fighting has been deemed adequate by the appropriate authorities. The water source in emergencies would include the school storage tank which services the everyday needs of the school. It would also include access to the water in the adjacent ponds, feeding by gravity, to a water chamber beneath the west end of the school. Again, city of London water service would be most welcome. I know from conversations with the neighbours that city of London water and sewage service would be most welcomed by them.

There is a long-standing working relationship between the London and Middlesex RCSS board and the city of London. This relationship has been characteristically one of cooperation and combined effort. This effort has included the Regina Mundi facility and community. A good example is the common use of the school recreational facilities by both groups.

On behalf of the students of Regina Mundi high school, I thank you for hearing how annexation can benefit some 1,400 of our families who live in both London and in Middlesex county.

Mr Veel: Thank you, Mr Neville. I'd like to now introduce you to Harry Froussios of the Hellenic Community Centre.

Mr Harry Froussios: Mr Chairman, members of the committee, ladies and gentlemen, my name is Harry Froussios and I'm here on behalf of the Hellenic Community Centre.

Our centre is located on the south side of Southdale Road in the town of Westminster. The city of London boundary presently runs down the middle of Southdale Road. Because we are located within the town of Westminster, we are unable to be connected to city services which are located at our property line. The town of Westminster is unable to provide us with water and sewage services.

Our community, consisting of a substantial number of citizens, is planning to expand its present facility to include a church as well as implementing educational, social and cultural programs. Unfortunately, we are unable to do this due to a lack of important services.

So far as we are concerned, we support Bill 75 and urge you, the committee, to implement it as soon as possible.

Mr Veel: Thank you very much, Harry. I would now like to introduce you to Joan Norris, chair of the Lambeth Citizens Recreation Council.

Ms Joan Norris: The Lambeth Citizens Recreation Council is a community association representing 12 service clubs and athletic organizations. We formed in May as a response to the proposed annexation.

Our group of dedicated people was, and is, committed to maintaining our small-town spirit. We are a vital and active community where the goodwill between local associations works together to benefit Lambeth children and adults.

Our primary goal is to keep our special identity. We wanted this unique spirit to continue and felt through cooperation we could best protect our interests and foster our neighbourhood spirit within the larger city of London.

It was and still is a concern that even though John Brant identified our unique situation, the issue is not mentioned in Bill 75. It should be stressed, however, that working as a citizens group with the ongoing support of Mayor Ben Veel has been fruitful and rewarding.

The Chair: Excuse me. This will be on Bill 40. There's a 15-minute bell.

Mrs Cunningham: You guys can stay here. I'll go vote for you.

The Chair: It doesn't say up there. Okay, what we're going to have to do is recess until after the vote. You'll have your time after the vote.

Mr Veel: Approximately how long will it be, sir?

The Chair: We're looking to see if it's a 15-minute bell, but it could be only a five. It's only a five-minute bell.

Mr Mills: Twenty minutes.

Mr Veel: Twenty minutes; thank you very much.

The committee recessed at 1754 and resumed at 1823.

The Chair: I bring this committee to order again. Mr Veel, you've used up 10 minutes of your time. You've got 15 minutes left.

Mr Veel: I think we'll go back to Joan Norris. I informed her that she could start at the beginning and she informed me she didn't need my permission; she was going to do that anyhow.

The Chair: Okay; go ahead.

Ms Norris: The Lambeth Citizens Recreation Council is a community association representing 12 service clubs and athletic organizations. We formed in May as a response to the proposed annexation.

Our group of dedicated people was and is committed to maintaining our small-town spirit. We are a vital and active community where the goodwill between local associations works together to benefit Lambeth children and adults.

Our primary goal is to keep our special identity. We wanted this unique spirit to continue and felt that through cooperation we could best protect our interests and foster our neighbourhood spirit within the larger city of London.

It was and still is a concern that even though John Brant identified our unique situation, the issue is not mentioned in Bill 75. It should be stressed, however, that working as a citizens' group, with the ongoing support of Mayor Ben Veel, has been fruitful and rewarding. The city of London task force on local government restructuring and the parks and recreation department of the city of London have been receptive to our request to maintain control of our recreation facilities.

We are currently working towards securing an agreement. I am confident our unique community will be able to be maintained. There has been a spirit of true cooperation evident in all our dealings with the city of London. We are anxious to work together to secure our citizens' future recreation.

Mr Veel: Thank you, Joan. Our next speaker was to be Mr Gene Ennis, but what we'll do is go to number 5, who is Pauline Nanni, a resident of South Winds subdivision.

Ms Pauline Nanni: Dear committee members, at this time I would like to offer a videotape to the committee of several citizens of the town of Westminster. They're representative of the agricultural community and the business community. Upon viewing the tape, you will see that they have had extensive community involvement over many years. The tape was made during the time frame of October 30 to November 2, 1992. The citizens were aware of Bill 75 and its contents and wished to make some concerns known before the bill moves to clause-by-clause analysis and final reading.

The input of many hundreds of citizens, presumably with similar concerns, could have been accumulated for this tape. I was directly involved in presenting a petition to the town of Westminster council on May 11, 1992, that asked council to cooperate with the Ministry of Municipal Affairs in setting up effective transition teams for annexation.

The petition, unanimously passed by council in a recorded vote, had 1,357 signatures obtained over a 13-day period, 365 of whom were farmers from the rural areas of Westminster. If time had permitted, many of those people would have gladly offered their final concerns over Bill 75. I am confident they would have echoed the sentiments of those on the tape. Please give your fullest attention to all recommendations on the video as you complete clause-by-clause examination of Bill 75.

Mr Veel: Thank you, Pauline. I'd like to now turn it over to Mr Gene Ennis, a long-time resident of Lambeth, which is in the town of Westminster.

Mr Gene Ennis: There's going to be some overlap between the previous speaker and myself. That's not an oversight on our part. It's our way of underlining what we want to communicate to you.

You, Mr Chairman, members of the committee, ladies and gentlemen, and I have heard many, many presentations from many, many people claiming to speak for the citizens of Westminster. My purpose in presenting this information to you today is to present to you what many of my fellow citizens have indicated in writing, some 1,300 of them, people of Westminster.

I wish to present to you with a copy and an analysis of a petition that was presented to the council of the town of Westminster last May. The nature of this petition has a background. A number of citizens had been concerned with council's negative attitude towards setting up a transition team and dealing with the arbitrator's report. A meeting was called and people were asked to bring a friend.

The petition wording, a copy of which you have before you, was drafted by consensus and a vote of the people present at that meeting. Views voiced ranged from total agreement after stalemates for such long periods of time, to resignation to the situation, to disappointment but wanting a look towards the future.

These citizens then circulated this petition for a period of only 13 days. Verbal responses from the canvassers indicated widespread support for the need to work cooperatively with the Ministry of Municipal Affairs during the transition process. This support was evident in rural and urban areas alike.

I brought forth a motion to council that spoke to this petition, and council voted to cooperate with the Ministry of Municipal Affairs in the matter of transition in order to ensure that all the interests of the citizens of the town of Westminster are protected. Immediately following this, council voted to appoint a representative to the transition steering committee other than the head of council or his/her designate.

Going to the analysis of the petition, you have the figures, you have the areas from which they were taken. I only want to emphasize time and time again that of the 1,335 signatures, 364 came from residents outside the urban areas of Westminster. The 1,335 signatures were from residents of Westminster, not of London, not of Middlesex county per se and not outside the area. They were from residents of my municipality. Some 364 of those signatures were from rural residents. We have the breakdown there for you. We also have the breakdown by ward of the urban area.

Going back to the beginning, it is my purpose to present to you from my fellow citizens—not from what I think my fellow citizens want, but from what they themselves have signed—and you have the copy of the petition before you.

1830

Mr Veel: Thank you very much, Gene. Two issues that must be addressed and remain unresolved I would like to bring to your attention. The first one is representation. Other people today have already alluded to it. Now is the time to put in place a plan that will accommodate the projected future growth. Most of this growth will occur in Westminster. We must recognize this need and create a new ward within the city boundaries consisting of the merged areas of Westminster.

The buffer zone is the most unpopular item in Bill 75. Again, we are dealing with a Band-Aid solution. Long-term planning is the key to controlled growth. When the official plans of the city of London and its neighbouring municipalities have been approved, the buffer zone should become redundant that same day. These two items need to be addressed in Bill 75.

I would like to thank you for the amendments that you have proposed, as they meet many of our concerns, concerns raised by our citizens at public hearings and discussed at transition committee meetings.

Thank you very much for your attention. We'll be glad to answer any questions you may have. We brought a number of people. Some of the people have an asterisk beside their names. If you'll notice, almost all of them are farmers and they're spending 24 hours drying their beans right now. Most of those farmers are actually on the tape you will be receiving, so you're not losing their input.

The Chair: Thank you. What we do have is about three minutes for each party. We'll start off with Mr Eddy.

Mr Eddy: I'm not clear on Mayor Veel's statement about the buffer zone. Did you say once the official plan is in place for the town, once it becomes part of the city of London, that the—would you repeat what you said about the buffer zone?

Mr Veel: I can repeat, but I can explain better, I guess.

Mr Eddy: Okay, please.

Mr Veel: What I am talking about is that the buffer zone requirement is a result of negligent planning right now, so it's a Band-Aid. Once the county, which has to come up with the plan, and the surrounding townships and the city, which has to come up with the new plan—planning is one of my serious concerns that needs to be addressed more seriously. Once they have been put in place and approved by the ministry, then obviously the need for a buffer zone is redundant, because hopefully they'll address the concerns that we have in the buffer zone now. If we're not going to address that in planning, we're doing something wrong.

Mr Eddy: So that's your request to the government?

Mr Veel: Yes.

Mr Eddy: Has it been submitted yet or is it part of your presentation?

Mr Veel: Actually, we have consensus of that, even finally with the mayor of London. He concurs with the same view. We brought it up at the steering committee, and Mr Riddell will be bringing it to the minister's attention.

Mr Eddy: I see. So that's a request you have of the government?

Mr Veel: Very much so.

Mr Eddy: We'll try to support that. The other point was about making the town of Westminster a ward. That would be following the next municipal election in London. The town of Westminster and the annexed areas would become a ward and not be worked into other wards—or what was your viewpoint?

Mr Veel: London has anywhere from a 45,000- to a 65,000-people ward.

Mr Eddy: Yes.

Mr Veel: If we go in there—and I don't need to repeat what Mr Irwin and Mr Duffin said; they were very eloquent in their presentations—there's a difference.

My view is that this is a unique situation that requires representation by population of the annexed area. We would prefer more than one ward, for example, a ward in West Nissouri and London township. Those areas could be ones that are being amalgamated. We'd like three, but you probably think that's unrealistic.

That's why I put in here that we would like to be at least a separate ward and considered, that we don't lose our identity by being absorbed with 6,500 people into some huge London ward where we were would have absolutely no representation.

Mr Eddy: May I ask then, has that been presented to the government and has there been a response to that?

Mr Veel: The city of London cringes every time I bring it up. However, I'd like to point out that there is already an example of it, being Sarnia-Clearwater.

Mr Eddy: Okay.

The Chair: We go on to Mr Sutherland.

Mr Sutherland: I just have a question for Ms Nanni regarding the South Winds issue. Could you give us just a bit of update of where that stands right now in terms of the problems being corrected?

Ms Nanni: As I left my house this morning, I had to walk down the street to get in my car because the equipment is in the subdivision putting in the sanitary sewer lines in the streets. We don't know when the hookups will be to the homes themselves. My particular lot has been an example of sewage rising to the surface in the backyard three months after I moved in. The Environmental Appeal Board has written a summation of what it feels about our lot, and it's just a scathing condemnation of planning and of the approving bodies.

Ms Mathysen has one, as well as the Minister of Municipal Affairs, the Minister of the Environment and Premier Rae. We are an example of a place that should never have been built on the kinds of services that are there. Long-term planning and full municipal services should have dealt with us in the very beginning.

The Chair: I'd like to thank you for appearing before this committee. On Hansards, I had quite a few calls in my office from people who are sitting out there. If they could call the clerk's office, as soon as they're ready on the sittings today, maybe your office can fax them out.

Thank you for attending the committee here.

Mr Veel: Thank you very much.

The Chair: I was just talking to the clerk. We can arrange a day to see the video before the clause-by-clause which is mutually agreeable to all the committee here. We'd like to have a subcommittee as it is right now. This committee is adjourned for today.

The committee adjourned at 1837.

Substitutions / Membres remplaçants:

- *Cunningham, Dianne (London North/-Nord PC) for Mr Sterling
- *Eddy, Ron (Brant-Haldimand L) for Mr Phillips
- *Ferguson, Will, (Kitchener ND) for Mr Jamison
- *Grandmaître, Bernard (Ottawa East/-Est L) for Mr Kwinter
- *Mathysen, Irene (Middlesex ND) for Mr Christopherson
- *Mills, Gordon (Durham East/-Est ND) for Mr Wiseman
- *Wilson, Gary (Kingston and The Islands/Kingston et Iles ND) for Mr Ward
- *Winninger, David (London South/-Sud ND) for Ms Ward

*In attendance / présents

Also taking part / Autres participants et participantes:

- Mills, Gordon, parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Municipal Affairs
- Riddell, Brian, assistant deputy minister, municipal operations, Ministry of Municipal Affairs

Clerk / Greffier: Decker, Todd

Staff / Personnel: Campbell, Elaine, research officer, Legislative Research Service

CONTENTS

Thursday 5 November 1992

London-Middlesex Act, 1992, Bill 75	F-183
City of London	F-183
Tom Gosnell, mayor
Jack Burghardt, deputy mayor
Paul Yorke, councillor
London Home Builders' Association	F-192
Michael Zebregts, president
Lars Bygden, vice-president
London Development Institute	F-192
Ric Knutson, representative
Speyside Corp	F-192
Ben Lansink, representative
London Public Utilities Commission	F-197
George Avola, chairman
Municipal Electric Association	F-197
I.H. Jennings, chief executive officer
Middlesex County Board of Education and teacher affiliates	F-202
Donna McIlmoyle, chairperson, board of education
Ted Anderson, director, board of education
Ruth Jackson, Middlesex Women Teachers' Association
Town of Westminster	F-206
Barbara Mitrow, councillor
Township of London	F-206
Albert Bannister, clerk-administrator
Township of West Nissouri	F-206
Allen Budden, reeve
Canadian Union of Public Employees, Ontario division and locals 4, 101 and 107	F-211
Doug Wheeler, president, Local 107
Mariana Grube, president, Local 101
Syd Ryan, president, Ontario division
Len Forster, representative, Local 4
Town of Westminster employees	F-211
Ken Brown, representative
Middlesex Federation of Agriculture	F-214
Doug Duffin, representative
Bill Irwin, president
Middlesex Women for the Support of Agriculture	F-214
Carol Small, chairperson
Ben Veel and associates	F-219
Ben Veel, mayor, town of Westminster
Tom Mulligan, chair, parent advisory board, Regina Mundi College
Bill Neville, vice-principal, Regina Mundi College
Harry Froussios, representative, Hellenic Community Centre
Joan Norris, chair, Lambeth Citizens Recreation Council
Pauline Nanni, resident, town of Westminster
Gene Ennis, councillor, town of Westminster

STANDING COMMITTEE ON FINANCE AND ECONOMIC AFFAIRS

- Chair / Président: Hansen, Ron (Lincoln ND)
- Vice-Chair / Vice-Président: Sutherland, Kimble (Oxford ND)
- Caplan, Elinor (Oriole L)
- *Carr, Gary (Oakville South/-Sud PC)
- Christopherson, David (Hamilton Centre ND)
- *Jamison, Norm (Norfolk ND)
- Kwinter, Monte (Wilson Heights L)
- Phillips, Gerry (Scarborough-Agincourt L)
- Sterling, Norman W. (Carleton PC)
- Ward, Brad (Brantford ND)
- Ward, Margery (Don Mills ND)
- Wiseman, Jim (Durham West/-Ouest ND)

Continued overleaf

F-12

F-12

ISSN 1180-4386

Legislative Assembly of Ontario

Second session, 35th Parliament

Official Report of Debates (Hansard)

Thursday 19 November 1992

Standing committee on finance and economic affairs

London-Middlesex Act, 1992

Assemblée législative de l'Ontario

Deuxième session, 35^e législature

Journal des débats (Hansard)

Jeudi 19 novembre 1992

Comité permanent des finances et des affaires économiques

Loi de 1992 sur London et Middlesex

Chair: Ron Hansen
Clerk: Todd Decker

Président : Ron Hansen
Greffier : Todd Decker

Table of Contents

Table of Contents for proceedings reported in this issue appears on the outside back cover, together with a list of committee members and others taking part.

Index inquiries

Reference to a cumulative index of previous issues may be obtained by calling the Hansard Reporting Service indexing staff at 416-325-7410 or 325-7411.

Subscriptions

Subscription information may be obtained from: Sessional Subscription Service, Publications Ontario, Ministry of Government Services, 50 Grosvenor Street, Toronto, Ontario, M7A 1N8. Phone 416-326-5310, 326-5311 or toll-free 1-800-668-9938.

Table des matières

La table des matières des séances rapportées dans ce numéro se trouve sur la couverture à l'arrière de ce fascicule, ainsi qu'une liste des membres du comité et d'autres personnes ayant participé.

Renseignements sur l'index

Il existe un index cumulatif des numéros précédents. Les renseignements qu'il contient sont à votre disposition par téléphone auprès des employés de l'index du Journal des débats au 416-325-7410 ou 325-7411.

Abonnements

Pour les abonnements, veuillez prendre contact avec le Service d'abonnement parlementaire, Publications Ontario, ministère des Services gouvernementaux, 50 rue Grosvenor, Toronto (Ontario) M7A 1N8. Par téléphone : 416-326-5310, 326-5311 ou, sans frais : 1-800-668-9938.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

STANDING COMMITTEE ON FINANCE AND ECONOMIC AFFAIRS

Thursday 19 November 1992

The committee met at 1007 in committee room 1.

LONDON-MIDDLESEX ACT, 1992

LOI DE 1992 SUR LONDON ET MIDDLESEX

Resuming consideration of Bill 75, An Act respecting Annexations to the City of London and to certain municipalities in the County of Middlesex / Loi concernant les annexions faites à la cité de London et à certaines municipalités du comté de Middlesex.

The Chair (Mr Ron Hansen): Good morning. Welcome to the standing committee on finance and economic affairs; today, Thursday, November 19, 1992, Bill 75, An Act respecting Annexations to the City of London and to certain municipalities in the County of Middlesex. We have nine different groups coming forward today. This will be our last day of hearings.

WEST NISSOURI RATEPAYERS

The Chair: The first group we have coming forward is the West Nissouri Ratepayers. Would they come forward, please. Sir, would you like to identify yourself for the purposes of Hansard. We have until shortly after 10:30. After your presentation, leave some time for questions from the members of the committee, please. You may begin.

Mr Crispin Colvin: My name is Crispin Colvin, resident of West Nissouri township in the county of Middlesex.

I would ask this committee to consider the following regarding the fate of West Nissouri if Bill 75 comes into full effect. I would also ask the committee to urge the implementation of these reasonable alternative proposals.

The area of West Nissouri to be annexed represents approximately 4% of the township. The tax loss represents 40%, approximately. This raises doubts about Minister Cooke's statement that no municipality shall be hurt by this annexation. I therefore urge you, members of this committee, to heed this concern and to make the necessary adjustments, while noting that senior ministry staff have suggested that no changes will be made at this point by this committee. If this is actually the case, we are wasting both time and taxpayers' money on a charade. I trust this is not the case.

West Nissouri, under the current legislation, will be forced out of existence due to bankruptcy. The fallout of such devastation would result in the loss of community identity and spirit, job losses for municipal employees, a decline in local government efficiency, a loss of service levels, and escalation of costs due to a larger and more inefficient bureaucracy, as well as the loss of future programs, services and potential local development that can be more effectively delivered under the current municipal structure.

This demise of West Nissouri would be not unlike the loss you would feel if your riding were dissolved at the next election. The loss of representation, the services you offer and the efficient delivery of those services to your constituents would be lost.

If you allow the city of London to take over the lifeblood of West Nissouri, the airport lands and the businesses associated with it, then you will be allowing the city to remove approximately 40% of the township's tax base. This cannot be replaced within a 5-to-10-year period but would in fact require several decades of development, all on full services, as required in the township's official plan. This would require substantial funding which the municipality does not have, nor will it have under the current compensation proposals.

In order for the township to remain viable, the airport lands and the associated businesses therein must remain as they are now, an integral and necessary part of West Nissouri. The majority of the operating capital for the township is derived from the airport lands. This has allowed the municipality to remain agricultural, with little need for commercial or residential development.

Ministry staff feel that the only problem appears to be the federal grant in lieu of taxes. This is not the case. Certainly the federal grant is important, but no less important are the revenues generated from the businesses and residential properties within the proposed annexed area. This point appears to have been lost on ministry staff.

The minister has stated that no municipality will suffer from this annexation. There is no doubt that West Nissouri will suffer: effective January 1, 1993, our township will have lost almost half of its tax base, and in return we will receive a proposed compensation package that is inadequate to fill the gap created. A further erosion of this compensation will occur when West Nissouri will be forced to pay the city for assets to which it has no just claim under the 40-year-old Cummings principle.

If annexation is to have no financial impact, compensation should reflect assessment loss and asset loss recovery. This could be done by a minister's order. If the disposition of assets and liabilities relies entirely on the Cummings principle, then West Nissouri will lose approximately 20% of all the municipality's assets. According to the Ministry of Municipal Affairs, calculations for the Cummings principle is based on assessment.

Since the city of London has no interest in our physical assets, it will take a cash-in-lieu settlement. The net result will be that West Nissouri will have a loss of compensation rather than zero impact, as the minister has stated. If the minister is truly interested in having West Nissouri remain viable beyond the current five-year time frame that is proposed, then this committee, the government, the minister and his staff must look at alternative proposals.

One such proposal is shared services. Some would argue that shared services do not work. This would at best be a statement from an uninformed source. Shared services do work and in fact have been in place in West Nissouri for many years. The airport receives both sewer and water service from the city of London. Ideally, the lands surrounding the airport should be left as they are now to produce the food that you and all Ontarians require. This would further alleviate another concern brought to world attention not so very long ago.

We can all remember the tragedy of the El Al cargo plane crashing in Amsterdam. The same fate could befall a number of Canadian cities due to the proximity of businesses and residences to the airports. London is in the enviable position of being able to avoid a tragedy of this magnitude. To leave the land surrounding the airport in a state of agricultural production is a far greater and safer use of the land with less opportunity for disaster.

Such problems as noise created by the arrival and departure of aircraft is non-existent if the land were to be left in agricultural production. Once this land is developed and engulfed by a larger city with an insatiable appetite, discontent and complaints will appear that do not now exist. Noise abatement laws will be required, more emergency response and planning will be needed and the need for an airport curfew—currently one of the airport's main attractions—will be a requirement.

Should development be perceived as a greater need than food production, then the township of West Nissouri should be permitted to work in cooperation with the city of London to ensure proper and controlled development of airport lands within the township. This would ensure mutual respect, currently lacking under annexation. This could be accomplished, as it is now, with shared services.

The city of London had reached agreements with neighbouring municipalities prior to the appointment of an arbitrator. One of these agreements was for shared services, and one with West Nissouri in which the city indicated that it was no longer interested in any part of the municipality. Minister Cooke put West Nissouri and the airport lands on the table.

If West Nissouri must lose its tax base, then I urge the committee to encourage, through legislation, that which the city has already proposed in previous boundary negotiations: cooperative servicing. Our municipality would receive these services only on a user-pay basis. This would allow for orderly growth on full services on the airport property and adjacent lands. This would be beneficial to all. Once implemented, both the city and the township would be winners.

The city would not have the burden of paying for the full cost of servicing the lands, this in addition to the other demands that will be placed on it due to annexation, but would work in partnership with its neighbour, with the result that all would share in the rewards. The city would receive the associated spinoff benefits related to this growth. These would include an increase in population, the requirement of additional businesses to support the population and the economic and employment benefits that this would bring to London.

The township of West Nissouri would have no need to develop, and the erosion of valuable agricultural land would be offset. West Nissouri would be able to maintain its rural character without compromising the county, the city or the township. In fact, many associated businesses may well locate within the city, to add further to the city's economic growth.

All of this could be accomplished without bankrupting a neighbouring municipality that has been a part of and contributed to the success of the county and the province since 1851. This would involve only a minor amendment to Bill 75, removing the 4% of West Nissouri land and in so doing reinstating the 40% tax base. This is in keeping with what Minister Cooke has already stated. The township of West Nissouri should suffer no loss of land or assessment. In short, West Nissouri lands should be removed from Bill 75.

Failure to implement this minor change would leave this committee, if one aspect of your mandate is to ensure that no municipality suffer, only one alternative: a substantial infusion of funds from an already financially troubled province.

To ensure the long-term viability, beyond the minister's five-year plan, of the township of West Nissouri, Bill 75 must include a fair compensation package. To date, this has not been offered. Compensation figures have been discussed, but no firm amounts have been presented. West Nissouri would need to have full compensation in perpetuity for loss of assessment. The township of West Nissouri would therefore require compensation equal to its 40% loss of tax base. Anything less will result in bankruptcy for the municipality or, at best, a slow financial death.

A five-year stay of execution, as proposed by the ministry, is of little value to the government and would be a disservice to and perceived as a rejection of the citizens of West Nissouri. This would be contrary to the minister's statement that no municipality shall suffer.

Should the compensation in perpetuity be unacceptable, then this committee may wish to investigate a one-time lump sum payment to West Nissouri. A figure suggested by, but not committed to, a ministry official was that of $6.5 million. That may well be a figure acceptable to the municipality to ensure its viability. However, at today's costs, this would not cover the cost of a sewage treatment plant capable of allowing for the development required to recoup the 40% loss of taxes. Perhaps this figure should be considered a starting point rather than a fixed number. Should the figure of $6.5 million appear too great, I can only wonder what value you would place on a municipality, the value of its products and the value of its citizens. Surely they have a far greater value than $6.5 million. A government that prides itself on taking care of people should surely consider this as a small yet important investment.

The township of West Nissouri deserves at least this in order to provide for its ratepayers and its employees. This cannot be perceived as anything more than just compensation. Since the government has seen fit to offer $14 million for snowmobile trails, there must be funds available to fulfil the promise of the minister that no municipality shall be hurt by this annexation. I urge the committee to allow West Nissouri to survive, to grow and to be master of our house.

Remove West Nissouri from Bill 75, as London city council unanimously agreed to do in November 1988. In fact, the opposition to this massive annexation comes from many sides. The schools boards are opposed, the Ontario Federation of Agriculture is opposed, the abutting municipalities are opposed, the county of Middlesex is opposed, Women for the Support of Agriculture is opposed, many MPPs of all parties are opposed, many groups from within the city of London are opposed, professors from the University of Western Ontario are opposed, land use planners are opposed, and many with the city of London council are opposed.

Who is in favour? Developers, builders, the real estate board, speculators and politicians who are unable to see the future.

There is a great need for preservation of our lands, our communities and our ability to be self-sustained in food production. I would hope that this committee will see the folly of this annexation, the destruction it will impose on families, communities and the province as a whole. I ask you to use good judgement, reason and common sense.

To allow an annexation of this magnitude is dangerous for Ontario and a regressive step. It is not productive but is counterproductive. It does not allow for survival but only for takeover. As a government which prides itself on care for those who are bypassed in society, which speaks for those who have no voice and for those whom no others will represent, I urge you to follow the doctrines set out by Douglas and Woodsworth.

1020

Do that which is philosophically, morally and consciously correct. Allow West Nissouri to survive, whether through a substantial compensation package or through the withdrawal of West Nissouri from the legislation. Failure to implement either of these solutions will mean that this government is no different from any of its predecessors or indeed that which is in power in Ottawa. Let us show the province and the nation that all governments are not tarred with the same brush. It is time to be decisive, strong and to represent those whom it professed to represent when in opposition.

Allow West Nissouri to be the master of our house. Allow the voice of West Nissouri to be heard and not extinguished. Remove West Nissouri from Bill 75.

The Chair: Okay, I guess we're ready to take some questions.

Mr Ron Eddy (Brant-Haldimand): Mr Colvin, thank you for your very thoughtful presentation. I must say it's very thoughtful and indeed thought-provoking. Your alternatives are welcome and should be considered. I hope they will be considered.

I agree with your viewpoint that this is detrimental and disastrous to the township of West Nissouri, especially when it's brought about by a Minister of Municipal Affairs who, from my view, should be speaking for all municipalities, not giving everything to some and skewering others. That's most unfortunate.

Do you know any reason, any advantages to Crumlin airport—it's now London Airport of course—being annexed into the city? Is there any advantage, given that there are full city services now, urban services? I understand they were granted by permission of the council of West Nissouri, but are there any advantages that you see to having the airport that adjoins the city annexed to the city?

Mr Colvin: None whatsoever. The airport serves the region. The airport is federal property. The airport has been something that belongs to everybody. It belongs to everybody in the county; indeed it belongs to everybody in the province and the country. There is no sane reason to make it part of one municipality over another.

Mr Eddy: The township of West Nissouri cannot tax the airport, but there is a federal tax grant in lieu to the township. I suppose if it goes into the city, then the city would get that. I'd like you to comment on that. That, I imagine, will be continued. You said the services are presently being paid for to the airport by whom?

Mr Colvin: The federal government has the arrangement in terms of servicing with the city, but the grant in lieu covers approximately the deficit of London's new indoor swimming pool. To them it's a very small amount of money; to us it is our very lifeblood.

But it's not just the grant in lieu, and this is what the ministry, I think, has failed to realize. The grant in lieu is part of the cash that we require to operate our municipality, but the associated businesses that are located on that property also provide business tax to the municipality, which is also a substantial portion of our funding. It is both.

Mr Eddy: You mentioned that the Minister of Municipal Affairs had put West Nissouri back on the table. I appreciated knowing about that. I think what happened initially is that the city of London council passed a bylaw to annex the airport, subsequently withdrew that bylaw and said, "Not at this time," or something. Do you know why Mr Cooke made that decision? Did the council or the township of West Nissouri have any input into that decision in any way at any time?

Mr Colvin: The minister put it back on the table without our knowledge, without council's knowledge, as far as I know. Why? Lord knows. The city of London removed it with the proviso that it may wish to discuss with West Nissouri annexing lands at the airport at a future date. In our presentation to arbitrator John Brant we made it quite clear that we were prepared to discuss with the city whether the airport should be put back on the table.

We were prepared to negotiate with the city one on one, and the minister has subsequently said: "No, West Nissouri, you don't have that right, you don't have that voice. We're taking that away from you. It's back on the table because I say so." We haven't had the opportunity to really fight for our airport.

The Chair: Okay, we have to go on.

Mr Gary Carr (Oakville South): I appreciate your presentation and the thoroughness with which you did it. In it you seem to be talking about the financial package as a big part of it. I know at the very end you say to remove West Nissouri from the bill, but in it you seem to be talking about the compensation. I was getting the feeling, and this may be wrong, that if you got the right type of compensation, you would then be pleased with it. That isn't your understanding. You want to be removed from this bill, regardless of what the compensation is. Is that correct?

Mr Colvin: To be pleased with the annexation would be the furthest thing from my mind. Our first choice, anybody's first choice, would be to leave us alone, because we were initially left alone. If we absolutely must, if there is no alternative in the minister's eyes but to strangle our municipality by taking away our financial lifeline, then the only alternative is a substantial package in perpetuity to make us viable.

He keeps saying, "You will be viable," but his vision of viability and my vision of viability are substantially different. His vision of viability is five years; mine is life. It's like saying: "You have cancer, but you'll be okay. You'll live for five years." But in five years you're dead, and that is what the municipality is facing right now.

Mr Carr: You're actually getting a double whammy, if you will. You get the one hit by being included, and when they do include you the compensation package—the minister isn't here, but his parliamentary assistant is. I'd be pleased if the parliamentary assistant would, on behalf of the minister, want to speak on why the minister put West Nissouri back on the table. They haven't had an answer. You don't get a chance to speak to the minister, but you've got the second in charge. I'd be pleased if the parliamentary assistant would like to answer that.

Mr Gordon Mills (Durham East): I'd just like to talk about what the minister said and what was in the minister's mind. I'm not in his mind and I wasn't there when that was discussed. There's been a statement made that they're not going to be compensated for the loss of airport and industrial assessment. I'd just like to say that the airport revenues are of course a federal grant.

The ministry staff met the steering committee last Tuesday. West Nissouri will be compensated for loss of grants and commercial and business assessment from the airport for five years. The precise amount of this compensation is still being determined, because we need to know. You will get, sir, compensation based on 1992 grants and assessments. At the moment we don't have the full 1992 grants and assessments to work out that package, but that package is coming. It's a fact.

Mr Carr: I would be prepared to give my time up to Mr Colvin to reply in a statement and see if in fact this jibes with what you've been hearing. How would you like to comment?

Mr Colvin: Thank you. I'd be delighted to respond to that. The loss of grant, as Mr Mills has said, will be covered for five years. Again, Mr Mills, if your constituents were told that they were no longer going to have a representative in five years' time, your constituents would be very upset, and rightly so, as our constituents are.

The amount is yet to be determined. We've been asking for clarification from the Ministry of Municipal Affairs at the steering committee level, at the council level and at the level of our clerk and treasurer since approximately May, when these hearings started, to determine how the compensation was going to be paid, what the basis of the figures was.

We've been told, "We're using the 1989 assessment rolls," and then, "We're using the 1991 assessment rolls." Now we're being told that it's the 1992 assessment rolls and the package is coming. I'm sorry to sound flippant, sir, but Christmas is coming too, and it will be here before the package is determined.

We haven't really got a lot of faith, because we haven't been told or given anything that we can take to the bank, that we can take to the residents.

The Chair: Okay, Ms Mathyssen.

Mr Carr: Any more time?

The Chair: No.

1030

Mrs Irene Mathyssen (Middlesex): I have a number of questions. First, West Nissouri employees are concerned about job loss. Has there been any accommodation made for West Nissouri employees, and what problems do you see there?

Second, let's say that the Tooth Fairy brings you this great big bundle of money so that West Nissouri could continue and you have to develop to make up the tax base that is lost. Where will you develop? Do you have enough industrial-commercial developable land in your current official plan to make up that tax base, or are you going to find you're going to have to broaden development on to land that is currently agricultural? I'd like to know how coservicing works. You said it does work. I'd like you to explain how coservicing works.

The last question: You said that if the airport lands remain in West Nissouri, you can ensure that those lands will remain agricultural, so the noise and the disaster precaution is there. How do you know that land won't remain agricultural if London has airport lands?

Mr Colvin: Perhaps I'll start with the last question first. London has said that it wants the airport lands precisely for the reason of development, so it's not interested in keeping the airport lands or any of the lands around there agricultural. In fact, what's within the city boundaries now has a number of for-sale signs—some of it's sold—and they're all advertising it as good industrial land. So their intent to keep it agricultural, if they say that, is dubious at best.

To go back to question number one, the job loss question, we made our employees redundant in June, I believe it was, as per the technical committee's work plan. We have followed the guidelines as the municipality set out by the technical committee, by the steering committee. Now we have the ministry staff and the city of London acting in collusion, saying, "We don't want to give West Nissouri employees offers of employment because it would make you a non-viable community."

Well, we're a non-viable community as it stands now. If we have compensation for only five years, we'd become non-viable in five years. That is hardly any kind of security for an employee but in fact a major source of insecurity and stress. There is no reason our employees couldn't be given job offers, none whatsoever.

In terms of development, if we got a lump sum and the Tooth Fairy came, we have some developable land that has been designated for a growth area, particularly around Thorndale. In terms of recouping 40% of our assessment loss, we probably—I'm guessing at this—would think that we would have to expand the amount of developable land that we would have to develop, therefore taking more land out of production.

West Nissouri has always been a rural municipality. We've been able to afford to do this because we've had the funding from the federal properties, from the airport lands. Once that is stopped, we would have to perform like everyone else: We're going to have to start paving over good land and reducing the number of farms, hence making Ontario probably no longer self-sufficient in food production.

In regard to coservicing—the way I look at it anyway and perhaps it's simplistic—I'll use the analogy of Hydro. We all pay Ontario Hydro for our utilities, for the electricity in our buildings, for the electricity in our homes and on our farms. We don't pay for the easements and we don't pay as individuals for the hydro lines going down the road, but we do pay through collective taxation and it's done for the good of all.

This can be the same type of program in coservicing. The township could pay on a user basis. We don't have the staff or the equipment to put in sewage pipelines. We would have to contract out, if we had that kind of funding. But we would pay based on what we're using. We would have to set up reserve funds so that we could set aside moneys for servicing, upgrading and maintenance of any sewage and water facilities that would be required. It can be done on a cooperative basis instead of what's good for the big guy is good for the big guy and the rest of you can go to the devil, because that, as it stands, is the way it is operating.

Mrs Mathysen: Okay.

The Chair: Mr Mills, you have some closing comments?

Mr Mills: Just a quick comment, and thank you, Mr Colvin. I'd just like to point out that the reason 1992 was chosen as the year for the assessment was because the ministry feels that is the best year for you to be assessed, for it to be worked through.

Mr Colvin: May I respond to that, sir, just quickly?

The Chair: Okay, a quick response.

Mr Colvin: I agree that perhaps 1992 would be the best year; that may well be. But unfortunately, what will happen is the bill will be passed long before the assessment rolls are done and at that point, when we find the flaws in the ministry calculations, as we will, then it's too late to do anything about it, because what'll happen is they're going to hide under the fact that: "Well, I'm sorry, it's law. We have to live with it."

The Chair: Thank you, Mr Colvin, for appearing before the committee.

LONDON AND ST THOMAS REAL ESTATE BOARD

The Chair: The next group to come forward is the London and St Thomas Real Estate Board. I'd like to welcome you before the standing committee on finance and economic affairs and on Bill 75. The clerk will hand out your brief and if you wouldn't mind introducing yourself for the purposes of Hansard and this committee, you may begin.

Ms Nancy McCann: Good morning. My name is Nancy McCann and I'm the chairperson of the political action committee of the London and St Thomas Real Estate Board. As a representative of the board, I speak for some 1,450 real estate professionals and it is as their representative and on their behalf that I speak to you today.

Realtors don't just sell houses, commercial property or industrial property, they sell cities. As long as London is a great place to live and work and raise families, as long as it is affordable and safe and well serviced, it is easy to sell. Why? Because people want to stay and people and companies and industries want to leave other cities so they can move to it.

If, on the other hand, London should become a bad place to live and work and raise families, if available housing within the city limits should become overpriced while services in outlying suburbs prove inadequate and environmentally unsafe, then it becomes no longer nearly so easy to sell London and naturally we, as realtors, don't want to see that happen.

In the early 19th century, London proper was bounded on the south and the west by the two branches of the Thames and by Queen's Avenue on the north and Wellington Street on the west. Not so long ago, Wortley Road was the hub of Wortley Village rather than the pleasant street in the old south that it is now. The reality is that London has been doing nothing but growing for the last 150 years. In fact, before the 1960 annexation, the new office of the London and St Thomas Real Estate Board on Commissioners Road would have fallen outside the city limits of London.

Growth is not bad. What's more, growth is inevitable. What is bad is not planning intelligently for that inevitable growth and that, in our opinion, is more than bad, it's irresponsible and, because unintelligent planning will adversely affect the quality of lives of everyone living and working in the area, it's also culpable.

Annexation is good for London and for the townships it proposes to annex. Annexation is good for London because it will keep the supply of affordable, well-serviced homes ample. Right now, London is very affordable compared to the rest of Ontario. In fact there are 12 other centres in Ontario where the average house price is higher, sometimes considerably higher, than our average house price.

What happens if annexation is not implemented and growth is constrained? Probably house prices will go up. You might think that would be good for realtors—the more expensive the house, the higher the commission—but realtors are not interested in short-term gain, we're in it for the long term.

We want as many citizens as possible to own homes and we want them eventually to get to a point where they can own their dream homes. That can happen for a number of people in London in 1992. That will continue to be able to happen for a fair number of people in London in 2015, if annexation is implemented. Where it doesn't happen is in cities like Toronto, where the average house costs $234,313. Our average house price in London for 1991 was $134,545. That's $100,000 less.

What happened? Well, approximately three to four years ago, London realtors were selling many homes to Torontonians fleeing the city. That was before the market adjusted. Now there are a lot of unhappy Torontonians in houses which are worth in excess of $300,000, at least on paper, which no one is buying. We would hate to see that happen in London.

As for the townships London proposes to annex, annexation can be good for them too. Unless they plan to pack themselves up lock, stock and barrel and move on down the road a piece, they're going to absorb London's inevitable growth. That's not really a question. Those new people who are going to be moving into London and hopefully those new businesses and companies that are going to be starting up or relocating here are going to need to have land somewhere, whether it be in the suburbs and industrial parks, inside the city limits or outside.

What is at issue is how well those suburbs and industrial parks are going to be serviced, and it's our opinion that the more intensified development advocated at the provincial level is more likely to occur within city boundaries with controlled planning and has traditionally resulted in the townships. This is the real crux of the matter: Which municipality has an adequate tax base to furnish the infrastructure necessary to accommodate our inevitable growth? The answer has been, and it remains, London and only London.

1040

[Interruption]

Ms McCann: I'm going to cite the by now infamous case of South Winds, a residential development which falls within the city limits of Westminster and outside the present city limits of London. Unfortunately, the septic system and lot size provided for the development was just not adequate and, as a result, residents have sewage bubbling in their backyards. Let me tell you, besides being environmentally undesirable, sewage bubbling in the backyard does not make for much of a selling point for any home.

That impacts negatively on our area in two ways: It discourages development and the boost to the economy that development brings, and it also increases the likelihood of environmental problems. Clearly, if the services available are inadequate to deal effectively with things like waste, development is not going to be environmentally sound.

As for the fears of the citizens of Westminster that their taxes will be higher if annexation is implemented, I understand that they're currently spending twice what they're paying in taxes for sewage disposal and, to date, Westminster has no police department and only a part-time fire department.

When they take on the financial burden of policing and safeguarding against fire, their taxes will increase.

[Interruption]

The Chair: Excuse me, there are going to be all points of view here, but everybody has a chance to put his point of view across, so I wouldn't like the laughter and the heckling to go on.

Ms McCann: A number of members of our association come from and do business in the townships in question and that's why the real estate board didn't jump on the bandwagon the first time the annexation issue was brought up. Because of our members' very divergent interests, we've had to think long and hard about this issue.

We understand that the separate townships want to maintain their individual character, identity and tax base. We understand their desire to retain autonomy over their affairs. However, it is not as if these townships plan to remain rural havens. The Shasta plan, submitted by the city of Westminster, projects a higher population density for that township than the one projected for the city of London. Clearly, the authors of that plan don't envision Westminster as the Mayberry of Canada.

A fact that seems to have escaped a lot of people is that much of the farm land that people are concerned about preserving as farm land has already been bought up by developers. The fact that it is still farm land is due to the freeze placed upon development, not because it hasn't been wrestled from the possession of beleaguered farmers. The minute that the freeze is lifted, annexation or no annexation, that farm land is going to disappear. What is at issue is whether the development that's going to take place on that farm land is going to be adequately serviced or whether South Winds is going to serve as the paradigm for all development outside the city limits.

Let me recap some of the points we feel are important on this issue.

Long-term planning and intensified controlled development are necessary. The city is the only tax base capable of providing the necessary infrastructure for this future growth. Boundaries, as they are now proposed, provide for watershed planning, proper sewage treatment and waste disposal and long-term controlled planning, making it environmentally sound.

From the fiscal responsibility standpoint, a one-tier municipal government system would be less costly to administer than a two-tier regional system and should streamline the approval process for development land, thereby reducing the cost of the same to the end user. It is fiscally responsible to make the boundary adjustments such that annexation need not be repeated in a 10- to 15-year time frame.

We all want economic recovery, London and the townships alike. We all want the prosperity that will come on the heels of that economic recovery, and growth will give us both economic recovery and prosperity.

We also want a high quality of life and that necessitates planned growth. Annexation will give us planned growth. For that reason, the London and St Thomas Real Estate Board, in the best interests of the community its members service, supports the annexation of enough land to provide for our city's commercial, industrial and residential growth over the next 20 to 30 years. Let's do it once and for all and let's do it as expeditiously as possible.

The Chair: Thank you.

We'll go on to the third party. Questions?

Mrs Dianne Cunningham (London North): First of all, thanks for coming and presenting your point of view. It's true, as the Chairman said, that there are many divergent points of view on this, but I think the one consistency through the whole thing has been the process itself, where—I think rightfully so—most have been concerned about that with regard to the appointing of the arbitrator.

I think, more consistently, one of the arguments against annexation—I don't think there are as many who would say no annexation at all—has been the process and the size of the annexation. I'm just wondering if your group had commented on that at all.

Ms McCann: Only so far as my last comment, in that the boundaries as they are laid out now do provide for the watershed planning which is going to be an important issue for the future. It allows for the landfill site to be within the administrative boundaries of municipality. Also from the standpoint of providing for long-term planning, the boundaries as they're laid out now would allow us to plan for 20 to 30 years, as opposed to 10 to 15 years.

The Chair: Any more questions?

Mrs Mathysen: I noted in your brief that you said this annexation will allow for the dream of Londoners to acquire their single-family homes. Recently the province has embarked upon a program, a plan of intensification, because we reckoned that we can't afford to sprawl out any further. The costs of urban sprawls are beyond our capability now. What is your board's position on the changes to the Planning Act that would allow accessory apartments and granny flats and the intensification that we need to utilize underutilized services within cities like the city of London?

Ms McCann: The board's position on granny flats and allowing for the implementation of an apartment in each home? They are not in opposition to more intensified development as such. In my statement, first of all, I did not state single-family homes, just that people would hopefully be able to own their own homes. That may be, to some persons, a condominium or a town house; it doesn't have to be a single-family home. Home ownership comes in different forms.

From the standpoint of the granny flat issue, they have stood behind the fact that they feel it is better to have the zoning bylaws addressed at the municipal level on a per community basis, that it's not necessarily the best for all communities to have dictated from a provincial level an overall program in that regard. They feel that the individual municipalities are better able to determine what their needs are in terms of zoning.

Mrs Mathysen: Do you happen to know what the currently available growth potential is in terms of the city of London now? It seems to me that during the annexation hearings we heard that there was right now, in the city of London, room for 4,500 units. Is that correct, or is that figure high or low?

Ms McCann: I can't indicate that. Are you saying for single-family serviced lots? Is that what you're quoting?

Mrs Mathysen: Units, yes. Additional units.

Ms McCann: So single-family as opposed to town house or condominium units? I assume that would be far too low for that. It must have been a quote for single-family units if that's the number. I do not have that number at my fingertips, I can tell you.

Mrs Mathysen: So there is room for more than 4,500 units?

Ms McCann: I don't know that. I can't comment on that. I don't know what the room that is left is. It depends on what stage of development you're speaking of, if you talking about a subdivision draft plan or if you're talking about current serviced lots or current subdivisions that are under construction. I don't have the number.

1050

Mrs Mathysen: Could we get that from the ministry? I think that must be available somewhere. I'd like to see that figure again, just to be able to determine whether or not my recollections are accurate.

Ms McCann: I believe LDI would have probably given that number in their presentation.

Mrs Cunningham: The London Development Institute put those numbers before this committee about a month ago.

Mrs Mathysen: Okay. My recollections go back to the arbitrator's hearing. I would appreciate having that, just to refresh my memory.

Ms McCann: I believe, relative to a time standpoint, they felt it was approximately three to five years' worth of development, depending on what—

Mrs Mathysen: How intense it was?

Ms McCann: How fast the markets will be. It might be longer in today's terms.

Mrs Mathysen: Or the densities? Yes, okay.

Mr David Winninger (London South): You mentioned in your paper, Ms McCann, the emphasis that your real estate board places on planned growth. I think that everyone would agree, no matter where the municipal boundaries fall, that we need better planned growth than we've experienced in the past. I was wondering whether your real estate board has struck some kind of committee that is looking at ecosystem planning for the future rather than just the present?

Ms McCann: We have not. It would be an issue we could address in the future. I know most people who are involved in the development industry are aware that the type of eco planning issue you're speaking of is going to be very important, and obviously very important to the new draft plan of London, and it will take some time to facilitate that we are going to be involved and being called on to give input in that regard. I expect that we will be considering that, but there's nothing formally in place at this time.

The Chair: We're going to go to Mr Grandmaître. If you want to get a glass of water, it's going to be a long question and you might need a drink.

Mr Bernard Grandmaître (Ottawa East): No, it's going to be a short question, a short question and to the point.

Ms McCann: I'm here only in lieu of our president.

Mr Grandmaître: You've been in real estate for a good number of years. You've been a member of the board—

Ms McCann: Personally, I've been a member of the board for 16 years, and that's the duration of my real estate career.

Mr Grandmaître: Tell us about the pressure on the board for more commercial and industrial land.

Ms McCann: Commercial and industrial land has always been seen as what will provide the growth for—

Mr Grandmaître: No, no. I'm not asking you this. I know this. I'm asking you, what's the pressure on your board right now for more, to create more commercial and industrial land. That's why the annexation is taking place.

Ms McCann: To create more industrial land?

Mr Grandmaître: Yes. What's the pressure on the board right now? Have you got a list of potential customers waiting for these lands to be rezoned?

Ms McCann: I personally do not, because the area I primarily am involved with is residential. I do not personally sell in the commercial market.

Mr Grandmaître: But you're a member of the board, though.

Ms McCann: Yes, I am.

Mr Grandmaître: And you don't know what the pressures are on that board?

Ms McCann: Not in terms of specific numbers. I can't give you that.

Mr Grandmaître: Do you think that tripling the size of London would answer all those commercial and industrial calls?

Ms McCann: Certainly I assume that that was taken into consideration when they were looking at the boundary levels that they were requesting.

Mr Grandmaître: Did you think that the 1988 proposal wasn't adequate enough?

Ms McCann: In terms of how long it takes to go through the official planning process and the types of other things that have to be considered now, relative to such things as I've mentioned here before—

Mr Grandmaître: Yes, it usually takes two or three years to go before council, the OMB zoning changes, official plan amendments and so on and so forth, but you're looking at tripling the size of London.

Ms McCann: But after you go through that, then you have to go back and redo official draft plans for the city. It's not just the case of going through annexation. It's what we're going to be faced with now in the city of London, of redoing an official draft plan that will take a great deal of time to complete before—

Mr Grandmaître: I realize this.

Ms McCann: —anyone can actually go ahead and do any development.

Mr Grandmaître: One last question, Mr Chair, before I pass on to—

The Chair: You still have time.

Mr Grandmaître: Good. What role did you play in the last official plan of London?

Ms McCann: I personally?

Mr Grandmaître: No, I'm talking about the board.

Ms McCann: The board did a presentation, but I don't know how big a role that was. We had members who were consulted in the last official draft plan.

Mr Grandmaître: Don't you have a committee responsible for—Ms McCann: No.

Mr Grandmaître: You don't.

Ms McCann: No, it would be part of existing committees or a subcommittee, but we don't have, at this point in time, an official draft plan committee.

Mr Eddy: Thank you for your invigorating presentation—I enjoyed it—and thank you particularly for bringing out the fact that London is the only municipality in the area that has the tax base to develop all this wonderful agricultural land, because we've been led to believe up to this time that it would be the developers who would pay for it. I'm pleased to hear you acknowledge and admit that it's the taxpayer, which is of course the taxpayers of the city of London. I appreciate that clarification.

I have three short questions. One, do you agree that the municipalities around London should have access to the provincial Lake Huron pipeline, the same as the city of London has? Secondly, you represent St Thomas as well. Would you agree that Yarmouth township or some other township should be added to St Thomas because it's getting near being filled and will want land for development and expansion? Thirdly, do you agree with the very restrictive agricultural designation and zoning that are going to be placed on 90% or a very large percentage of the Westminster lands when they go into the city of London? So it's the right to water for others, the St Thomas growth and, thirdly, the restrictive agricultural designation which won't allow it to be developed.

Ms McCann: The right-to-water issue is not one that I have studied, nor do I feel that I can comment on it.

Mr Eddy: But it is a provincial pipeline. You're aware of that.

Ms McCann: Yes.

Mr Eddy: Thank you. We'll leave that one.

Ms McCann: As far as the restrictive zoning for agricultural land is concerned, I think that's a part of the intensified development process, whereby you don't let things sprawl ahead of where they need to be, so from that standpoint I think that's environmentally sound.

Mr Eddy: But it's there for at a time when it's needed it'll become developed.

Ms McCann: It will be controlled.

Mr Eddy: I see, okay. What about St Thomas expansion? Which township would you select to add to St Thomas?

Ms McCann: Not being a resident of St Thomas—

Mr Eddy: But your board is the London and St Thomas Real Estate Board.

Ms McCann: Yes. I can't speak for the board, because it has not given me a position on this—

Mr Eddy: Do you see the same solution for another expanding city, a township adjoining?

Ms McCann: Yes.

Mr Eddy: Thank you.

The Chair: I'd like to thank you, Ms McCann, for appearing before this committee.

1100

CITIZENS AGAINST ANNEXATION

The Chair: The next group we have, and everyone has in front of them its brief, is Citizens Against Annexation. Carolyn Murray, would you come forward, please, and your associates. Could you introduce yourself to the committee, and for the purposes of Hansard also.

Ms Carolyn Murray: If I could take that opportunity to introduce myself, I'm Carolyn Murray. With me are Jay Burtwistle, Susan Grieve and Neil McRae. I will introduce them more fully during my presentation.

The Chair: Okay, fine.

Ms Murray: Thank you for giving us the opportunity to speak to you today. Citizens Against Annexation represents a broad cross-section of people from the town of Westminster, the rural areas, towns and villages in Middlesex, as well as supporters from the city of London. Because we are the people who live in the affected area and are experiencing the stress, the disbelief and the uncertainty of our future, we offer a different perspective to this issue. We have no vested interest other than stewardship of the land, and we do not stand to profit from the passing of Bill 75.

Mr Gosnell stated two weeks ago that this London-Middlesex annexation issue is one of urbanization. We submit that it is more complex than drawing lines on a map and deciding that a larger municipality can be given the right by the province of Ontario to invade a smaller municipality, dismiss its democratically elected council and leave the citizens disenfranchised with a collaborator as our representative.

In any other part of the world, this scenario would not be tolerated. Individuals and groups across this province are shaking their heads in disbelief that such a move to create a city 80% the size of Toronto, with all its problems, is actually being contemplated.

It's frightening to us as rational, intelligent and hard-working citizens of this province that a 175-year-old municipality, which asserted its right to self-determination, could be obliterated by another municipality with a grudge, under the guise of good planning.

We are not going to read the brief you have before you. Instead, I will highlight the main areas we have addressed.

In it, we have given you a brief outline of the history of the London-Middlesex negotiations. We've also outlined myths and misinformation about the following areas: servicing, planning, justification of the large annexation and survival of Middlesex county. We have presented alternative solutions that are available. We have also listed our specific concerns with the legislation, Bill 75. Lastly, we have asked eight questions which we'll address later in our presentation today.

If I could just summarize our concerns, we are concerned about the size of the area to be annexed and the resulting loss of Westminster as a municipality. We'd like to emphasize at this time that we do not consider this an amalgamation, a word that's been slipping in lately, I notice. This is an annexation.

We are concerned about the buffer zone. There's no need for it; London already objects to every proposal for development in the fringe area.

We are concerned about the disenfranchisement of citizens of Westminster, London township, West Nissouri, Delaware township and North Dorchester.

We are concerned about the escalating costs and unknown future costs. This Bill 75 is not the least-cost solution, as was the original provincial interest that was designated when Mr Brant was appointed as the arbitrator. We're also concerned, along this point, that the city and other developers keep talking about the revenue that will be coming from development in the annexed areas that will cover the cost of the annexation. We submit that there will be no revenue until this recession is over, and we're not sure when that's going to be. To say that annexation will provide revenue, will stimulate development, is patently untrue and cannot be proved.

We are concerned about the threat to the agricultural industry and the community.

On November 5, the last time we were together, you were told about a petition that was circulated in May 1992 in the town of Westminster. You were not told that the people circulating this petition deliberately misled people about which petition they were signing by using the statement at the top, "Annexation is not our choice." Previous to this petition being circulated, the original petition opposing the Brant report and Bill 75 was circulated. People not seeing the two petitions together thought they were one and the same. Therefore, we sincerely question the validity of the 1,335-signature petition that you were told about last time we met. This is another example of deception that has been proliferated through this whole issue.

However, we want to point out that there are on record here at Queen's Park 5,600 names on petitions opposing the Brant report and Bill 75. Almost 1,000 of these signatures belong to London residents. We know that all MPPs have received many letters and phone calls clearly illustrating opposition to Bill 75. In addition, many city and county residents helped to pay for our large advertisement in the London Free Press recently. I have a copy of that here, if anybody is interested in looking at it. Clearly, these people believe that government should be by the people, for the people. Most recently, we have been circulating a one-page statement to groups in Middlesex and London and asking for their endorsement of a reduced annexation. I have copies of this for the committee.

The Chair: You can give copies to the clerk after and you could make copies to give to all members of the committee.

Ms Murray: Okay. I would just simply read the statement and highlight some of the groups who have endorsed it. The heading is "Annexation: A Local Solution."

"The London annexation act, Bill 75, is a provincially imposed solution to a local problem. For many reasons a local solution was not possible until just recently. There now exists a local government consensus drafted by a coalition of concerned urban and rural councillors, agricultural groups, and others with expertise in municipal affairs. This local consensus addresses all of the local concerns, but reduces the size of the annexation to 24,000 acres, which is the amount unanimously approved by London city council in 1988. Only direct interference from the province of Ontario by the minister of the day prohibited an accord being reached on this proposal.

"This consensus represents a local solution to a local problem and still allows much room for growth by the city, and an opportunity for cooperation on planning issues, environmental issues and servicing, yet allows the rural areas to maintain their integrity and identity.

"We, the undersigned, do lend our support to this local government consensus on the London-Middlesex annexation issue."

In the short time that we've been working on this, which is less than two weeks, we've been able to get endorsements from 25 local and provincial organizations, including the Ontario Federation of Agriculture, the Middlesex Federation of Agriculture, the three Middlesex county teachers' union groups and associations, the Thames Region Ecological Association, and the list goes on. We are currently circulating this statement and it's presently before executives of other church, labour and community groups, so further endorsements are forthcoming and will be forwarded.

We have been gratified by the solidarity of groups across Middlesex on this issue. We just also want to relay that we have been made aware that there are members of city council who are concerned about the size of the annexation, the escalating costs of compensation and servicing and the social and economic impact of the transformation of a small, tightly managed city of London into an unwieldy, financially strapped megacity.

The sad fact is, however, that although London councillors and citizens are thinking these things, nobody is acting. We think that there are several reasons for this: (1) is the ever-present apathy, (2) is ignorance of the real impact of Bill 75 and (3) is fear that the whole deck of cards, that is, Bill 75, will fall down if a change is suggested at this time. That's why we feel it's absolutely imperative that this committee and the province of Ontario act now to reduce the size of annexation and pave the way for implementation of long-term land use policies as are outlined in the Sewell commission report that will be coming forward next year.

At the beginning of our presentation, I did indicate that we represent a broad cross-section of people and I'd like to introduce those people now. Mr Jay Burtwistle is a young fifth-generation farmer in Westminster, Neil McRae is a 41-year resident of the village of Lambeth and Susan Grieve is a teacher and partner in the Westminster dairy farm. If there's time, I would also like to read excerpts from a submission by Mr Craig Connell, who's a dairy farmer in Delaware township, and a letter from a grade 9 student at Regina Mundi High School. Jay Burtwistle.

1110

Mr Jay Burtwistle: Thank you, Carolyn. As Carolyn has said, my name is Jay Burtwistle and I'm a farmer in the community of Temple in the town of Westminster. I am representative of the fifth generation of my family to be farming in Temple, and there are many other farming families in the surrounding areas that share similar heritages.

More significant than the heritage alone is the ethic of stewardship of the land and its resources. This ethic comes from a will to care for the resources of the earth which sustain life. The land has provided for previous generations of my family, and so we care for the land in hope that it will, through our work, provide for future generations of Burtwistles as well.

Does this mean that I and other farmers expect the rest of the world to leave us alone and work around us while we preserve our heritage? Certainly not. Since 1850, Canadian generations of my family have changed with the area and contributed to progress along the way. The first generations saw the planks laid on the Talbot Road, past lot 53 on the north branch of the Talbot Road. Today's generations, my parents and myself operate the farm now, live and work at what is municipally known as 6787 Colonel Talbot Road. This road is better known to long-distance travellers as Highway 4. It has four lanes and is intersected by the 401.

With so many changes taking place over the years, we are quite aware of the potential for future development as commercial or industrial land. What is important to me is that I can work with a municipal council that appreciates agricultural issues in good land use planning as well as in fair treatment of its constituents.

The town of Westminster has had enviable success in developing as a municipality with a rural and urban mix. Not only is the town home to commercial, industrial and residential developments, but it also appreciates agricultural concerns. It is a place I can proudly call home town.

I have seen nothing in London's history or in London's recent empty promises that leads me to believe that London will adequately protect agricultural lands within its boundaries. Urban development is more lucrative than agricultural development. Urban centres, which tend to value tax dollars more than agricultural resources, find it easiest to spread development on to cheaper land on the city's fringe while the downtown core deteriorates to whatever extent the province allows.

Bill 75 does not have the ability to foresee what developer-driven London's council can do to manoeuvre and pressure farmers from the land. London council's attitude cannot be changed by legislation.

I and my family intend to be stewards of our land, whether it be agricultural or not. However, a rough transition from agriculture to other uses would adversely affect our ability to take part in other developments which may be needed on our prime farm land in the future. A smooth transition can better be directed by a municipality which recognizes agricultural issues.

Committee members, I urge you to take a close look at the adverse effect this bill would have upon Middlesex county's ability to survive, London's ability to maintain services to such a large city, Westminster's right to continue the challenging work that we have started and the farmers' abilities to make productive use of Canada's best agricultural land and care for the resources that we owe so much to.

In conclusion, I would like to quote from a daily planner that I use. A man named Frank A. Clark is quoted as having said: "We find comfort among those who agree with us, growth among those who don't." I don't know Frank A. Clark but I find simple wisdom in his words. I believe that my home town of Westminster has been following a course which recognizes this same principle and I would urge you to consider these things carefully.

Mr Neil McRae: Good morning. I am Neil McRae. I appreciate the opportunity to speak before you to express my concerns about Bill 75 and the possibility of Westminster being swallowed by the city of London. I moved to this area in 1951 because of my job. At that time we had a conscious decision to make as to where to live. We chose the village of Lambeth.

We made that choice for a number of reasons. Our background and upbringing was in rural communities. Lambeth gave us the chance to remain a part of a small community. We were just beginning to raise a family and we chose Lambeth for the children, for that close-knit sense of community they would be part of. Those children are grown now and I have been a resident of Lambeth for 41 years. Throughout the years I have been part of many organizations and societies that are part and parcel of what makes Lambeth what it is and what makes Westminster what it is.

Make no mistake. London is lovely city with much to offer and a fine place to live, if they have made the choice to live there. I did not make that choice 41 years ago and I do not want that choice taken away from me now. If you pass Bill 75 and Westminster disappears and Lambeth becomes part of London, I might be living in the same house on the same street but I will no longer be living in a rural community of my own choosing. I will be living in a large urban city that I did not choose to be part of.

As Canadians, we have the right to make certain choices, we have many freedoms. One of those freedoms should include the right to choose where we reside and the type of community we are part of. Bill 75 takes away the freedom of choice.

Ms Susan Grieve: You've been inundated with facts and figures and arguments over the last months of hearings. In spite of all this information, there are some basic questions that, as committee members, you must ask and you must have answers for. You have asked people many questions and we are going to pose some questions to you. We hope that you will have the answers to these questions before you can consider voting on this piece of legislation.

In our original brief that we outlined we had eight questions, and I'll read them very quickly:

(1) In real terms what will the cost of this annexation be and where will the money come from to pay for this?

(2) In real terms what costs does London face to replace, repair and maintain current levels of service?

(3) What happens to Middlesex county when the 10 years of compensation are over?

(4) How can Bill 75 be democratic when it is quite obviously opposed by the majority of the citizens in the area it affects?

(5) Why did David Cooke, after saying this would be the model for all future annexations, then write a letter in defence to 834 mayors of Ontario saying this was a unique situation and would not be repeated? This was not unique. It was mishandled and this letter was an admission that the process was flawed.

(6) How can you justify an annexation of 64,000 acres when the city's proposal to the arbitrator in March 1992 stated 12,000 acres were needed to sustain growth to the year 2026? The current local government consensus proposal offers 24,000 acres, twice as much as London admitted to needing for the next 35 years. By their own admission in March, this is developer driven and any economic gain for the area will be in their pockets.

(7) Why is Bill 75 being rushed through by January 1, 1993, prior to the report from the Sewell commission and in the face of such concern and opposition?

(8) Finally, and perhaps most importantly, as politicians you must remember the recent referendum which was a clear message that the citizens of Canada are unhappy with their governments. Governments are not listening to the people and the NDP is illustrating this disregard. Ask yourself: Have you really heard what the ordinary grass-roots people of London and Middlesex are saying or have you heard only other politicians, developers and speculators who have a vested interest?

We believe those eight questions must be answered in your own minds before you can make a decision with respect to this legislation.

The defence against changing this legislation that's been used by both the city of London and by ministry personnel is the question of time. We hear that it's too late, we've gone too far. I ask you, why is it too late and what is it too late for? Is it ever too late for rational thought? Is it ever too late for fairness and good decision-making? Is it ever too late to right a wrong?

1120

Bill 75 is wrong. It's wrong economically, it is wrong democratically, agriculturally and morally. To proceed with this because the Ministry of Municipal Affairs perceives that it is too late illustrates a serious flaw in our democratic process. If a piece of legislation is clearly flawed before it is passed, and the people have been vocal in their opposition and an alternative solution exists, what is to be gained by pushing it through? When have so many wrongs ever made a right?

Wouldn't it be far better to admit we have a problem and mend it now rather than to have to pay dearly for it later? January 1 is not etched in stone. The Ministry of Municipal Affairs is clinging to that date for fear that if substantial changes are made, someone might have to admit he made a mistake, that we have a problem.

It is not too late for this committee to give us back our belief in the democratic process. You committee members are elected by the people, and you alone have the power to make changes and you alone are responsible for what will happen. It is not too late to send a message to rural Ontario that we matter, that what we do is important and that as rural municipalities we should not have to continually fight to justify our very existence.

Instead of viewing this as a no-win situation, view it as an opportunity to set a positive precedent for the future. Show the other 41 areas facing annexation that the people's wishes count, that cities must be accountable and cooperative with their neighbours and that developers can't dictate provincial policy, as they do with so many city councils. Show those areas and show us that a local solution is much preferred to a provincially imposed one. You have all the ingredients to resolve this in a way that will allow growth, cooperation and will show the people that you're listening.

In trying to find the right words to conclude with, I realized that throughout the hearings that I've been a party to, we've heard about dollars and cents, tax increases, boundary lines, servicing capabilities—and the list goes on. But the element that's missing, the most important element of all, is that of the people and what we are feeling. So I would like to end on a personal note, but a note that I know is shared by my friends at this table and by many of the people sitting at the back of this room.

We feel like we've been teetering on a fence for the last eight months, not entirely sure which way we're going to topple. I truly wonder if you have a sense of what this has done to us, how all-consuming this has been for the last eight months. We have felt incredible frustration and anger, and as we grow closer to the prospect of seeing our community wiped off the face of the map, we now feel deep sadness. The people who support this bill, for whatever their reasons, because they will profit or who believe that life really won't change a great deal, those people will never understand these feelings. To them it's all just lines on a map; it has never been people.

When I moved to Westminster 11 years ago from a neighbouring rural township, I moved to a township that was vibrant and thriving. I watched as that township evolved into a town and 6,000 of us gathered to celebrate, I watched as we struggled to stand up to our Goliath neighbour, and I watch now as we stand poised to lose that battle. If you pass this legislation as is, the greatest sadness is not where the boundaries fall or what will happen to the landfill site or the greed; the sadness lies in what you'll do to a community. The sadness is in the abstract things that are going to disappear for ever.

Gone will be the days of walking into the town office and chatting with Wende at the front desk or talking with the administrator, Doug, about a problem. Gone will be the days of driving down the road to have a chat about a drain with your councillor over a cup of coffee at the kitchen table. Gone will be the small-town sense of community pride, a community that pre-dates London. Gone will be the opportunity to flag down Cliff, the road superintendent, and complain about the snowplowing or the potholes. Gone will be the days when your council, your road crew and your volunteer firemen knew every nook and cranny of every side road and, probably, who owned the land for the last 100 years.

And gone will be the spirit of what made Westminster, the spirit of the families of six or seven generations—the Weldons, the Crinklaws, the Murrays, the Beatties, the Grieves, the Laidlaws—the spirit of the Glanworth Recreation Association, the spirit of Mrs Burtwistle's Tempo News, the spirit of the volunteer firemen who give so freely and unselfishly of their time. How terribly sad that these human values are always secondary to the almighty dollar. The cost of this annexation is dear indeed.

No matter what this committee does, you can't take away what Westminster was, but if you pass Bill 75 in its present form, you will take away all of what Westminster could be from our young farmers and from our children. We ask that you don't. Let us keep our rich heritage, our rich tradition and our promising future.

[Applause]

The Chair: Okay, Ron, you can applaud. Being a rural member myself, I hear you loud and clear, but I can't make a comment.

I'll go one question each. We're down to that unless the other group wants to give up time, and I don't think they want to. Irene, one question, not three questions in one question. Ask the most important question you want to ask.

Mrs Mathysen: I guess the most important question is in terms of the agricultural land in the rural communities, so I'll address it to Jay. You said that your fear was the issues that confront you every day as a rural resident and not being able to communicate those issues to a city council and get remedy for them. What kind of issues are we talking about, and how do you see yourself in terms of the kind of representation you will receive from an urban council in the city of London?

Mr Burtwistle: We're talking about quite a range of issues. One specific issue that comes to mind is that an urban council will cater more to urban people, and a lot of those urban people have dogs. I, for example, am a farmer who raises sheep. Anybody who has had contact with rural issues probably knows that sheep and dogs do not mix well. Currently, in rural areas there are laws in place that compensate farmers for damage to sheep or livestock by marauding dogs. These are issues which can be subject to some alteration by a council on minor points, and just the attitude of the council towards problems such as these would put a lot of pressure on the farmer.

Mr Eddy: Just one short question. I must compliment you for your very strong feeling and your presentation this morning, one that I agree with in so many ways. I take it from the presentations that were made that you really have a strong feeling that there's no place for small-town or rural Ontario in this government's agenda. Do you feel that, or do you disagree with that? It's just a yes/no, because there's a good question over there.

Ms Murray: I'll put it this way: If Bill 75 is passed, that feeling would be confirmed.

The Chair: Okay. We'll go on to the third party.

Mrs Cunningham: This gives me my opportunity to ask a question that we've been asking all along. With regard to the brief you presented earlier, the backup notes, where you talk about the alternative solutions, I've always said to representatives of any of the counties who have come in—because I share the view on the large annexation in that I don't support it—that the only way you get things done in this job is to get the support of the municipal councils and come up with an alternative to the government. It's the only way to get it done.

I'm aware that there may be amendments put forward, but the key question from the minister will be, do you have the support of the county and the city? You said here that you've got some alternative solutions. That was my key question in August when we had the hearings, all last spring. Are you any further ahead? Have you got a plan you can put forward where you've got the cooperation of the elected officials?

1130

Ms Grieve: One of the problems we have faced is the inability to have this brought before London city council. An attempt was made, and it did not get further than the board of control. The other problem we've faced is that many of the members of London city council had only been given a certain amount of information, and the information that perhaps is the most pertinent, that might affect their view of this matter, they are not aware of, for whatever reasons, and we have found an unwillingness to discuss it. Carolyn touched on the fact that we sense there's a fear that if they don't take the 64,000 acres, the whole house of cards is going to come tumbling down and they'll get zero.

We believe that if they could be made to see that there is a compromise where they will get something, that there will be growth and the entire area can grow economically, and if they were assured that they would have that opportunity for growth, there are many members of city council who would be very willing to look at a smaller annexation.

Mrs Cunningham: As a result of that response, I don't think it would be fair to not ask a supplementary. We did get a letter, as you know—you have it before you—with regard to the town of Westminster. Is the town of Westminster on record as supporting the position that you wanted to put before the city of London?

Ms Grieve: Yes.

Ms Murray: Yes.

Mrs Cunningham: I just wanted it on the record.

I'm not asking a question; I'm just going to say something to you, Mr Chairman. I think the point has been made about this fear, and I think it's the government's responsibility to address that, not the members of this committee. Obviously, it's something that's coming from the government.

Mr Eddy: On a point of information: I just want to ask a question of anyone who would know. Is the city of London the only municipality left in Ontario with a board of control?

Interjections.

The Chair: Maybe we can get back to you on that. I don't know. I don't live in London, and I'm glad I'm not there right now.

Mrs Mathysen: The answer is yes. It's the only city in the world with a board of control.

The Chair: Mr Mills has a few comments to make.

Mr Mills: I'd just like to make a comment. I heard you very clearly about the character of your community, that Joe won't be there with his snowplow, and I'd like to leave you with a thought: The communities are changed by official plans and not by boundaries. That's the key to the matter.

The Chair: Thank you for appearing before the committee this morning.

DORIS BOND

TOM GRIEVE

DOUGLAS STANLAKE

The Chair: Next, we have Doris Bond and Mr Tom Grieve. I'd like to welcome you to the committee. You may begin. If the bells ring, we'll have to go to the House for a vote. That's why I've been pushing everybody to get through.

Mr Eddy: We'll come back.

The Chair: Well, it depends on how far we get. If we get to five after, it depends.

Can you identify yourselves for Hansard? Do you have three parties here or just two speaking?

Ms Doris Bond: Three. My name is Doris Bond and I am a councillor with the town of Westminster. With me is Reeve Tom Grieve, and also the administrator of the town, Douglas Stanlake.

We are here as private citizens but we are speaking in support of the resolution passed by Westminster council on October 28 endorsing the 1988 proposal of the city of London as the preferred solution for boundary adjustment. I would like to say that a certified copy of this resolution will be in your hands later this afternoon in response to this letter you have received on your desk this morning. This letter was not authorized by the full council; it was sent individually, personally, by the mayor.

I'll go on with our presentation.

To quote a well-known provincial politician:

"I have tried to approach my tasks keeping three things in mind: (1) The role and authority of local governments must be recognized and respected; (2) The provincial government has a responsibility to help ensure that municipalities have the tools they need to plan their futures; (3) If governments at all levels are going to overcome the challenges facing us in the 1990s, we must work together as partners."

Bill 75 violates these three principles, as local governments and the public have been manipulated by ministry staff. Local councils have been abused and demeaned. The financial tools to help build for the future have been stripped from the rural community of Middlesex. Bill 75 has divided communities and friends, creating hostility, not partnerships and understanding.

The provincial politician I quoted was the Honourable David Cooke in the initial edition of this magazine, Community. Now I wonder how this same person can endorse Bill 75. The NDP government, rather than aiding those who are threatened, will, through Bill 75, crush the vulnerable and weaken the already weak. This is not my idea of partnerships. Ontario is more than large urban centres. Small towns and rural communities also play a significant role in this province.

Although it is tempting, we are not going to take this time to bash the government, but rather speak in support of an alternative that will be best for all involved.

The basis for a better solution is found in the 1988 proposal made by the city, which the parties involved were denied the opportunity to discuss. Copies of that proposal have already been filed with this committee. This map illustrates the differences, showing the 1988 proposal as a basis for a preferred solution, and Bill 75. The green outline is Bill 75; the pink outline is the 1988 proposal.

Middlesex-London is outlined on this map as well. The communities involved have a population of 367,000 and 150,000 households. Four provincial ridings are involved and three are currently held by the government.

Westminster has had an official plan since 1974 and land use controls for 25 years. The new official plan approved in 1986 received compliments from the OMB for its comprehensive and innovative approach to land use planning. Westminster is the only municipality in the county to employ full-time professional planners. Westminster is 55,000 acres in size, and nearly 85% is designated agricultural, 2.5% is designated residential-commercial and 3.5% is designated industrial. Westminster has a total population of 6,300 people. The existing urban area of Lambeth has a population of 3,200. It has a full municipal water supply and over one third of the households are on sanitary sewers.

There are contradictions in Bill 75. The bill directs the county and the city to plan jointly, but then Minister Cooke says that joint planning will not work and this is the reason for the massive annexation. Which policy is Mr Cooke following? Or is there a policy? Partnerships are built through cooperation, not confiscation.

Mr Tom Grieve: Westminster might not be a large urban centre, but we do have servicing plans in place. We are a municipality that has no debt other than a small amount that our PUC has incurred. Our debt capacity is approaching $7 million and our financial approach has been to service our debt. We pay as we go. Property owners only pay for the services received, and for some time we've had area rating bylaws in effect.

In planning for long-term services, Westminster has worked in partnership with the development industry and prepared a master servicing study, which we have here for you to look at today. This is based on watershed planning. This is the first kind of study that was completed in Ontario under the environmental assessment process. We also have done a development charge study and we have passed a bylaw. We have a copy of this study for you today too.

We have maps today showing our sewage and water services. Right now, Westminster has two sewage treatment plants. We have one in Lambeth, called the Hamlyn plant, which handles approximately 200 homes and is capable of doubling in size. We have another plant, called the Digman plant, which services land in the Wellington Road area, and it can be increased to five times its current size. We have approval from the Ontario Ministry of the Environment to expand the collection area to provide sewage treatment to our industrial area.

London has advised us that if it annexes Westminster, it will use exactly the plans that we've developed to service the land that's presently in Westminster. We have the financial resources to do this, so what's the advantage of being annexed? How does this create economic renewal, if the same number of jobs are being created no matter which municipality calls the contract?

When we look at water, we have the water services that we have in place with the PUC on this map also. They're presently centred in the Lambeth area, which is the light blue line, and they extend north on Wonderland Road and east on Highway 2. The dark blue line is the present city water line that goes through parts of Westminster, and the dotted line in the centre part of Westminster is the new Lake Erie pipeline that is going to be constructed in 1993-94, which has capacity to bring to the London area 10 million gallons a day.

With city water lines on town roads, doesn't it make sense that we should use those instead of installing a second line? That's where joint services seem to make sense and save money. If you think about it, many of these water lines were financed with provincial money. We're provincial taxpayers too and we financed the Lake Huron line. We also helped to finance the Lake Erie line.

The city currently has a policy: To connect to city water, you have to agree to be annexed. The point being made here is that small communities also plan. We have the capability to look to the future and we use the tools available to us, just like large urban centres.

1140

We have another map, talking about joint services. In the 1988 proposal the city made, it talked about joint services as a low-cost solution. They must have believed it was the only way to do it. We believe that fair agreements do work.

It's interesting to note that in David Cooke's own riding of Windsor-Riverside, joint service agreements are established between the city of Windsor and the communities of Tecumseh and St Clair Beach. These agreements have been in force for over 30 years. Also, there are agreements between Windsor and Sandwich South township that have been in place for over 25 years, and these are the green sheets that are attached to the back of our presentation.

When you talk about joint service agreements, there are three principles: There's got to be full cost recovery for the supplier, only those receiving services pay and there are financing agreements between municipalities and the development industry by front-end financing agreements and development charges.

When we make up joint service agreements for water, it's quite simple. The supplier charges for the water consumed and the user or the purchaser charges the end user for the water plus the cost of the debt on the water line.

Sewage agreements are very similar. The difference is that additional upfront money is required. This process allows for a major plant to be financed and built over several decades.

In the London area, already there are several joint service agreements that work and they all seem to benefit everyone. Even John Brant, in his report, stated that the minister should allow joint servicing. Since 1960, the city of London has entered into over a dozen joint service agreements for landfill, for roads, for sewage treatment and for water supply. In fact, we've been billing the city of London for 30 years for sewage treatment because we're treating some of its sewage.

The city of London's water supply is based on a joint service agreement with the province of Ontario. Is this committee being told that joint service agreements don't work, when the province has them with its own municipalities?

The province intervened and said no to joint service agreements. In these uncertain economic times, I think we have to do everything we can to work with our neighbours to get the services to the people. That's what really counts.

Ms Bond: Minister Cooke said Bill 75 will aid in the economic recovery for the area. We question this statement based on recent facts.

Bill 75 will take in excess of $35 million out of taxpayers' pockets over the next 10 years, with no change in service. This compensation tax does not generate more jobs. This added tax could force some businesses to the break point.

How do you create economic recovery by taking existing shopping centres, manufacturing plants, residential units and farms from one jurisdiction and putting them in another? Massive annexation will not create jobs. Most likely, jobs will be lost.

Bill 75 is pushing London over its threshold for several services, which will increase the cost to implement Bill 75.

Bill 75 is an imposed solution, not a negotiated partnership that could meet local needs at reasonable cost. Further, it is to be implemented without a full costing report.

It is our understanding that London city council has yet to accept Bill 75 by resolution. They've only accepted in principle the Brant report, which identified far less cost to the city.

The three local NDP members and Dianne Cunningham are going to be blamed for the high costs of Bill 75, because the province refused to accept a lower-cost alternative suggested by the city in 1988. Tory mayor Tom Gosnell has already set the stage and he has a real scapegoat if Bill 75 is passed: "The NDP government forced this solution on us."

Only in the last 30 days have financial impact reports become known that address even ballpark implementation costs. Compensation payments to the county of Middlesex and area municipalities have grown because of the severe financial impact of Bill 75 due to the loss of assessment from the county and its municipalities, principally the loss of the assessment base of Westminster. The province has been asked to date to pay $7.5 million in grants for compensation to the city of London. Why should the province have to subsidize the costs of this annexation? It appears the city is not in a position of being able to afford the costs of Bill 75. Why else would they ask for money, and why would Mr Cooke agree to such payments? Who gains if it costs taxpayers millions of dollars, regardless of which level of government pays?

Estimated costs of Bill 75 now have ranged from $35 million to $50 million to $75 million. No one ever believed Mayor Tom Gosnell that this annexation would not cost city residents a dime, but can the city and the province really afford the costs now emerging?

A major impact of Bill 75 is future education costs, which the minister refuses to address and defers to a later date. It is irresponsible to proceed without knowing how much Bill 75 will cost in the short and the long term. Even that famous recent report of the Financial Times warns of the potential risks of a large annexation.

To finance the increased demand for capital spending as a result of Bill 75, city council approved, on November 16, 1992, reviewing development charges, increasing the city's debt and increasing water rates and taxes. All this means extra costs, an increase in fees for service and increases in property taxes. Small business and fixed-income home owners certainly do not need more taxes.

Bill 75 certainly has a pocketbook impact and has had an impact on the community like no other piece of legislation in the lifetime of many people. Bill 75 will cost people a way of life they enjoy and an entire disruption in community. It does not acknowledge how a massive annexation will affect people in their own community.

Mr Grieve: When we think of a solution, we have to remember the 1990 terms of reference, and the terms of reference were for a local solution. The solution had as its goals being the best form of government for the area, which meant the economic, environmental, cultural and social needs of the citizens of the area, and all municipalities, including the county, are to be based on areas of common interest, effective and efficient services, financial viability, accessibility and accountability. This committee must embrace these same terms of reference if a solution has any credibility in the eyes of the public.

There are a few other weaknesses in Bill 75 I'm going to point out. One would be that it creates a greater service level difference between the rural resident and the urban resident. As the county would lose assessment, it would have to cut costs, and one of the first things that would be cut is soft services. The library system would probably be cut and recreation programs would be cut.

Increases for higher service delivery charges: Eventually the volunteer fire department would be replaced by a full-time department. This would increase costs from four to five times.

It would be a very costly solution requiring provincial financial aid, and we know how tight the province is for money. It has all the appearances to be an economic damper and not a stimulator.

If we're going to look at another solution, we should consider the financial impact of the 1988 proposal on Westminster. We estimate that the compensation package to the county would be reduced by 50%. There should be no need for provincial grants to the city. We do realize, however, that Westminster taxes would rise slightly due to the police service improvements, assuming a three-year phase-in, and this would probably be about a 5% to 6% increase over three years.

The 1988 proposal has some positive points that should be considered. One of the points I think we should consider is that right in the proposal it says, and I quote from what the city wrote:

"We do not wish to push Westminster out of existence. It keeps municipal units financially strong. It reduces financial impact on non-productive taxes, and think how much more benefit it would bring to the region if we could spend the money on hard services instead of on compensation. It provides a reasonable amount of land for the city to expand on and it has broad public support."

1150

In summary, we would like to suggest to the committee some of the following:

- Advise Mr Cooke that with the financial impact figures now available, Bill 75 is too costly and has too great a financial impact on the county of Middlesex, and the province of Ontario cannot afford to provide funds to subsidize this cost.

- Due to the costs of Bill 75, there will be a major tax increase for all taxpayers, which is unjustified, and the annexation should be downsized.

- The committee should consider these principles for the 1988 proposal that are based on lower costs, and they would be: up to about 20,000 acres of vacant land annexed to the city for future growth and development, accept joint servicing as an effective way to address environmental concerns, and leave viable economic communities like Westminster and the county of Middlesex alone.

- Incorporate into the legislation direction that the city and neighbouring municipalities enter into agreements for water supply and sewage treatment by June 1993.

- Incorporate into the legislation direction that the town of Westminster and the township of Delaware negotiate an amalgamation agreement by December 31, 1993.

- Continue the provincial policy of no fringe development until full municipal services are available.

- Direct the ministry staff, the city of London, the county and the municipalities to complete a full financial impact analysis of the costs of implementing the 1988 proposal to establish a fair compensation package.

- Recommend that the effective date of this would be on December 31, 1994.

I made a few comments of my own last night and I want to say that, because this is basically our last kick at the cat, as I call it, the last time we have a chance to say anything about the boundary issues or Bill 75.

You'll notice we have one more map up here behind Doug. I want you to look at that, because that's basically a map of southern Ontario, and this is a province that elected all of you to where you are today. We're paying your salaries.

When this process started, as it was stated earlier, it was going to be a model process for others to follow, but as it floundered, it was changed, and it was intended to solve a unique situation.

On this map of southern Ontario, you'll notice that down in the southwestern part there's a yellow section. That includes all of London and Middlesex county; that's how big they are. If you get close to it, it looks like a pretty big area, but the farther away you are, it's smaller. Maybe that's the problem. I'm in the centre of that and it's a big issue to me, but to some of you who maybe live in Ottawa or Mississauga or wherever some may come from, it's just another small issue.

But, you know, a lot of people are watching what's going to happen in London-Middlesex, and a lot of people are wondering what's going to happen to Bill 75 and a lot of questions are being asked.

If you'll notice on that map, there are a lot of little red dots. Every dot indicates where there's another boundary issue before the Ministry of Municipal Affairs. They are all involved in the boundary negotiation act; there are over 40 applications before the ministry.

There are a few other dots on there indicating municipalities that have contacted us which are in a very similar situation of being close to a large urban centre, and they fear for their existence.

The boundaries of the counties are also outlined, because it's not just the individual municipality that's involved; it involves the whole county. There's a lot of the area of this province that is involved in boundary issues, and they're watching to see what happens here.

I sometimes wonder where the government gets the ideas for naming the bills it passes. I wonder why this is Bill 75. I've come to the conclusion that it's probably because it's going to cost $75 million. And I wonder what some of these other annexation issues are that are going to be dictated by the Ministry of Municipal Affairs. What bill numbers are they going to be? Bill 40 or Bill 90 or Bill 103?

There's a big question being asked across this province, and they want to know: Is this NDP government going to allow the Ministry of Municipal Affairs to do to them what it's just done to Westminster?

It's not for me to tell you what to do, and it's not for Ben Veel, and it's not for Tom Gosnell, and it's not for Don Taylor, and it's not for Mary Newman, and it's not for Linda Duchek or Brian Riddell.

It's your responsibility, and your responsibility isn't any different, really, than mine as an elected official in Westminster. We have all kinds of contentious and controversial issues before us, and on one side we have our staff advising us and doing background research on what we should do, and on the other side we have the business community and the public telling us what they want.

But who's in the middle? It's the elected official. And whose responsibility is it? It's the elected official's. Who has the final say? It's the elected official. It's up to Irene Mathysen and it's up to David Winninger and it's up to Ron Hansen and to Gordon Mills, and it's Ron Eddy and it's Gary Carr and the rest who aren't here right now. That's whose responsibility it is.

Whatever decision is made on Bill 75, it will go to create part of the legacy of Bob Rae's NDP government. Is that legacy going to be of a government that listened to the people, heard what they said and directed the bureaucracy in the way they thought the people wanted them to go, or is it going to be a government that listened to the people and didn't really hear what they said and just followed the way the bureaucracy thought things should go?

If I were in your shoes, I know what kind of legacy I would leave for the future. Doris started our presentation with a quote from David Cooke. I want to quote another elected official in Ontario: "Good government doesn't just happen. It takes good people working together to create good government."

The Chair: Thank you. It looks like we'll have about one question apiece, starting off with Mr Eddy.

Mr Eddy: Thank you for your presentation and thank you for the lesson. It's a good lesson and it's one that elected people need from time to time, and I'm pleased to be one of the recipients of it.

I don't really have a question, except that I'd like a clarification from the ministry; two in fact, but perhaps I'd better ask that later. I'd like the Chair to clarify the procedure, because it's been stated in at least one of the presentations, and maybe more, that people have been told and some of the presenters have been told that there's no possible way this can be changed. If that is the case, this is a travesty, to hear people make presentations with good, well-thought-out alternatives in order to help the entire situation, all of us.

The only question I'd have is, do all of you believe that there is an alternative that could be worked out and be acceptable to the area, that would give the city, shall we say, most of what it needs according to its own studies and be acceptable to most of the parties or all the parties?

Mr Grieve: I think all of the parties are willing to settle on something other than Bill 75. The county made a counterproposal to the city last July, and we just found out two weeks ago that city council never even saw that counterproposal. It got to the board of control and it stopped. But we are willing, and I think the people are willing to look for another solution.

The Chair: Mr Eddy, we've got to carry on. I can say one thing: amendments that your party has would be welcome, if we could, before we meet again so we can study them, and the same thing with Mr Carr. I believe Irene's tabling some amendments or a plan—

Mr Eddy: We beg the NDP majority government—

The Chair: It's just that I haven't heard yet that everything was in stone the way you were indicating through the Chair.

Mr Eddy: I don't think it is.

The Chair: There's still an open mind. I'd like to carry on with Mr Carr.

Mr Carr: Thank you very much for your presentation. As I was looking at the finances and how well you've done there, I was thinking that what we should do is throw this government out and bring you in to run it.

Mr Grieve: No thanks.

Mr Carr: It may be frustrating for you on this issue, but I want to tell you, it's frustrating for us, because the way this has been mismanaged is the same way the education system is being mismanaged, the health care system is being mismanaged, the whole economy of this province is being mismanaged. The frustration that you feel on this issue is what I feel every day on every issue as I talk to different people. There is this tremendous amount of frustration out there on numerous issues, and what goes to the heart of this is the way it's been done, a total lack of management.

My question is along the same lines as Ron's. If we have an acceptable solution there, the 1988 proposal, why do you think the minister, and ultimately this government, won't go ahead with it? Why won't they put something in place that everybody can agree on? Why is he not going with it?

Mr Grieve: I guess you'd have to maybe admit that you made a mistake, and that's all I'm going to say.

The Chair: I'm going to have to move on to Ms Mathysen.

Mrs Mathysen: I have a question that probably would require some lengthy thought, and by virtue of that—

The Chair: You're going to be cut off by the bell, I can tell you, so if you don't get going—

Mrs Mathysen: No, you're not going to cut me off, Ron.

Basically, you indicated in your brief that Bill 75 violates the terms of reference set out by the province for the arbitrator. Could you give us a sense of how you feel Bill 75 violates the terms of reference it's supposed to uphold?

Ms Bond: Actually, I believe it's the terms of reference that were given to Westminster and London in 1990, not the ones given to the arbitrator. They were different terms of reference.

Mrs Mathysen: I see.

Ms Bond: That's where a lot of the problem was. Westminster followed the terms of reference given to it in 1990.

Mrs Mathysen: Early in 1990? By the previous government?

Mr Grieve: That's the terms of reference that I believe Minister Sweeney set out, and that's what we've worked through. We went through the fact-finding, then we had the terms of reference and then we went to the negotiation session where Mr Taylor was the chief negotiator. When no resolution was reached, the thing all fell apart, and then by that time Minister Cooke came in last January and went to the arbitration process and then gave John Brant a set of terms of reference that were completely different from the 1990 set. The problems haven't changed; they just changed the terms of reference.

Ms Bond: One main reason that Bill 75 violates the terms of reference is that it's not the least costly solution for the government; it's more costly than the other alternative solutions.

The Chair: I'm going to have to go to Mr Mills.

Mr Mills: Just a quick comment. There's a lot of emphasis spoken of the 1988 proposal, and I just remind you, as you probably know, that that was turned down by the previous Liberal government as well.

The Chair: Our time has expired. The bell's going any second now, so I'd like to thank you for coming before this committee.

This committee will be recessed until 3:30 this afternoon.

The committee recessed at 1203.

AFTERNOON SITTING

The committee resumed at 1628.

The Chair: We'll resume the hearings on Bill 75, An Act respecting Annexations to the City of London and to certain municipalities in the County of Middlesex.

Mr Eddy: On the matter of time, I understand the House leaders conferred regarding additional time and that we are allowed to sit after 6 some time, are we? So I would ask for unanimous consent for the full 50 minutes for the town of Westminster.

The Chair: The full what?

Mr Eddy: The 50 minutes. How long did they speak for? I think their presentation was—

The Chair: Which one are you talking about here?

Mr Eddy: The last delegation we had, were they complete? Did they have their full time?

The Chair: Yes, they did.

Mr Eddy: They were full. Okay.

The Chair: Yes, they did. But we've got a problem right now in that the one to go on at 4:30, Mr Roger George, has a meeting with Elmer Buchanan. I know we're an hour behind. Is there any group out there that could do a switch with time to let them go on? It's unforeseen that we're here at 4:30, not 3:30, because of a vote in the House. We didn't know when we set up the agenda last week, so if you can just bear with us. Could you wind up just switching there? Okay, fine.

Could we have Wendy Lenders and Hugh Fletcher and Mr Roger George and who else is in the delegation there.

Mr Eddy: Mr Chair, while they're coming forward, I'd like to move for unanimous consent for the town of Westminster, which I believe spoke the last day we had hearings and I believe had 10 minutes of its full allotment. I would move that—

The Chair: I don't believe—I haven't got my records here, but—

Mr Eddy: Okay, I'll check it out and get back to you.

The Chair: —I can take a look at Hansard. We can tell about the time in there.

Mr Eddy: Yes, okay.

The Chair: I don't think I would ever cut anybody short at 10 minutes for a presentation.

Mr Grandmaître: Well, we don't know about that.

The Chair: Maybe you only had 10 minutes for questions there, Mr Eddy.

Mr Eddy: No, Mr Chair, it's not the questions. We can skip them. It's the presentations that I'm concerned about. Honestly.

The Chair: I know. We've been trying to be fair to every group here.

1630

ONTARIO FEDERATION OF AGRICULTURE

The Chair: Okay, if you would identify yourself before you start. We have until 5 o'clock. You may begin.

Mr Roger George: Thank you, Mr Chairman. I'm Roger George, the president of the Ontario Federation of Agriculture. I have with me Carl Sulliman, the chief executive officer of the OFA. Miss Wendy Lenders from Middlesex and Mr Hugh Fletcher from Middlesex will also be making presentations before the OFA ones. So I think, Mr Chairman, we want to start off with Wendy, if you would, please.

Ms Wendy Lenders: My name's Wendy Lenders. The county and the city have been chastised for not finding a local solution. I will admit I was somewhat disappointed in my local government and the county, but I'm not any more. I found out when I was here on October 29 that we did have a solution with approval on both sides. It was the province that put the kibosh on our local solution.

Now the province is to pass sentence of life in the city of London on many of the area rural people for a crime they did not commit. The province has a vision that London will experience rapid growth in the next 20 to 30 years. I wonder if this vision is similar to the one that Governor Simcoe had when he saw London as the capital of Canada. London would have made a lovely capital, but this did not come to be. I'm sure there are other centres in southwestern Ontario that would like just a piece of the action.

You are the standing committee on finance and economic affairs, but this is a land use planning issue. The purpose of this bill is to alter the boundaries of the city of London to increase the land base within the city's jurisdiction to meet the city's planning and development needs. If this sounds one-sided, that's because it is.

The size of the annexation has not been justified. The buffer zone has been put in place to keep annexation number 2 lands virgin of urban development. The idea of preserving farm land within the city limits, though the intention is good, will not work. You cannot legislate attitude. You are moving the farm land from urban shadow to farm land in transition. Farm land best protected in the province? I don't think so. My farm land is better protected than these lands.

This process and this bill are inconsistent with the Sewell commission mandate and the ministry's growth and settlement policy guidelines. I'm not against annexation, but the 1988 proposal, or boundaries similar to it, would be more appropriate. This would be a local solution and it meets the requirements set out in Mr Brant's terms of reference, except for the airport.

The city is already responsible for the servicing of the airport. Justification has not been shown as to why the airport should be in the city. This airport serves more than just the city or our county; it serves our neighbouring counties as well. I notice that Transport Canada is not on the list at the back of the Brant report. This is a list of people consulted.

This annexation proposed in Bill 75 purges the county. I don't want the city's blood money; I want fair compensation for a fair annexation.

I will supply you each with a copy of my letter I sent to Mr Brant during his hearings. I feel it would be worthwhile to this committee to have access to all presentations and submissions made to Mr Brant. You can see for yourself whether the people were listened to or not. The location and the allotment of time for these committee hearings have severely curtailed public involvement.

I'd be happy to answer any questions you might have, but before I do, I'd just like to make one suggestion. If Ontario is truly going to reform planning and development in this province, may I suggest that a committee be formed to deal with land use planning affairs and to hear issues such as these in the future.

Mr Carl Sulliman: My name is Carl Sulliman. I'm chief executive officer of the Ontario Federation of Agriculture.

Needless to say, the nomenclature itself will indicate to you what side of the fence we're on in this issue: the farmers'. We could spend a considerable lot of time here on technical details, but we're a farm organization. We're here representing farmers and we're speaking to elected political leaders in this province, and the political optics don't look good.

There are just two or three very quick points that I want to make to those of you who are elected men and women to the Legislative Assembly of the province of Ontario. One is the incomprehensible land grab that the city is doing in terms of its size and magnitude and the amount of planning breathing space that this is going to allow for it. We in the Ontario Federation of Agriculture only wish, this very day in November 1992, when 95% of the corn crop in this province is still sitting in the fields, that we could plan for next week, much less planning for 120 years for some city in southwestern Ontario. Frankly, the issue here is, how come every time we've got an urban problem there's a rural solution thrown up? Whether it's annexation or waste dump sites, it's just time and time again.

It's the inconsistency in process. The honourable minister, with whom we've met several times—and other representations have been made to him—promises integrity in the process. The integrity is not preserved and protected. We leap-frog over some of his own rules and regulations. We've got other annexation applications before the minister and we are dreadfully anxious about the implications and the precedents that this particular issue sets for the balance of Ontario. Simultaneously, you have the Sewell commission running around the province. We don't yet know what the results of that are and the implications for farmers and irreplaceable prime farm land in this great province of Ontario. Those are issues that we're not particularly pleased with.

Then there's the question that each one of you would be well versed in: political representation. Once you're gobbled up into a large urban centre like this, we know already that because of the demographics of the electorate out there, the rural population, farmers represent less than 3% of the population. You grab some of the finest farm land and the farm families who are on that farm land in a place like southwestern Ontario and you've just now consumed them into yet another larger urban centre. I ask you, with a planning curve that allows you anywhere from 80 to 120 years, what is the future of that farm land and how can it possibly be justified in 1992?

These are just some of the key points. I don't want to talk a long time, because Roger and I are here to respond, along with Hugh and Wendy, to questions that the men and women of the House may have on this issue. We're very grateful to the delegation that deferred time to us and appreciative of the opportunity to come before you, Mr Chairman.

Mr Hugh Fletcher: In September I presented on behalf of the Middlesex Federation of Agriculture to the minister's presentation in London. Our stand, from the federation's point of view, has not changed since that time. You have a handout with you that includes that presentation. I have given up some of my time to the OFA, which has not, up until now, had the chance to appear before this committee in an open hearing.

At a time when politicians lack credibility, the decision comes down to this committee as to what type of government we have. Do we have good government? Do we have responsible government? Do we have good and responsible government? I must say there are some cruel and unusual jokes out there. I heard one yesterday. What is the definition of politics? It's a two-syllable word, the first half being "poli," meaning many, and the second half being "tics," and we all know that's uncontrollable jerks. That's a nasty one.

Mr Grandmâitre: But you're right.

Mr Fletcher: That's it. That is where we are looking at. Until something is done, until we see results from these hearings, from the meetings we had with Mr Brant in the first place, from the meetings we had with the minister, then is it all a charade?

The top page of the handout that I've sent around or that you should have is a letter to the former warden dated October 19 from Dave Cooke. In the third paragraph it says, "While I am aware that some are seeking a substantial modification of the boundaries submitted by John Brant, I am not prepared to entertain any changes in boundaries that are not minor adjustments."

The question to this committee is, who is running things here? Is it this committee that makes changes?

1640

Mr Carr: To some degree.

Mr Fletcher: To some degree? Is it the government? Is it one minister and his staff running things? That is the question for this committee.

All along, throughout this, Mr Cooke has touted the efficiencies of the city of London and its planning ability. It is now one year ago September that the city hall staff told the city of London that it needed to drastically increase its development fees. Last week it came back before council; it just came back before council. They're going to think about it.

This is a city too that is also now saying, "We'll have to look at services that are being provided for the annexed areas." Not "We will continue and upgrade services provided to the annexed area," but "We will have to consider what services we think they need."

In the presentations made to Mr John Brant, the London Transit Commission manager made a presentation to him at 9 o'clock in the evening. He lives in White Hills, a subdivision approximately 20 years old. He couldn't make it home by public transportation because the last bus leaving for downtown to his subdivision left at 8:30. Transportation services don't really exist in that city.

The city council, this summer, has decided it should build a three-lane bridge on a four-lane major north-south artery. But we must remember, this is a city that has two expressways, both of them less than a kilometre in length, not connected at any point to either of them and they just go from A to B, here and there. There are no major studies I have seen or heard that they have major transportation policies, and this is a city that you, by going with Bill 75, will make the 10th-largest city in Canada. This is also, by doing that, increasing the land use. They are taking more land for annexation than land that was used for annexation purposes from 1981 to 1986. It is just ludicrous.

In regard to agriculture, if this goes through, there needs to be a strong agricultural committee. It has been suggested that an advisory committee be created. An advisory committee to a city council that builds a three-lane bridge on a four-lane highway isn't going to do much good. If they won't listen to their city hall staff for at least a year, why should they listen to an advisory committee on agriculture, of all things, within a city which is dedicated to development?

Earlier today you listened to the London and St Thomas Real Estate Board. Mr Eddy asked the question, if St Thomas wanted to enlarge, what township should it take? He was suggesting Yarmouth; I believe it's to the south of St Thomas. Am I right?

Mr Eddy: I think it's mostly to the north. Yes, I think between London and—

Mr Fletcher: Between London and St Thomas?

Mr Eddy: St Thomas, yes.

Mr Fletcher: That would be a foolhardy thing to do, because you have to realize, with this annexation as it is, there are only three blocks separating London and St Thomas. All of a sudden St Thomas would be a prime candidate for annexation by London. It seems foolhardy to have such a large, large annexation unless you can justify it, and I do not think, at this time, for these costs, it can be done.

Mr George: In conclusion, a very short statement: Earlier this year my vice-president, Jack Wilkinson, travelled along with Carl Sulliman, our chief executive officer, to Middlesex and the city of London for a three-day consultation with the farmers affected by this process. Now we're here at the 11th hour appealing to the members of the Legislature to put some common sense back into this flawed decision on behalf of the Ministry of Municipal Affairs.

What's at stake for our organization is the issue of land use, the whole integrity of the government process on annexation, as well as the preservation of farm land.

Quite frankly, my organization has recently indicated to the Minister of Agriculture and Food that we're not prepared to go on with the debate on land use policy in this province and the preservation of agricultural land till this government puts some integrity back. It's not only the annexation process but the site selection process for waste management sites and so on and so forth, because you're sending some awfully, awfully strange signals to the farmers of this province.

The Chair: I guess we have some time for some questions here, and we'll start off with Mr Carr.

Mr Carr: Thank you very much for your presentation. It's nice seeing you again. I know we talked last week about the many challenges facing your organization, and there are many. I understand with the switch in time that you have a meeting with the minister this afternoon. As you know, the Ministry of Agriculture got involved in some of the other projects. I'm thinking now of the Ottawa hockey rink. They've been strangely silent on this. What are you going to tell the minister when you meet with him this afternoon regarding this bill?

Mr George: We're not meeting with the minister on this particular issue in actual fact, so I doubt very much if that issue will come up, but we will have an opportunity to discuss it with the minister in subsequent times, and we've already indicated to the Minister of Agriculture in writing basically the same things we've been telling this committee for the last 15 minutes.

Mr Carr: In terms of the importance of the Ministry of Agriculture, why do you think it's been silent up till now regarding this very important issue?

Mr Fletcher: I think the Minister of Agriculture would have to answer that question.

Mr Carr: Would the parliamentary assistant like to indicate why the Ministry of Agriculture hasn't been involved in this process at all?

Mr Fletcher: If I may answer, they seem to have this strange rule where the Ministry of Agriculture does not get involved until you have a zoning change. So in actual fact, if this is not a major shift from prime land going into the city, if it is not really declared redundant, out of use, what not, once it moves into the city, any comment the Ministry of Agriculture makes at that time, at zoning time, is just minor.

Mr Carr: Let me ask Roger this. I think I heard you say that your organization doesn't want to participate if they're not going to listen to you on these issues.

Mr George: Absolutely. I made it very clear to Mr Buchanan we have not yet responded to his policy statement on food land preservation, and once again tonight, farmers across the province, at least in the regions of York and Durham and Peel, are sitting on pins and needles, waiting for another bombshell to be dropped on them in the morning by Mrs Grier on the short list for the sites for the Interim Waste Authority. It's just not good enough that this province is gobbling up farm land for these uses with scant regard to the use of prime agricultural land. We in the Ontario Federation of Agriculture are just totally dissatisfied on that whole issue.

Mr Carr: I appreciate that one, because that's an important one.

The Chair: Mr Carr, I've got to carry on. The parliamentary assistant would like to make a comment?

Mr Mills: Yes, just a brief comment. You asked about the involvement of the Minister of Agriculture. This process was before cabinet, and the minister is a member of cabinet and was in that approval process. I'd like to say that the agricultural land was felt by the cabinet to be protected sufficiently through sound planning, not by the boundaries. So that's the decision.

1650

Mr Grandmaître: Mr Chair, can I reply on this one? How come the Minister of Ag and Food gets involved in official plans, when the official plans are being circulated to three, four, five, six, seven or eight ministries and Ag and Food is the most severe ministry when it comes to agricultural land, then how come the Ministry of Ag and Food is not involved in this troubling annexation which involves agricultural land?

Mr Mills: They will be. He will be.

Mr Grandmaître: They will be? When? After the annexation, they will be.

Mr Mills: In the approval of the official plan, Bernard.

Mr Grandmaître: In official plans, but this is much worse than an official plan; this is annexation.

Mr Mills: That's when he gets to comment.

Mr Sulliman: I guess the issue for us is that we haven't come here to finger-point at members of the executive council, at individual members of Parliament. The issue is that we come before a duly constituted committee of the Legislative Assembly of the province of Ontario saying that, for heaven's sake, this is the last chance for sober second thought on an action that we believe is not in the best interests of Ontario, much less the farming community. It just is a poor decision. It's not just the integrity question of the process; it's a bad decision.

We appeal to you as reasonable men and women elected to the Legislative Assembly to consider that as a committee and to take that back to the House with a very sincere representation on behalf of the people of Ontario. You are the last stop in this process for us, and that's what we're asking for today. We're not here to finger-point, to lay blame at anybody's doorstep. Let's take a second look, from a commonsense, farm-gate level, at a bad decision. Do it and do it now.

The Chair: When I saw you and Roger standing outside, I took it that you were here from the perspective of not only locally but provincially. I think all committee members realize that.

We go on to Ms Mathysen.

Mrs Mathysen: I have a question for Mr George and a question for Mr Fletcher. Mr George, this farm land, the minister has stated unequivocally, will be protected by regulation and will be the best-protected farm land in Ontario. Can the city of London, can regulation, protect this farm land?

Mr Fletcher, you were present when we discussed the rural advisory committee for that rural community, the working farms, to be annexed, that representation before the London council. It was our feeling that it should be a committee with teeth and with influence that could truly advocate. What was the response of the city of London to that directive that it be a committee that indeed had some power?

Mr George: Mrs Mathysen, in response to whether or not the planning process can protect the farm land around London sufficiently, I throw back the question to you, has the planning process protected the farm land around Toronto over the years?

Mr Fletcher: In regard to the other half of the question, yes, I was involved with the meeting with the city of London. The city of London operates in its own weird and wonderful way, and it only accepts advisory committees if they are elected—their standing committees are elected people—so we could only be an advisory committee and they would just take us as that. Basically, we were told exactly where we would fit into the situation. It was not a consultation by any means. "This is how we run our show. Just because we are tripling in size, so what?" We're going to have one extra councillor, but it will be the same other 19 members of council who do, really, the dictating of things. It'll be business as usual.

Mr Grandmaître: Let's talk about the process, because every group we've met in the last five or six weeks wasn't too satisfied with the process. Yet there's a Municipal Boundary Negotiations Act in place, which wasn't satisfactory, I guess, to the minister or the ministry, who then appointed a single arbitrator, and then the minister had to send a letter of apology to every municipality in the province of Ontario saying, "Hey, this is unique," yet this is the model that will be in place for future annexation.

I want to ask you, why is the ministry or the minister—and I'm not finger-pointing or anything—

Interjection: It sure sounds like it.

Mr Kimble Sutherland (Oxford): Obviously I need a translator.

Mr Grandmaître: Why is it that, when at first you people were looking at the possibility of a 20,000-acre annexation and now it has reached 64,000 acres, why is the government going through with this? Being an outsider, why do you think the government is going through with this? Because we don't know.

Mr George: I guess we're here to ask the same question. I don't know either.

Mr Mills: I suspect you do know.

Mr Grandmaître: I'm asking the question and they won't answer my question, so maybe you can try your luck.

The Chair: Time is running out. I think a lot of good questions have been asked. It's good to see you again, Roger and Carl. Thank you for appearing before the committee. I'm grateful that the other group was able to accommodate you. Have a good talk with the minister.

Mr Sulliman: We are very grateful, Mr Chairman.

In answer to your question, Mr Grandmaitre, it's been a long time since the United Farmers of Ontario were the government, so until it comes around again—

Mr Eddy: The election of 1919.

The Chair: Thank you.

Could we have Professor Andrew Sancton, please?

Mr Eddy: Mr Chair, while we have this short interlude, could I clarify the question I had previously? It had to do with the presentation of the town of Westminster officials. They had a joint presentation with the township of Delaware. Unfortunately, the township of Delaware took most of the time and the town of Westminster only had 10 minutes. I would like to ask for unanimous consent for the town of Westminster to complete its presentation. They feel they didn't have any time.

Mr Sutherland: I understand that, Mr Eddy. My only comment would be that many groups are on here. Everyone understands that some days the House goes later. We try to accommodate as many groups as possible. Some groups have been delayed. Groups last week didn't get their full time either. We've had groups in favour and against not getting their full time. I understand we had the town of Westminster in two weeks ago in terms of making a presentation then, so there have been groups officially representing the town of Westminster given their full time to make their presentations.

Mr Eddy: I thank the member for the information. Mr Chair, the members here may be aware of the fact that the House leaders dealt with this matter and allowed us to sit a bit after 6. Are you aware of that?

The Chair: Yes. I was told that we'd be sitting till after 6. They gave us permission because we knew the vote was in the House. If we got finished earlier, it would have been done earlier.

Mr Eddy: I know some people have to get away, too.

The Chair: I hope you don't leave early, Mr Eddy.

1700

UNIVERSITY OF WESTERN ONTARIO

The Chair: Would you please identify yourself for the purposes of Hansard. I would like to welcome you here to the standing committee on finance and economics.

Dr Andrew Sancton: Thank you, Mr Chairman. My name is Andrew Sancton. I'm a resident of the city of London. I'm employed by the University of Western Ontario, where I teach in the political science department, and my specialty is local government. I'm accompanied today by Councillor Joe Swan of the city of London, a former student of mine and also my ward councillor. I ask that he be allowed to use a few minutes of my time, because there are some aspects of this on which he's better qualified to speak than I am.

You have, I believe, my written brief that was sent before you decided on the extra day of hearings—I very much appreciate the fact that the committee decided to have another day of hearings—and I think you should now also have a copy of the notes I have for myself today, so in fact there are two documents you have available to you.

I want to make three major points and two minor ones. The first is the lack of research that has been done on this large annexation. The second is the lack of support for the large annexation. The third has to do with joint servicing agreements. These are all issues which have been talked about considerably today since I've been here.

I have two minor points that haven't been talked about at all today, concerning the city/county liaison committee and social planning. If it looks like we have time I might just slip those in, but if I don't have time, they are in front of you in writing.

The first major point is this: I believe we are in this mess, and I think it is a mess, because the previous Minister of Municipal Affairs, Mr Sweeney, decided that London's 1988 proposals were not sufficiently comprehensive. I searched in vain for evidence or research that supports this position. There were no public hearings prior to this conclusion being arrived at and no comprehensive research was commissioned.

The closest approximation to anything like evidence is found in a December 1989 study for the ministry's fact-finder done by Huron-Middlesex Engineering which concerned hard services. Like all such documents in the boundary negotiations process, it was never made officially public, to my knowledge; one tracks it down with some difficulty.

That particular study says—and I'm only quoting this because we're trying to find some real research that's been done here and it's hard to find it—"The best option for Westminster's sewage is a new large treatment plant south of Lambeth that would discharge the sewage directly into the Thames River or into Lake Erie." But it says, "We can't look at this because it would cost too much, it's not a serious proposal," and no further study was done.

The report goes on to say: "A preferred option is the collection and pumping of virtually all town raw sewage into the city of London for treatment by their facility. Although this option may not be politically feasible, it is technically, financially and environmentally sound. If some form of negotiation and agreement are to result, this option should be investigated further."

I might be wrong, of course, but I see Minister Sweeney's intervention as an attempt to make this option politically feasible, but without allowing for joint servicing agreements. Of course, I want to talk more about joint servicing in a few minutes.

What was the result of Mr Sweeney's intervention? Westminster then proposed regional government, which was also later ruled out—I think quite rightly in the circumstance—and London proposed something much larger. I really think this is the dynamic that was happening here. The minister said, "We've got to have a more comprehensive solution." London said, "You want comprehensive, we'll give you comprehensive." And they just sat down and drew the lines larger on the map, not really expecting in their wildest hopes that this would actually come to pass. That is what is so astonishing about this whole process, and it leads me to my second major point.

No one, and I repeat, no one I know of wants an annexation this large. As a political scientist, this is an absolutely fascinating process. We seem to be lurching towards a conclusion that no interest wants and so—it was a question that was asked before by Mr Grandmaître—one has to wonder.

Westminster and Middlesex are now willing to accept the original proposal that launched this whole process. This is not an obscure proposal, in 1988. This is the proposal that the city started the process with. Westminster and the county are ready to accept it.

I submit that most, if not all, city politicians would be thrilled to have the 1988 proposals as the final solution. The big question is, why won't they say so, except for a very few, one of whom is sitting beside me today? The answer—it's already been stated earlier today—is that they do not want this whole thing to unravel. They fear that if they don't get such a large annexation, they're not going to get anything at all. I think the same logic explains the position of the London Chamber of Commerce, the real estate board that you heard from today and probably many developers who hold land closer in to London. They support the large annexation because they're afraid they're not going to get even a smaller annexation.

If in fact the two alternatives are what's in Bill 75 and no annexation, I will tell you that I support the city's position. I've many friends in Westminster and they probably hate to hear me say that, but that's my position. London needs more land for growth. I support that position. But it is absolutely ludicrous to say that there are only two alternatives. There is a vast range of alternatives in between, including the city's original 1988 proposal, which, I repeat, has now got the support of the county and the town of Westminster as well.

On the subject of how things look from the city's perspective on this issue and other related issues that he wants to raise, I'll turn the floor over to Councillor Swan.

Mr Joe Swan: I was elected in 1988 to represent approximately 30,000 residents, covering much of the same area as the representative for London North, Ms Cunningham. Through this whole process, it seems to me, one event continues to lead to the next event, which seems to make the first event—it makes it look worse and worse as we go further and further into the process.

I remember when I was first elected in 1988 that the development industry had pushed hard for approximately 15,000 acres of land, because the city was in need of both industrial and housing land. Being somewhat sceptical of the development industry's claims about how much shortage there was, I had difficulty even accepting the 15,000 acres. The municipality's position was: "In order to ensure that we get 15,000, we'd better aim for around 22,000. That would be a firm negotiating position, and that way, if we have to take a setback, at least we're going to cover off what the development industry is telling us."

From that decision, Professor Sancton is correct that the minister, Mr Sweeney, sent the direction down that in fact it wasn't large enough. So the proposal came back,

"Well, where do we go from here?" The next thing that's reasonable is, "Perhaps we'll take over certain aspects of the assessment area around the town of Westminster." That wasn't good enough. The next answer to it was, "Well, I guess we have to take over the town." I want to tell the committee that it was even considered at one time that we should take over the county. That was a proposal that was discussed by our council. I mean, the logic and the rationale just began to build and build, and I think Professor Sancton is 100% correct in saying that the municipality and the council members I deal with do not want the kind of annexation that is being proposed today.

It's interesting that you did receive a report from three members of our city council. It's interesting that it's the first time I, as a council member, have seen it. It's interesting that it's the first time I, as a council member, have seen the figures in here. It leads to the question, how did we get here?

I have to tell you that the boundary negotiations process is not the best process. You'll recall that the old process used to have an OMB hearing, in which there was full public disclosure, in which the meetings went on for some time, with diverse interest groups. The boundary negotiations process is a very closed one. There's a very controlled information flow, where you have three or four people on a boundary negotiations team that controls the information.

I have to tell you that, in my view, as a full council this has not had full deliberation. I have been there since 1988 and spent less than 20 hours of council time talking about the future of London for the 21st century. I have to say to this committee that the fundamental issue is, can you slow this process down?

I could sit and go through amendment by amendment and perhaps try to work a few numbers or figures or so on, but really, and I say to the the Chairman, the question for the committee is not to go through with your amendments next week, piece by piece. The question is to go back to the minister and say that we think that this significant amount of land is flawed. I honestly believe, in my heart of hearts, not from being a "politic," that our municipal council, around a rational table looking at a smaller annexation that ensures controlled growth, you will receive that consent.

My final point on this particular aspect is that London was just recognized by the Financial Times as being the best-managed city in the country, and for that we can be very proud. But let me tell you how we got there. It was through very controlled growth. It sure was knowing where every nickel went before you jumped into it. I can tell you right now that financial projections for this annexation are simply scary. You will also know that the city is now back to the province asking for money, over $7 million, looking for the province to bail it out. So when we say that the city can afford it, that the city has an unlimited tax assessment base in order to pay for this, it's clearly wrong; it's not the case.

I may leave it just there. I had wanted to perhaps talk a bit about the board of control, but we'll leave it for now.

1710

Dr Sancton: My last major point has to do with the question of joint servicing, or one municipality providing services to another municipality.

It seems to me, when you strip away all of these issues involved in this, that the issue of joint servicing becomes absolutely crucial to the whole debate. It's very important to realize that a key part of the city's strategy in its 1988 proposal was to propose joint servicing to the town of Westminster. What happened is that the city said, "We want X amount of land within our own boundaries, primarily for industrial development, and as part of the tradeoff for that, we will give up our long-standing opposition to providing services on a user-pay basis to adjoining municipalities."

So the city changed its policy on joint servicing to try to ease this annexation along. At the time, as somebody who wasn't involved in the process at all, I thought: "What a good strategy this is. This makes a lot of sense. There is the makings of a deal here."

Then, we see from the public documents, the public records and from everything I've heard since then, that it was the Ministry of Municipal Affairs that said this joint servicing agreement simply was not acceptable to its point of view. This, to me, is the great mystery of it. I simply do not understand. It makes no sense. As municipal services become more and more complex, it is the only way they will be able to be provided efficiently without constant structural reorganization, and surely we don't want that in Ontario or anywhere else.

One of the great ironies, of course—it's been mentioned before—is that John Brant himself, the arbitrator, recognized that joint servicing was the solution for the northern part of the city.

Are municipalities to be determined by pipelines and engineers, or are they to be determined by recognizing communities of people and giving them the right to govern themselves? Even the engineers don't believe that municipal boundaries must follow their pipes. I want to say in passing that still less should school system boundaries follow the pipes. I notice we have the chair of the Middlesex County Board of Education with us today, who has very legitimate concerns about what all this is doing to the school system in the area.

I don't like to engage in Ministry of Municipal Affairs bashing or bureaucrat bashing or anything else because—I was going to say some of my best friends are Municipal Affairs bureaucrats, and that happens to be true. But it seems to me that only the Ministry of Municipal Affairs has this peculiar hangup, and it is not one that's shared by ministries of municipal affairs or urban affairs or community affairs in other provinces.

The conventional view outside Ontario is that joint servicing arrangements are part of the solution, not part of the problem. Where's the evidence that joint servicing agreements don't work? And if they're not perfect, do we know that their effects are worse than what's envisioned by Bill 75? And what would their effectiveness be if the ministry invested as much effort in promoting, monitoring and improving the effectiveness of joint service agreements as it does in trying to manipulate boundaries all the time?

As I said in my original written brief, why do we have a municipal boundaries branch and not a joint servicing agreements branch within the Ministry of Municipal Affairs?

I do have these couple of other minor points, one concerning section 51, which provides for a joint city-county committee. I think I know why that provision is in there. It's because arbitrator Brant said there should be such a committee. The key point is that arbitrator Brant recommended that that committee have real authority to manage certain functions. Section 51 does not say that. I submit that section 51 is pure window dressing so that it looks like the legislation is following the Brant committee report. Since it's just window dressing I think it can go.

The second minor point is that section 57 says London "shall prepare and adopt a plan for the delivery of social services" for the same period as the new official plan. That is not what arbitrator Brant recommended. He recommended that social planning actually be part of the official plan, not that it be a parallel process. The minister saw fit not to include that in the legislation, another departure from the recommendations he said he was going to implement.

This is the irony here, of course. He's sticking to implementing the Brant boundaries without implementing the Brant package. There's so much focus on the boundaries that I think we forget that the process has now gone far beyond; it's quite a different set of proposals than what Brant originally recommended.

There's a kind of semantic debate about whether it should be social planning or planning for social services. The point I think is that the city of London council has no interest in social planning. It hasn't come to you and said, "We want to do social planning and we're glad to get this."

I believe that municipalities should be more involved in social planning. That, incidentally, is one of the reasons why I'm opposed to the principle of disentanglement, but this section, as it's written now, is worse than useless. Again, it is window dressing. If this committee doesn't think that the municipal council of London should take control over what the Ministry of Community and Social Services does concerning social services in London, then I think you should scrap the section altogether.

My conclusion is this. I make my living studying, teaching and writing about politics. I know how unusual it would be for a legislative committee to stop or slow down a majority government's bill at this stage in the process. That is exactly what I am pleading with you to do. As other people have said, this is bad public policy. It has not been thought through. It undermines our fundamental ideas about the purposes of local government. We can do better, much better.

You've heard from others that the process has gone too far now to change, but you know—I don't have to remind you—that we are talking about proposed sections of proposed legislation. Surely we are here to determine whether this process should go ahead.

So please do what needs to be done to legislate a much smaller annexation combined with joint servicing in Westminster. Please legislate what London asked for in 1988. I believe that's what local people want. I believe that's a better solution financially. You'll be responding to deeply felt local concerns if you do that. You'll be defending the local government in this province. I believe that if there was ever a time for a legislative committee to show some real independence on an issue, this is it.

I don't know if Joe wants to say more about how he thinks the process might go from here.

Mr Swan: Just quickly, I suppose people may be wondering why I'm diverging so much from the current city position. It is simply because the original position in 1988 was a well-thought-out one, a well-documented one, a reasonable approach to the annexation. It took in enough industrial land and enough residential land to last us to the year 2026. It is a reasonable one. It is one that is now supported by both the county and the town of Westminster. It is the local solution that we've been looking for.

When I think about the preservation of the county and the town, I'd go back to an OMB hearing in 1961 that talked about the last annexation. The rationale they used for amalgamating the areas of Byron and a few others into the municipality was based on a community of interest.

It said that the existing three areas had a community of interest because they were in a urban environment. When we look at this particular annexation today, we are not talking about two similar units. We are not talking about two communities of the same interest; we're talking about very diverse interests. We are talking about townships that have different needs, different interests, different problems from the rural and the urban context.

I think that is an important principle we cannot lose. We cannot assume, through this legislation that's setting a precedent, that every other rural area, any time some service problems happen, gets amalgamated with an urban centre. That is just not good public policy.

I'd be remiss if I didn't read this, quickly, if I could, Mr Chairman, because my council board of control members are expecting it, so I wouldn't want to let them down.

"In determining whether or not [the board of control] makes a difference for a municipality, two factors should be considered. First, if the board of control is an important feature of a municipality's governance, one would have to question why the province does not appear to display much confidence in a board of control system."

I'm going to read quickly: "Eight of 11 boards of control were abolished by the province, with six of those eight boards of control being abolished by the province without a specific request to do so. The province has never refused a request of the municipality to either abolish an existing board or dispense with the need to establish one."

1720

In 7 of 11 cases where the province restructured the local governance of a particular region of the province, including Metropolitan Toronto, Durham, Haldimand-Norfolk, Halton, Peel, Sudbury and Waterloo, it has specifically prohibited the establishment of boards of control and, in so doing, the province also dissolved the existing board of control in the city of Sudbury and in the city of Oshawa.

The last point: The province has prohibited all upper-tier regional municipalities from establishing a board of control, notwithstanding the fact of their larger budget, a higher level of debt and a volume of contracts that would far exceed those in the municipality.

Quite clearly, in order for our board of control to be eliminated, we need a two-thirds vote of council, and when you're sitting with five members who are very unlikely to vote for themselves, it just takes one or two and they hold the vote. They have done that in the past and I would expect they will be able to maintain that in the future.

The question to this committee is clause 5(b); it should have no reference to board of control and it should be eliminated.

The Chair: Okay. We'll go to Irene.

Mrs Mathysen: I have a question for Professor Sancton and one for Mr Swan.

Professor Sancton, in your presentation you talked about the dislocations that boundary adjustments create. Could you briefly describe some of the dislocations that this adjustment will create? I know you're not as expert as Mrs McIlmoyle about the educational disruptions, but perhaps you could touch on those.

Mr Swan, you mentioned that there hadn't been a great deal of discussion within city council about Bill 75. I wonder if you could comment on what you see down the road in terms of the effects the current bill will have on the city of London, any detrimental effects, any problems that you can foresee.

Dr Sancton: On the first point, the dislocations, I think there have been other people here today who have testified to that far more eloquently than I can. I think particularly of Susan Grieve and some of the other people who live in those areas.

On a more technical level—again, I'm by no means an expert on this—we get into these issues of communications—police and fire communications, for example—where the city's communications systems were designed for a city of a particular size and now all of a sudden it's tripled, so you get into huge expenses associated with that; the existence of volunteer fire people in Westminster and the fact that that whole way of life would be dislocated, and of course it's going to cost more to have full-time fire people doing it.

On the school front, it really does seem mind-boggling that this whole process could somehow have gone along with the school boards sitting out there as very partial players, being chastised by arbitrator Brant for not doing all the research, as though annexation was going to happen, yet they weren't involved in the process to start with. Every time I read about it or hear about it or talk to any of the school people about it, I'm just appalled at the situation they're in. As a parent of young children, I can imagine how awful it would feel to be out there, not knowing how this whole system is going to affect the busing of your children from one place to another. It's just an awful mess.

The Chair: Mr Eddy, one question.

Mr Eddy: It's interesting, the comment on board of control. Most of them have been abolished. I believe it was Paul Hickey, who did a study on local government, who said the board of control system is designed to keep information from the members of a council. But we won't dwell on that.

The question I had was in regard to the city's presentation. You have a copy of the city's presentation. Was that at this committee?

Mr Swan: Actually, I found it on the—

Mr Eddy: I believe you've said this is the first time you've seen it.

Mr Swan: That's correct.

Mr Eddy: And it's the position of city council? Mr Chair, I submit, in my experience the only way you can have a presentation representing the view of the council is to have a certified copy of a document adopted and passed by a council. I rest my case. I think it's terrible.

I want to ask about a lack of research on annexations, your position that indeed an impact study should have been done in this case and why, as in all other annexations. Would you comment on that?

Mr Swan: Again, I went back and did my homework on the 1961 annexation. There were significant studies done to ensure that the cost and the feasibility of annexation were well thought out, well prepared and we clearly understood the implications on the tax base.

In this particular case, it's just a giant leap of faith. They just think economic growth is going to happen, and what's interesting, as someone mentioned before, is that we now have detrimental effects. We now have to look at our development charges bylaw, which you can expect either to double or triple, which will be a disincentive to economic development.

You can look at tax increases. I notice in this report it's 2.7%. Recent numbers are certainly going to take that up close to the 4% or 5% at a minimum, plus cost of inflation. Before long, we're looking at double-digit tax increases, and I quite clearly know what the answer's going to be at our council. Who did this? The NDP.

Mrs Cunningham: I very much appreciate the presentation we've just heard and certainly share the views of Professor Sancton in this regard, because it has been a point of frustration, the size of the annexation.

I have a question for either of the presenters or the ministry. In discussing this alternative earlier today with the government, I was advised that there is a financial—how should I put it?—responsibility on behalf of the government if in fact it was to view this as—I'm now talking about the alternative that you're wanting the committee to look at, or to recommend to the government to look at, because we can't look at it.

Andy, you know how things work around here. Unless the majority of members say this is worthy of further review, it doesn't work because the numbers wouldn't lend themselves to that, no matter what.

So I have to say, is there in fact, to your knowledge, a responsibility on behalf of the municipalities if in fact they were to go with the recommendation that you've put before us, and Westminster and Middlesex agreeing to this new plan? Is it not the case that the government of Ontario would have to subsidize those municipalities with grants in order for them to retain the services, given the loss of revenues from taxpayers? Is that not the case? If you can't answer it, we'll ask the government.

Mr Swan: If I might, Andy, I understand that under Bill 75, in fact, compensation payments have now reached over $30 million.

Mrs Cunningham: No, I'm talking about ongoing grants to the municipalities in order for them to retain the services they now have and advance, as any other municipality would in the next decade, if in fact that was put forward as an alternative.

Dr Sancton: This is obviously a complex technical subject. Let's put the most extreme case of joint servicing arrangements, which would be if the city of London were to provide water and sewer services for most of the residential area of Westminster.

Mrs Cunningham: Of the smaller annexation, which would be their responsibility.

Dr Sancton: Yes. One way of doing it would be for the residents of those areas to pay the cost of water and sewer directly in their bills to the city of London. Exactly how the accounting would work I don't know. That's the most extreme form. If it were done in that way, on a user-pay basis, it simply would not be a financial burden on those municipalities. There are, of course, different ways of doing it that might work out differently.

The Chair: Okay, I'm going to have to go to the PA here. He's got a few comments.

Mr Mills: A couple of comments, Mr Chair. The position of the Ministry of Municipal Affairs in so far as joint servicing is concerned is that we feel that it's not good long-term planning, for two reasons. One, we feel that the people should have a vote for the government that provides their critical and basic services and, two, we feel that it encourages continued fringe development, which, regardless of the user-pay for hard services, does result in increased use of the host city's soft services by users who aren't paying for them.

Dr Sancton: On the first point, life is more complicated than the ministry's views on that. It's simply more complicated and we live with those complications every day.

On the second point, the ministry has promised us that it's going to stop fringe development it doesn't want. This is the whole point of Bill 75. If indeed it can do it for Bill 75, on that basis it can surely do it with Westminster and some other places receiving such services on a user-pay basis.

The Chair: I'm going to have to cut it off because somebody's going to say I let you stay on longer than someone else. Thanks for appearing before the committee.

Mr Swan: Thank you for the time.

1730

The Chair: Could I have the Thames Region Ecological Association come forward?

Mr Will Ferguson (Kitchener): Mr Chairman, while those folks are sitting down, could I just ask something? The member for Middlesex asked a question on the 4,500-unit figure for housing supply. Now, the answer that came back is—

Mrs Mathysen: Gobbledegook?

Mr Ferguson: Well, somewhat nebulous.

The Chair: I didn't get the answer myself.

Mr Ferguson: Let me put this question: How many hectares are registered for development in the city of London, and is the 4,500 figure correct or not? It doesn't serve this committee any purpose at all to talk about the number of years' supply, given the density of lots, as well as whether or not they comply with the policy statement. I mean, who cares if they comply with the policy statement? How many units are they building in an average year, are being developed in London, and how long would the 4,500 units be expected to last? Are they building 500 units a year?

The Chair: Okay, we've got that down.

THAMES REGION ECOLOGICAL ASSOCIATION

The Chair: We've got 15 minutes and there's another group that's coming on for 15, I believe, that was shared in that half-hour. So if you wouldn't mind, identify yourself for the purposes of Hansard and this committee, and you may begin.

Mr Sandy Levin: My name is Sandy Levin and I represent the Thames Region Ecological Association.

Thank you for the opportunity to appear. However, we are dismayed to see the ministry's proposed amendment to the section 29 of the bill, which will limit the requirement of a new official plan to just the annexed areas. For a number of reasons, it is important that London have an official plan for the entire city with clearly stated environmental protection.

For example, the current official plan does not have a policy for developing setbacks from atop a bank, nor a policy on significant ravines. Work was commenced on these policies in 1991. Drafts were prepared and sent back to the planning department for review late in 1991, and there they sat until recently brought to the attention of the planning committee by the local field naturalists. The planning committee voted to defer further consideration of these policies until the new year.

Voting at committee for the deferral was the deputy mayor, who told this committee on November 5—and you can refer to page F-184 of Hansard—that “London has an appropriate policy framework...to provide for the protection of natural features” such as ravines and steep slopes.

Also during the November 5 hearings, the mayor avoided answering Mr Winninger's question as to whether or not there will be development in the annexed areas until there has been a very real inventory of environmentally sensitive areas and agricultural lands that need to be preserved and protected. See pages F-189 and F-190.

We conclude that these actions and statements, plus the desire of the city and the stated position of the London Development Institute, on page 193 of Hansard, to reduce the number of items included in section 30 of the bill mean the city is reluctant to do more to protect the natural environment. Therefore, we conclude that London needs revisions to its existing official plan spelled out in either regulation or legislation.

Furthermore, although the ministry quite correctly points out that London's 1991 official plan has been approved by the minister, it ignores the point that work leading up to the plan is now nearly five years old. Even the city's planning department agrees. In its May 1992 draft document entitled The New Official Plan: An Approach, the planning department states that the process of preparing the existing OP was based on a city with constrained boundaries. On page 7 of this document the planning department states that its desire to develop “a comprehensive, strategic and open approach to planning for growth and development would involve the identification of natural limiting factors to growth and then develop a system to provide for growth that does not exceed those limiting factors.”

The planning department went on to say, “Such work would include identifying agricultural lands beyond any proposed service area, and the issue now is the appropriate development pattern within the expanded city.”

Therefore, we urge you to defeat the ministry's proposed amendment and substitute the following, based on the most recent draft from the Sewell commission:

“The city will update its existing official plan by including statements of goals, objectives and policies on, but not limited to, the following:

“Hazard lands such as land subject to flooding, erosion or instability;

“Natural features and systems such as wetlands, recharge areas, ravines, river valleys, stream belts, floodplains, corridors, woodlots, wildlife and fish habitat, and classes 1, 2 and 3 agricultural land and specialty crop lands.”

We are also concerned that the much-heralded protection of farm land announced by the minister and contained in the fourth draft of the provincial planning policy statement being prepared by the Sewell commission will come to naught because of the ministry's proposed amendments to 32(2). It is not clear what official plan amendments the minister will approve in the three years prior to the adoption of the new official plan set out in section 29.

We also feel that the legislation appears to allow the rezoning of land in the areas to be annexed, including agricultural land, to commence and be approved prior to the adoption of the new official plan. Subsection 12(3) suggests to us that any land that comes into the city as agricultural but is at that time the subject of a rezoning application, won't be allowed to be rezoned. At a bare minimum we ask that this section or the accompanying regulations to the act clarify the requirements and conditions for the redesignation of lands designated primarily for agricultural and open space uses in an official plan to other uses.

It is clear the province wishes to promote and encourage economic development in the greater London area. While we agree development will take place, we differ with the province's view that traditional manufacturing will continue to locate in southwestern Ontario. We feel London's comparative advantage is in medical research and financial services, neither of which is land-intensive. Therefore, we have opposed this annexation.

We had hoped to see more environmental protection in this bill. We have real concerns as to the city's commitment to sustainable development and the environment. After all, London was the last city of its size to institute a blue box recycling program, which still does not take rigid plastics, London still does not collect recyclables from most high-density developments, and the majority of yard waste continues to go to landfill because there isn't a municipal composting program.

Mr Cooke's June 18 statement on annexation promised protection for the natural environment. However, we're still searching for the word "environment" in the bill. The frequent references to the environment during these hearings have been in relation to sewage. To us, the environment is more than just sewage. We hope it is more to you as well.

The Chair: We'll start off with Mr Eddy.

Mr Eddy: Thank you very much for your presentation. I appreciate your expressed concerns about the environment. Does the present city have environmental problems at the present time, and what are they that you would see?

Mr Levin: It depends. What do we call environmental problems? We're not talking about sewage now, right?

Mr Eddy: One of the things that's always concerned me is—I've talked to people near the Greenway sewage treatment plant, for instance, and others. I agree with you about the new areas. The bulldozing and creating environmental problems by ignoring the environment is very serious in most developing municipalities, but I'm wondering about the present city itself and things that you would see about it that should maybe be improved first.

Mr Levin: A transit system that has recently cut 71,000 service hours. They can't presently service a subdivision that's going up now called Hunt Club Estates that's within the current city boundaries; Lord knows how they're going to service the rest of the area.

Secondly, continued encroachment on identifying natural areas, including Sifton Bog, which is a class 1 wetland; and the current bulldozing and development of the north part of the Thames River valley, which was the subject of an OMB hearing in which one of the last natural areas along that stretch of waterway is going to house 15,000 people.

1740

Mrs Cunningham: Thank you, Mr Levin. I've heard you on a couple of occasions and it's always refreshing. You're talking about what you want included by section 29 in the official plan. You want that in the act—or do you want it in the regs?

Mr Levin: We'd prefer it in legislation; we would accept it in regulation.

Mrs Cunningham: I suppose there aren't very many municipalities that would be directed in this regard to this extent via legislation or regs as to what they ought to have in their official plans. Is that correct?

Mr Levin: As I understand it, that would be correct.

Mrs Cunningham: That doesn't mean to say we can't start somewhere though, does it?

Mr Levin: I agree.

Mrs Cunningham: With regard to your comments about London and the medical services or the reputation we have with regard to the medical research we're all so proud of, you did say there wasn't a great deal of additional land use in that regard.

Mr Levin: They're not as land-intensive as, say, major manufacturing, which I think ultimately is the desire of this city to attract.

Mrs Cunningham: I agree with you in that regard, except that the new Siebens-Drake goals would be to do a lot of agricultural research, and in fact they are using lands now. They're looking at pesticides and I think they'll be looking at a whole lot more. I was involved in that and I hope they will need a lot of land, because I think the research itself is extremely important. I, of course, would like to see it in London and Middlesex. That's just for your information.

The Chair: I've got to go on to Mr Winninger.

Mrs Cunningham: Finally, I just think that the request for environmental—

The Chair: Mr Winninger.

Mr Winninger: I'm sure you won't dodge my question. At the time the minister held hearings in London last September, he invited you to become part of an ad hoc process to assist the transition committee with the identification and treatment of environmentally sensitive areas, because that was one of your key thrusts last September. I wonder if that process has unfolded in a positive manner.

Mr Levin: The point they're at is that there is a task force on government restructuring and it has made a proposal for two advisory committees on the environment, one to have input on the official plan of a technical nature, and another, more of a citizens' group to advise on general environmental issues. I haven't participated in that process yet. I'm going to a meeting of the Thames Region Ecological Association to look at the draft that was prepared by the city and then the city will again look at the draft. I'm attending a meeting on November 26 with members of that task force. I think it's still been city-directed rather than a consensual meeting, but it is moving along.

The Chair: I've got to cut you off because we've got another group coming on. I'd like to thank you for appearing before the group here today.

Ms Mathysen: Mr Chair, while the group is coming on, can I put something on the record here? It's actually the answer to my earlier question and I'd like it on the record.

My question was with regard to how many housing units were available. According to a city of London water study report done by Dillon, there are 32,000 housing units already approved, waiting to be built. The zoning has been approved. As of November 5, London built between 2,500 and 2,700 units per year. So by my calculations, there are over 10 years of available units there.

The Chair: Thank you.

CLEANGREEN

The Chair: The next group is Cleangreen. For the purposes of Hansard and the committee members, if you wouldn't mind identifying yourselves, and you may begin. We have 15 minutes in total.

Mr Philip Rubinoff: My name is Philip Rubinoff. What we wish to address to you today are (1) London's proposed dissolution of the entire town of Westminster, (2) 25,000 acres of A-1 farm land, (3) London's W12A landfill enterprise, and (4) their relationships to Bill 75.

Mr George Knowles: My name is George Knowles of Westminster. In 1981, the city of London's most powerful unelected post, the administrator, structured, organized, manipulated and managed the whole process. He was the sole architect of the annexation drive, and power was the reward.

On April 1, 1992, the Brant report was released. Westminster was to be annihilated and the elected municipal government abolished. Despite section 29 of the Municipal Act, one person appointed, not elected, would represent all the people—a person who ignored the people and instead wants to give away the finances, health, security, cleanliness, comfort and ornament of the municipality; a person who publicly announced that the Minister of Municipal Affairs was his boss, not the people who had originally elected him.

Also, the city's landfill site would be expanded to become a regional dump in Ontario, with tipping fees for financial resources.

Fact: Only from May 1989 to late 1991 did any meetings take place between Westminster and London. Finally, 11 years in the making by the architect, this report is now referred to as a done deal.

On June 18, 1992, Bill 75 was released by the Honourable Dave Cooke, Minister of Municipal Affairs, implementing the Brant solutions, leaving out only the London landfill site until after January 1, 1993. At this time, London would have full control of Westminster and its 25,000 acres.

Why would London want to annex a facility located so far beyond the Westminster industrial lands it claims are needed for employment and economic opportunities?

Mr Rubinoff: Two reasons:

Total control: London wants control to (1) keep costs low, (2) operate flexibly to serve large industrial and commercial operations, and (3) ensure little opposition, if any, from citizens' groups.

Financial: A regional waste disposal site is a potential cash cow, $30 million to $50 million annually, presuming a business operation with full user-pay, enough to finance London's annexation.

In 1991, landfill disposal sites in North America listed on stock exchanges from $26 to $49 per share. Incidentally, new car sales in 1991 were $80 billion. In 1991, $120 billion was made on residential garbage alone. In 1992 and after, this dollar total on residential waste will increase by 10% each year for the next 10 years. After January 1, 1993, what's keeping this landfill enterprise from becoming part of the billion-dollar cash cow business in North America?

I now quote from a June 8, 1992, letter from London's Mayor Gosnell to the Honourable Dave Cooke, Minister of Municipal Affairs. "It has been and will continue to be a prime concern of London city council to include the W12A landfill site as part of London."

What is wrong with annexing a facility so far out?

Mr Knowles: (1) It makes the annexation needlessly large in that the town of Westminster loses so much land that its economic viability is destroyed, and all must be taken—the end of a town—to satisfy a senseless power grab.

(2) The needlessly large annexation brings unstoppable urban pressures on agricultural land.

Let's not kid ourselves. Large urban centres have the financial and political clout to overcome land use regulations. Current Ontario Ministry of Agriculture and Food policies are reactive, not proactive. Now 25,000 acres of A-1 farm land will be lost here.

An example of London's record in stewardship of the land: London, in May and June, 1992, purchased 225 acres of land adjacent to the existing W12A disposal site. What did it do wrong? It violated the guidelines for the new official plan for the expanded city of London. Reference, item D: "Preserving specialty crop land and directing growth to lower-quality lands."

Economics chosen over the best farm land. Land was purchased before, and not conditional to, approvals. It's the cart-before-the-horse story. This makes environmental assessments and land use planning policies virtually useless.

With London's vast expropriating powers, pre-purchase makes no sense. London did not even make a simple land purchase without letting speculators flip land deals. London paid $1,430,000 for 225 acres. Speculators made a 53% profit on the three deals, a total of $764,900, creating inflated land values from $2,500 per acre to double and triple and up to $9,200 per acre over a wide area. So much for affordable farm land: more speculators, developers and trucking operations to systematically destroy 25,000 acres of agricultural land and turn its vitality into a wasteland.

1750

Mr Rubinoff: London's record in dealing with Westminster: Only in 1990, when litigation was initiated, did London stop dumping toxic fly ash in W12A. We are now left facing a virtual time bomb: over 8,000 tons of toxic fly ash in 35 acres alone in cell 4 of the dump.

We have discovered, through our own investigations, that the management of the dump has been continually breaking its agreement with Westminster by allowing in wastes from outside its designated area. The ICI wastes brought in are in large volumes of known contaminants and toxic materials. We have a long list of violations, either due to lack of professional management or corruption, in the form of certain people being paid off to look the other way. Why? Because there's big money in tipping fees and contamination waste.

Again quoting from Mayor Gosnell's letter of June 8, 1992, keeping in mind what I've just said: "The city, through the development of this excellent facility, has shown sensitivity to the surrounding properties as well as long-term environment planning on an issue that is causing grave concern in most other municipalities in Ontario." Ladies and gentlemen, that's a lot of garbage. London's done nothing about the problems arising in and around W12A in Westminster.

Mr Knowles: What has London done for the rural areas of Westminster?

(1) Stolen our water until in 1990 contamination set in on London's PUC wells north of the W12A site;

(2) There is contamination and toxic waste buried in productive farm land areas;

(3) We have documented proof that the wells of the neighbouring properties are badly contaminated. As the dump continues to operate as is, the problems will surely worsen. The contamination is spreading through leachate into the two ground aquifers on which we all depend for our water in Westminster and the areas beyond.

"W12A meeting, October 17, 1991:

"Mr Peter Huras from the Ministry of the Environment stressed the sensitive nature of these well site problems and the fact they have been handled on an individual basis. It is his hope that this will not become a political issue during the upcoming municipal elections" held the following month, in November 1991. Why was this kept from the public?

Mr Rubinoff: Speaking for many residents of Westminster, with the kind of operation W12A has, we don't want the dump expanded, at least until it is in the hands of proper management and the problems addressed and corrected entirely. We are attaching a number of lists compiled by our colleague, Mr Eugene Morrison, who happens to live across the road from W12A. Mr Morrison has firsthand experience in these matters. Our list includes design philosophy, current problems, short-term and long-term recommendations needed, and legislation for landfill waste disposal operations in Westminster. "We are the garbage capital of Ontario." No to this annexation farce. Let's restore democracy.

Mr Knowles: Start by doing an impact study now with the local government consensus and the resolution passed by the town of Westminster on October 28, 1992, by rolling back to the 1988 annexation proposal. As the booklet stated, "Let's Grow Together," Gosnell and Co. Be honest, place everything on the table: all the acreage needed, all on joint services, all user-pay services, all costs and finances. Further, take two years for this impact study. Then in 1994, at the next municipal election, let the voters decide their future, not the architect, the developers or the wheeler-dealer speculators.

Mr Rubinoff: We thank you for your time. In closing, I ask you as elected representatives to read, study and discuss in depth all submissions before you. Make your decision on what is morally right. Don't follow the party line when it's the wrong line. Amend Bill 75 to make it a free, democratic bill of legislation in the province of Ontario.

Mr Knowles: Finally, in closing, to the Chair and the standing committee as a whole, re the subject of Bill 75, we thank our member of the provincial Parliament, Irene Mathyssen, Middlesex, and we stand beside Irene 100% about an annexation that will be done without a study of the impact on the lives of citizens of Westminster and the county of Middlesex on January 1, 1993. I thank you, ladies and gentlemen.

The Chair: Thank you. You used 15 minutes for your presentation; we maybe have 15 seconds. There's one question I'd like to ask. What kind of toxic ash is at the dump, the fly ash, what kind?

Mr Rubinoff: That's the fly ash from the hospital, Victoria Hospital, Westminster campus.

Mrs Mathyssen: Mr Chairman, there's a serious problem here. What these gentlemen have basically said is that the certificate of approval for that waste site has been violated. That is a serious accusation, and we need to know what kind of proof there is, because they're talking about a criminal activity.

The Chair: Okay. If we could get some copies of that for all members of the committee.

Mr Knowles: We've left the clerk 25 copies of the speeches, and we also left him one copy of the document section and we asked him to print the rest up for you, gentlemen and ladies.

The Chair: As long as we get one copy, the clerk can make the other copies. Thank you for appearing before this committee.

Mr Ferguson: Mr Chair, just while the next delegation is sitting down, the previous delegation, Councillor Swan, mentioned that when the city of London made its presentation, in fact it could be more appropriately described as Mayor Gosnell's presentation as well as Controller Hopcroft's. I think it would be important for the committee to know whether or not that presentation has in fact been endorsed by London city council.

The Chair: Good point.

1800

THE PARTICULAR COVENANTED BAPTIST CHURCH OF CHRIST IN CANADA

The Chair: We have Elder Stewart McColl, our next presenter. Would you identify the group you're representing also, because I think there were a couple of groups that possibly you're here representing; is that not correct?

Mr J. Stewart McColl: Permit me first, Mr Hansen, on behalf of our church members, to thank you for getting the time extended for these hearings and for allowing us to speak to your committee concerning Bill 75. When I left here three weeks ago, I think it was on Thursday night, Thursday at noon we were left with two half-days, essentially, for all the presentations we wanted to make in Middlesex county. I said that was a travesty of justice. You said to write a letter. I wrote a letter, which you received; I went home and I made two phone calls the next morning, one to my clerk and one to the Citizens Against Annexation, and they in turn took up that work, and the next time I came back you had four pages of phone calls and letters petitioning for this day. I want to thank you for getting this day. I want to suggest also that next time you face a problem like that, you just ask me and I'll ask them and they'll be glad to help, because we'll get another day. I appreciate your integrity, sir, because you did that with sincerity, as we did with sincerity, and I thank you for it.

The Chair: I can tell you that my mailbox has been full for quite a few months from letters from Middlesex.

Mr McColl: I'm sure. This submission is from the Particular Covenanted Baptist Church of Christ in Canada, an independent church which was established in the wilderness of Canada west in 1818 by Scottish immigrants who were squeezed off their land by the Highland land clearances and by religious persecution.

This submission is given by yours truly, Elder J. Stewart McColl, who is a fully ordained minister of God and pastor of this church, serving its four meeting places, two of which are in Middlesex county. I farm along with my ministry to help support our income, because we do not believe in a salaried ministry. Rather, we believe that Christ's pattern on the mount, whereby he called his disciples from every walk of life to both live and labour among his people, is still just as relevant today as it was 2,000 years ago.

I'm going to skip parts of this as we go, because I haven't time in the half-hour to present it all.

To begin with, permit me to inform you, on behalf of our church communities, that we are not "campers," we are not dissidents, we are not pedlars and we're certainly not parasites away out there in no man's land. Moreover, although we hope to be counted among "the remnant according to the election of grace," we hope never to be counted remnants of the county of Middlesex. Neither do we wish to be called residents of the greater London area. Note my point: Rather, we are residents of Middlesex county in general and a specific constituent municipality in particular. There are 22 of them in Middlesex county—note 22—each one a community of people which is economically viable and socially vibrant in its own right. By the grace of God, we wish to inform you that that's the way we want it to remain: 22 viable communities.

We wish to address Bill 75 candidly but without any malice or prejudice from the five following points of view: our reaction to the autocratic process; our response to the muzzling process so that the Minister of Agriculture is not allowed to speak on these issues and so on; our examination of the notorious statute, Bill 75; our proposal for a peaceful and plausible escape from this notoriety, and our vision for turning error into a blessing, if the Ontario government and the city of London are willing.

Before we begin, we wish to point out that we have come as friends of Middlesex county, the province of Ontario and our beloved Canada, willing to admonish both the Ontario government and the city of London, in love for the good of all.

I'm going to leave A and B. Those matters have been dealt with, they're on record and if the Ontario government and the city of London are both willing to be reasonable in this proposal and make reasonable modifications, we'll let bygones be bygones. So let's get at this bill.

This Bill 75—and I'm going to ask it beginning and end—should not go anyplace until there is a full environmental study and a full financial study, because I'd like to know the impact of this bill, when Middlesex county has 24% of its manufacturing jobs in the agrifood industry, and I'd like to know its impact on rural demolition and I'd like to know its impact on the sewage disposal systems, which I'll bring out later in the form of a map, and on the natural environment.

First of all, let it be known that we doubt whether 75 is the creature of a shrewd politician such as the Honourable David Cooke or, for that matter, his parliamentary assistant, Mr Gordon Mills, because neither one of these gentleman has shown that much familiarity with its details. In two days in London, we watched Mr Cooke, and he always had his coaches with him, and we have seen the same here with Mr Mills.

Rather, we believe this is a bill that's been designed by the civil servants. My question has to be, and the question our people are asking is, who is running this government? Is it the New Democratic Party and the Ontario government or is it the civil service? Not only the civil service in Toronto, but is it partly the civil service in London? I leave that question for you, because that's a serious question.

First, Bill 75 is explosive because it's founded on the concept of Mr Brant's report that the need of a municipality pre-empts its existence. Think of that for a moment. Once a smaller municipality shows any need to service, it means a local neighbouring municipality which is stronger and has more money and is more powerful can take it over. That's the meaning of that concept.

That's bringing into the municipal world the dog-eat-dog takeover syndrome of the transnational companies. That's what has set this whole municipal world on fire right across Ontario, because every municipality today is watching what's going to happen with Westminster, Delaware and London township etc when they live beside a giant like London.

Second, this bill is legally deficient. It doesn't even define what a municipality is. I compare it with Bill 35. There is no definition in this Bill 75 of what a municipality is. What is it? It's defined in the Municipal Act—I dug out my old one and I had to dust it off—from away back in the 1940s: "'municipality' means a locality the inhabitants of which are incorporated." If you go through the municipal definitions, it says city, town etc are bodies corporate.

If you examine this bill, there's no indication that people count. It's simply dealing with lands and portions and areas all the way through it. The body corporate of each community is ignored. In other words, Bill 75 is treating each municipality as if it were no more than a piece of dirt.

Also, the judgement of the judicial review does note the meaning of a municipality in identifying the parties involved in the review. It still places the emphasis upon the lands being transferred from Middlesex county to London, without recognizing the upheaval the issue is causing among the people. Likewise, the editorial board of the London Free Press equates the issue as no more than the gain or loss of surrounding territory. The people don't count.

Bill 75 is also legally deficient because, in failing to realize what a municipality is, it fails to understand what is really involved in an annexation. As a result, Bill 75 treats this annexation as a simple boundary adjustment or a boundary change rather than the dissolution or mutilation of a community of people as a body corporate. In reality, this annexation causes the complete societal upheaval of an entire community and the partial upheaval of four other communities.

The dissolution of the town of Westminster and its local boards means that the body corporate, ie, the people of Westminster along with their respective lands, will be totally fragmented, some going to London, some going to Delaware township, some to North Dorchester and some to Belmont in another county. Verily, the body corporate of the town of Westminster will be drawn and quartered and literally cast to the four winds. Because this will be done against the express will of the people, we believe it to be a gross violation of human rights.

A lady the other day in this corner said Westminster will still be there, and that's not true. Westminster will be gone and it will be drawn and quartered to the four winds and never appear again because this bill is simply treating annexation as land with no relation to people.

Bill 75 is incomplete and misleading in so far as its name is concerned because it doesn't state on the outside that an entire town, along with its boards, is being dissolved, that the public utilities commission in the city of London is being dissolved, that it's annexing land even to another county and that it's actually appointing someone to an elected office. The name of the bill itself is misleading. How can that be passed in this House when the name of that bill does not describe what's happening in its contents?

Bill 75 is embarrassingly ignorant of the truth that boundaries are one of the main pillars of a civilized society that establish the basis upon which the ownership or possession of property can be determined, that draw lines of demarcation for instilling a respect for each other's property, that set limits to safeguard an invasion of privacy, that provide hallmarks to help ensure peaceful living and so on.

1810

By arbitrarily moving and adjusting boundaries throughout the municipalities without the benefit of a local set of mutual agreements, Bill 75 amounts to a denial of the private ownership of property, a disrespect for the property of others, an actual invasion of privacy and a definite disturbance of the peace.

Moreover, since all levels of government treat line fences in rural areas, lot lines in urban centres, provincial boundaries, national boundaries and continental boundaries as inviolable without the mutual consent of the affected parties, whereas the Ontario government is treating our municipal boundaries as lines of demarcation subject to its arbitrary disposition, Bill 75 is discriminatory.

If this happened in a city, at 70 Tetherwood Boulevard where Mr Gosnell lives, the riot squad would be brought out. I want to ask you why in rural areas we have to have an Ontario government come in, not by mutual consent but by an arbitrator who listens to 1,000 presentations—I think I am about the 1,039th presentation that's been made and I've listened to all the others except one hour—and he doesn't hear, and the Minister of Municipal Affairs scuttles the boundary negotiations act, which was designed so that no municipal boundary would be moved without mutual consent. Why is it that rural people are being discriminated against where you wouldn't tolerate it two days in the cities? Mr Winninger wouldn't tolerate it. Mrs Mathysen wouldn't tolerate it. Why should we have to tolerate it?

Bill 75 is agriculturally hostile—and I'll give you four or five reasons; this is very brief—because the minister's terms of reference have already donated 64,220 acres of agricultural farm land to urban use. I'm going to ask you ladies and gentlemen—we live in a province where apparently a few months ago a minister sat with a pen, or the civil service did on his behalf, and said in one line, "Take all the farm land and rural character of the area needed and give it to urbanization"—what kind of land are we living in when one man has that power? I want you to think of that. I'm here as a minister of God. In 44 years of public life, I have never before witnessed such harassment of rural people as I have experienced in this treatment.

The city of London has put out a book recently, London 200. What does it mean? It means 200 years of urbanization. What does that mean? It means 200 years of rural demolition. You can't play one side of the record without the other, and all we've heard in these presentations coming from the real estate people and from the London city people is that this is a great venture into urbanization. Yes, it is. But in the farm land between here and Windsor, and you have over 90% of class 1 land that's in Ontario in this triangle from Barrie to Toronto to Windsor, there's competition between agriculture and urban development.

A few years ago, when corn was $4 a bushel and soybeans were $12 to $14, every single pasture farm in the country was plowed up and tiled and developed around the villages. You can't have urbanization without rural demolition and you have to balance one against the other or you put everything out of proportion.

London has been in the business, rightly so, of urbanization. We hold that not against them, but every time you do it, you have rural demolition. If I were to take you to the city of London and down the streets, I could pick out the old farm houses. They're still there. Where's the land? It's gone. When you give 64,220 more acres of land to the city of London, it won't go tomorrow or in two years, but it's gone because it's given to the city to purposely plan how it's going to urbanize it.

I want you to think of the things that are happening in this bill. Once the 10-year and the five-year hammers, as I call them, or gavels come down so that these 500 acres of farm land are now redesignated for urban, three things at least will take place. The farm rebates are going to be cut off, which is punitive. Second, it'll move and it's justly balanced in here because instead of rural hydro it'll be a hydro-electric power commission of London, higher rates. The farmer can't afford them. Third, the city's bylaws will take over so there's no more vehicular traffic in that area and no more spreading of farm manure etc. So those farmers are forced off that land just like my ancestors were in the 1700s in Scotland by the sheep grazers who came in; they were shoved back on to 10 and 15 acres of land and they were gone.

Don't tell me this is a way of protecting farm land. There's nobody out there in the rural areas who will ever accept that. It's nonsense, and what it does to the speaker is cast a reflection on his or her own integrity. Rural people will not accept that, because it's just not true.

The purpose of annexation, as the Mathyssen proposal showed—and Mayor Gosnell spoke to that proposal, and he spoke openly so it's declared that the city plans to urbanize all the land, when he said that the “Mathyssen proposal would defeat London's purpose for annexation, greatly reducing land available for its industrial growth.” They have every intention eventually of urbanizing it all.

In effect, then, those who are declaring that this bill will protect the farm land better than any other municipality in the province are simply bringing a reproach upon their own integrity, because in reality Bill 75 is shooting Canada in the stomach and at the same time shooting Ontario's agricultural industry—second only to the automobile industry—in the foot. I treat it as anti-Canadian. Securing the land for urban use, yes, but protecting the land for agricultural use, nonsense.

Bill 75 is environmentally hostile, and I'll give you three reasons—we've heard one—and I'm going to ask the question to support their presentation. Why has the landfill site in Westminster not been closed down because of violations of the licence? I attended a meeting at Glanworth and it's all on video tape so it's documented. I heard the manager of that landfill site and also the superintendent admit to the violations of that licence.

There's supposed to be a net behind a truck when it comes and dumps papers. It's not there. The berms are supposed to be seeded. They're not all seeded. I heard that night evidence from firsthand witnesses that there's raw sewage being put in that landfill site, and there are trucks from Toronto and trucks from Windsor and from all over Ontario going in there, seven days a week on some occasions, that violate the licence. I wonder, do we have a Ministry of Environment in this province?

I'm going to have you look at something. Look at this. What a waste of paper in that. Four lines on that whole page, and we're talking about a government that represents people. They stand up in the Legislature and they say, “We're environmentally sound.”

I want to come to my last point which I'll get to. It's the river. Nobody's talked about the river and that's the key to this whole annexation. I question whether we do have an environmental policy and, if we do, whether it's enforced or not.

Bill 75 is democratically hostile because not only is the compensation from 1993 to 2003 to the county and townships of Delaware, London North, Dorchester and West Nissouri left totally in the minister's hands, but the suburban roads payments now are left totally to the minister's discretion. They're not any longer in dollars and cents.

What they talk about, $35 million, we don't know. That's hearsay. There has been nothing come out in the form of the bill or the regulation to assure that the suburban roads amount will be one mill. In fact, if you read that amendment carefully, it says it could be one mill and then the next line says it could be another portion of a mill, according to the minister's regulation.

Let me say something clearly: Look at that bill. Between what's in that bill and what's yet to come—because there's nothing in here about police, there's nothing in here about fire protection, there's nothing in here about health services, there's nothing in here about the landfill site. If you count up everything that's in there and add on the others which will come by ministerial regulation or ministerial order, you'll get 23 or 24 whole sets of minister's regulations to run a city. I've never heard of it before. You're not going to like what I'm saying, but I'm telling you the truth. I'll tell you what our people are going to say about that: “They've set up a new socialist republic of London.” That's what's being done.

1820

Bill 75 is flagrantly discriminatory, is full of it, because the job security of municipal employees has been guaranteed while the job security of dislocated farmers—and what about the agriculturally related employees? They haven't even been thought of. What about those?

Some properties in the city will have firefighting equipment that's on full services with hydrants, and the others will be served by a limited water supply.

Some children will be able to have farm animal pets and others won't. A few weeks ago in London, a little child had a duck, and they gave the family so many days to get rid of the duck. It was written up in the London Free Press. And if that didn't take place, you know what was happening? There'd be a court injunction, to get rid of a duck. These stewards of the land, the city urbanites that have been in urbanization for 200 years, are going to be the stewards of the farm land. Come on, ladies and gentlemen and Mr Hansen. Let's talk fairness. It's an affront to human welfare.

In the bill that was designed by Mr Eakins for Sarnia amalgamation, all of the services are listed in that bill—police, fire protection, health services—so when the bill was passed, those people have assurance in writing that, “This is what we have in law.”

What does this do when it's passed? There's a string of government regulations or ministerial regulations and ministerial orders coming, and we don't know what they're going to be. This notorious statute is a repudiation of the Baldwin act of 1849. I almost bought a shroud today to hang on that picture.

This is one of the saddest periods this province has gone through since the days of the Family Compact that my forebears had to live through when they came here from Scotland. They had a Legislative Assembly that had seven as an executive council and 16 appointed, or whatever it was, and they wouldn't listen to anything they said.

If we've gone through a thousand of these and, as Mr Gare has already said, 90% to 95% of them from rural areas are saying this is a massive annexation, why do we still have to come here and say the same things over again, and apparently no listening?

I suggest to you, Mr Hansen and committee, that once you put that law into effect, you're subject to the Canadian Charter of Rights. You're not now, but you are as soon as you pass that bill on January 1. Your charter says that it applies to all legislative assemblies. Your charter says that anyone whose rights or freedoms are guaranteed by the charter and have been infringed upon has access to a court. The charter says every individual is equal before and under the law. See Mr Michael Smithers's comment in Municipal World in 1992. It also says everyone has the right not to be subjected to any cruel and unusual treatment, which I wrote in this book.

I've had unanimous endorsements from the county council, I've had endorsements from school boards, from people across the province. Mr Mills was reported as saying in Hansard that it was dreadful. Sure it's dreadful, because as the county board of education said, it surely describes the frustrations and the experiences of our county people. That's why it's dreadful, because it's dreadful to us, because it's the truth.

Bill 75, if enacted into law as it is, we believe will prove to be an intolerable millstone not only around the necks of the Middlesex county residents but also around the necks of the Ontario government and the city of London as well. It will bring us into financial ruin, and I'll show you why in a moment.

I'm going to skip some.

On the back of that chart there is a picture of the Thames River watershed. I don't know whether you gentlemen and ladies are acquainted with that book or not, but you're wondering and you're asking today, why is there such a hurry for this to be passed? I'll tell you why, because the truth is not coming out about this annexation; it's never been on the table.

This report was done over the early period of the 1970s and probably since 1975. I'm sure, Mr Eddy, you're familiar with it. Every square inch of ground and all of that watershed of the Thames River was laid out on that basin. That watershed starts away up from Mitchell and Stratford and St Marys on the north branch, and it drains on the south branch, Woodstock and Ingersoll etc, etc. It comes down through London, picks up the effluent later on, even from the little village of Glencoe, Chatham, Tilbury and so on. How many people today? Approximately 450,000 people in that watershed.

Back in the 1970s the Ontario government, in both ministries, said that London was then at the crossroads as far as sewage and effluent are concerned, and they've got two choices. You can go with a sewage pipeline to Lake Erie, 66 inches in diameter and 14,400 feet from near west of the Greenway pollution plant and out to the watershed, you get it up over the hill with a pumping station, it will gravity flow with a reverse siphon over Kettle Creek, and west of Port Stanley the plan was to build a huge sewage plant. The costs given in this book are, for that solution, something like $108 million, back in those days, if it were done in the middle 1980s.

The second alternative was to build a tertiary plant, state-of-the-art plants which would rate the effluent almost like drinking water and are double the cost of an ordinary plant. In studies of the whole river, the drain on the oxygen content to dissolve down the effluent was reached as a climax, and if one of those two alternatives were not followed, you would have difficulty.

Mr Sulliman today mentioned corn. I came up here last night, where two days before—I'll tell you where some of the corn is.

The Chair: Mr McColl, we've got until 6:30, so could you sum it up? Some members have left who had questions they gave me to ask you, but we won't have any time for any questions. Some who left have—some have a train; I think Mr Winninger's got a train, and I know some of the others had to leave because of transportation.

Mr McColl: I'll wind up in two minutes, okay?

The Chair: Okay. I don't want to take any more of your time. Go right ahead.

Mr McColl: I'd be glad to stay here till 9 o'clock. I wonder why you're so anxious to go when this is such a serious problem. I take that back; I don't mean any—

The Chair: I am directed by the House leaders, and it was unanimous there to stay till 6:30.

Mr McColl: May I make one other observation?

The Chair: Okay.

Mr McColl: There was another part of this. There were two other dams to be built in this watershed. One was the Glengowan, and the other one was the Thamesford dam. Why were they to be built? The dams such as Fanshawe and Wildwood basically give lakes, and they're basically recreational. But if you have a dry summer, like we had for two years, and you've got all this effluent down, and now you want to build a Toronto on the Thames and put another 400,000 or 500,000 on, you've got to have either a sewage pipeline or you have the other alternative, and still you've got to have a couple of more dams to flush that river. That's what they were intended for.

Now Mr Eddy, sorry.

The Chair: I'm sorry. I've got to say that it's 6:30. We did extend the sitting time to make sure everybody was accommodated, and we didn't cut down on the times—

Mrs Elinor Caplan (Oriole): Mr Chairman, I realize it is 6:30. Could I suggest, regarding the questions asked by the members before they left, that if you place them on the record, perhaps the deputant could communicate to the committee in writing and we could then receive his answers in that way.

The Chair: I know Gary Carr had—he didn't drop it here, but he had some.

Mrs Caplan: I see. Well, perhaps if there are questions from committee members, they could place them and the deputant could respond in writing, if anyone would like to.

The Chair: Okay, fine.

Mrs Mathysen: I would like to table an alternative proposal from the township of Delaware for the consideration of the committee. They couldn't be here today but wanted this proposal to be part of our deliberations.

The Chair: Mr McColl, I'd like to thank you for appearing before this committee. I can tell you, in your presentation there were a lot of points you brought out that hadn't been presented earlier, so you've done your homework and you've done a lot of research in this paper, and this committee appreciates your input.

Mr McColl: Please read my book. May I have one sentence? I just ask you this, as a minister; it's on page 13. I didn't even get into our solution, but it's lined up there. Why rule by force, creating so much hardship and destruction, when a peaceful solution beneficial to all can be achieved through the counsel of many? I beg my God to touch your hearts, and I say that in sincerity. May God bless you to consider those rural people, who are God-fearing people. They're here. They mean no harm to anybody. They're willing to give a reasonable annexation to London, and I must commend them for their composure under very, very strange circumstances. But if not, Mr Hansen, your government will have to stand accountable, and maybe especially one man.

That's all I wish to say. I'll be glad to respond in writing.

The Chair: Thank you. Mr Eddy, will your party have the amendments in, say Monday or Tuesday, so that the ministry can look them over?

Mr Eddy: The ministry wants to look over the amendments we would present at the meeting?

The Chair: Yes.

Mr Eddy: I wonder what guarantee we'll have—when you say “look them over,” I don't want them looked over; I want them considered. I want an assurance—

The Chair: Let me use another term. Your know, it's late in the day—

Mr Eddy: I've got all night; my time is yours.

The Chair: I'm asking for a request, if you would, at that time. We're going to be getting the results of all the hearings from Elaine, the research officer, possibly Monday or Tuesday in our offices, but it would be nice if, ahead of time—but if you don't want to—

Mr Eddy: I'm willing to submit proposed amendments for serious consideration.

The Chair: Maybe I didn't use the right terms. I'm sorry, but I think it's a lot fairer to everyone concerned. Okay?

Mr Eddy: Mr Chair, there is one other thing. We talked about unanimous consent when Mr Sutherland was here. It was actually to hear the balance of the town of Westminster's presentation, because, as I said, they were joint with the township of Delaware either a week ago or at some time in the past. I'd just like to know that they had the opportunity to present in writing their full presentation even though we can't hear it now, I guess. I'd hoped they could have a bit more time, because they are the municipality scheduled for annihilation.

The Chair: Mr Eddy, there were some groups that were on longer than they should have been and some shorter, and it gets to the point, as the Chair—

Mr Eddy: I don't have a problem, because we've condensed it—

The Chair: —it's very difficult to wind up scheduling so that people had their full 30. Some had 25 and said, “We didn't get our full time.” I've done the best I can as Chair. Since Mr Sutherland isn't here and it wasn't unanimous, I believe, I think we'll have to leave it at that.

Mr Eddy: I agree it's been very difficult and I sympathize with you as Chair of this particular committee, but I must say, we've compressed into a very few hours what was to have been three weeks of committee hearings in the city of London. If the honourable minister had brought forth second reading in the House, as was agreed to by the House leaders back in June—

Mrs Caplan: He's absolutely right.

The Chair: Before it came to this committee. We had to deal with the subject here.

I'd like to call an adjournment to the committee for the day.

The committee adjourned at 1835.

CONTENTS (continued from overleaf)

Also taking part / Autres participants et participantes:

Cunningham, Dianne (London North/-Nord PC)

Mills, Gordon, parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Municipal Affairs

Clerk / Greffier: Decker, Todd

Staff / Personnel: Campbell, Elaine, research officer, Legislative Research Service

CONTENTS

Thursday 19 November 1992

London-Middlesex Act, 1992, Bill 75	F-223
West Nissouri Ratepayers	F-223
Crispin Colvin, representative
London and St Thomas Real Estate Board	F-227
Nancy McCann, chairperson, political action committee
Citizens Against Annexation	F-231
Caroline Murray, member
Jay Burtwistle, member
Neil McRae, member
Susan Grieve, member
Doris Bond; Tom Grieve; Douglas Stanlake	F-235
Ontario Federation of Agriculture	F-241
Roger George, president
Wendy Lenders, private citizen
Carl H. Sulliman, chief executive officer
Hugh Fletcher, private citizen
University of Western Ontario	F-245
Dr Andrew Sancton, professor of political science
Joe Swan, councillor, City of London
Thames Region Ecological Association	F-250
Sandy Levin, representative
Cleangreen	F-252
Philip Rubino, representative
George Knowles, representative
The Particular Convenanted Baptist Church of Christ in Canada	F-253
J. Stewart McColl, elder

STANDING COMMITTEE ON FINANCE AND ECONOMIC AFFAIRS

- Chair / Président: Hansen, Ron (Lincoln ND)
- Vice-Chair / Vice-Président: Sutherland, Kimble (Oxford ND)
- *Caplan, Elinor (Oriole L)
- *Carr, Gary (Oakville South/-Sud PC)
- Christopherson, David (Hamilton Centre ND)
- Jamison, Norm (Norfolk ND)
- Kwinter, Monte (Wilson Heights L)
- Phillips, Gerry (Scarborough-Agincourt L)
- Sterling, Norman W. (Carleton PC)
- Ward, Brad (Brantford ND)
- Ward, Margery (Don Mills ND)
- Wiseman, Jim (Durham West/-Ouest ND)

Substitutions / Membres remplaçants:

- *Cooper, Mike (Kitchener-Wilmot ND) for Mr Ward
- *Eddy, Ron (Brant-Haldimand L) for Mr Phillips
- *Ferguson, Will, (Kitchener ND) for Mr Christopherson
- *Grandmaître, Bernard (Ottawa East/-Est L) for Mr Kwinter
- *Harrington, Margaret H. (Niagara Falls ND) for Mr Sutherland
- *Mathysen, Irene (Middlesex ND) for Mr Jamison
- *Mills, Gordon (Durham East/-Est ND) for Mr Wiseman
- *Winninger, David (London South/-Sud ND) for Ms Ward

*In attendance / présents

Continued overleaf

CA20N
XC 25
-F31

Document Publication

F-13

F-13

ISSN 1180-4386

Legislative Assembly of Ontario

Second session, 35th Parliament

Official Report of Debates (Hansard)

Thursday 26 November 1992

Standing committee on finance and economic affairs

London-Middlesex Act, 1992

Assemblée législative de l'Ontario

Deuxième session, 35^e législature

Journal des débats (Hansard)

Jeudi 26 novembre 1992

Comité permanent des finances et des affaires économiques

Loi de 1992 sur London et Middlesex

Chair: Ron Hansen
Clerk: Todd Decker

Président : Ron Hansen
Greffier : Todd Decker

Published by the Legislative Assembly of Ontario
Editor of Debates: Don Cameron

Publié par l'Assemblée législative de l'Ontario
Éditeur des débats : Don Cameron

Table of Contents

Table of Contents for proceedings reported in this issue appears on the outside back cover, together with a list of committee members and others taking part.

Index inquiries

Reference to a cumulative index of previous issues may be obtained by calling the Hansard Reporting Service indexing staff at 416-325-7410 or 325-7411.

Subscriptions

Subscription information may be obtained from: Sessional Subscription Service, Publications Ontario, Ministry of Government Services, 50 Grosvenor Street, Toronto, Ontario, M7A 1N8. Phone 416-326-5310, 326-5311 or toll-free 1-800-668-9938.

Table des matières

La table des matières des séances rapportées dans ce numéro se trouve sur la couverture à l'arrière de ce fascicule, ainsi qu'une liste des membres du comité et d'autres personnes ayant participé.

Renseignements sur l'index

Il existe un index cumulatif des numéros précédents. Les renseignements qu'il contient sont à votre disposition par téléphone auprès des employés de l'index du Journal des débats au 416-325-7410 ou 325-7411.

Abonnements

Pour les abonnements, veuillez prendre contact avec le Service d'abonnement parlementaire, Publications Ontario, ministère des Services gouvernementaux, 50 rue Grosvenor, Toronto (Ontario) M7A 1N8. Par téléphone : 416- 326-5310, 326-5311 ou, sans frais : 1-800-668-9938.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

STANDING COMMITTEE ON FINANCE AND ECONOMIC AFFAIRS

Thursday 26 November 1992

The committee met at 1009 in committee room 1.

LONDON-MIDDLESEX ACT, 1992

LOI DE 1992 SUR LONDON ET MIDDLESEX

Consideration of Bill 75, An Act respecting Annexations to the City of London and to certain municipalities in the County of Middlesex / Loi concernant les annexions faites à la cité de London et à certaines municipalités du comté de Middlesex.

The Chair (Mr Ron Hansen): We'll resume the hearing on Bill 75, An Act respecting Annexations to the City of London and to certain municipalities in the County of Middlesex. We'll start off with a video submitted by Ben Veel. It will run about 10 minutes, and during that time the clerk will have a chance to have photocopies made of the Liberal motions.

Mrs Irene Mathyssen (Middlesex): Why are seeing this video? Why wasn't I told? I have another video. Can I show my video?

The Chair: Ask Todd.

[Video presentation]

Mr Kimble Sutherland (Oxford): Mr Chair, I realize this video has been submitted and I think it should be part of the official record, but I do believe we should be getting into our clause-by-clause vote today given the fact that there are several amendments to be done. If it is the will of the committee, I would ask that we proceed to that now.

Mrs Mathyssen: Could I ask, Mr Chair, since we've seen five minutes of what I can't really understand—I mean, I have been watching the video, but I haven't really understood; I don't know if it's the quality of the video. But since we have looked at it, might I request five minutes of the video I handed to you? It gives you a view of the land that is to be annexed. It is simply a visual image. Run it for one minute.

Mr Sutherland: I would move that we go into our clause-by-clause vote now.

Mrs Dianne Cunningham (London North): Could I ask a question, since I'm not a member of the committee and I don't know what's going on. Did we agree with people to show the video?

The Chair: It was submitted to the committee, and we said if we had a chance to view it, we would view it.

Mrs Cunningham: I don't want to be accused of not looking at something if somebody said we could look at it. I just want you to follow the rules. I'm not going to get accused again of not following the rules. So you figure it out. You're the Chairman.

The Chair: This is 10 minutes. The clerk has said to me that either we recess until the Liberals have got their amendments in or we let the video run. We can do either.

Mr Ron Eddy (Brant-Haldimand): I apologize that we don't have copies at the beginning, as we should have; I realize that. We've been working on them for a number of days and conferred with legislative counsel. They should be here, I realize, and they're coming.

Mrs Cunningham: Mr Chairman, it seems to me that if we're waiting for something, there's no harm at looking at the video. I'm enjoying it.

The Chair: Okay. Some people can close their eyes.

Mrs Cunningham: I'll look at Irene's too, if there's time.

[Video presentation]

1033

The Chair: I'd like to start off with opening remarks from the PA.

Mr Gordon Mills (Durham East): I'm pleased to bring forward to this committee the amendments to Bill 75, An Act respecting Annexations to the City of London and to certain municipalities in the County of Middlesex. I'd like to begin by explaining the process we will use in proceeding through the bill clause by clause.

There are 48 proposed amendments to Bill 75. However, many of these motions for amendment are of a technical nature and merely adjust certain sections of the bill in consequence of previous motions. While we will address each section of the bill separately, some of the technical amendments are repeated in related sections of the bill. With your permission, Mr Chairman, and with the full agreement of all the members of this committee, we will deal with these motions only once. In this way, we will be able to spend more time on the substantive changes to the legislation.

I believe it is important to point out that the proposed changes to this bill are as a direct result of our intensive consultation with the people of the London-Middlesex area, the elected officials and the residents. We have listened to their concerns and now propose amendments that will ensure that Bill 75 reflects their concerns.

We have listened to the residents, the leaders in the agricultural community and the social field and we have listened to the business community and the local politicians. We believe the proposed amendments address many of their concerns. We listened during the minister's public hearings held in London on September 24 and 25, and we listened to those individuals who have spoken before this committee.

The proposed amendments deal with important areas such as ensuring greater protection for municipal employees directly affected by the annexation and enabling greater flexibility around land use planning issues.

The first reading bill ensured that the new city of London be structured in such a way to accommodate and encourage more public participation in its future strategic planning. Social planning will be a key element in the future vision. To ensure this, we are proposing an amendment for the establishment of a social planning committee. In addition, we are proposing amendments that will call for a rural issues advisory committee. We are also proposing that the original compensation package to be offered to the county of Middlesex by the city of London be enhanced.

Mr Chairman, we are ready to proceed.

Mr Sutherland: Just before we go on, I want to get it clear on the record that we are to try and get through this bill today in that the agreement between the House leaders was that we were to have four days altogether, two days for hearings and then two days for clause-by-clause. That was subsequently amended by the House leaders to allow an extra day for hearings because there were numerous groups that didn't get on to the original list that wanted to present and so it was understood that we would just have one day to go through this.

I just want to say that, from my sense, what should go on today is that we should spend as much time, whatever, on each section and amendment, if people want to discuss, but it would be my sense that roughly around 5:45 it should be that everything is being put for the bill to have its final vote before the end of the day. I just want to make that clear. That is my understanding of how things are, so if we get backlogged due to lengthy debates on any one section, people should understand there's an expectation to have this finished today.

Mr Eddy: In other words, time allocation on debate. We're well aware of that situation.

The Chair: Mrs Cunningham, any problem?

Mrs Cunningham: I just want to add it was at the request of the committee that we add the additional day.

Mr Eddy: We were hoping to have an additional day.

Mrs Mathysen: There's an amendment missing from the package that I submitted. I don't know where it's gone. I had it this morning. It was in connection with the boundary adjustments. I want to draw to your attention that the first amendment I am proposing is missing from the package that was handed out.

The Chair: It's missing?

Mrs Mathysen: Yes.

The Chair: If you can wind up getting a copy of that for each one of the members—

Mrs Cunningham: We don't have any of those amendments.

The Chair: It says, "Ms Mathysen." So there's one missing.

Mrs Mathysen: The first is missing.

The Chair: And you'll get a copy for all the members on that. I believe, Mr Eddy, you've submitted 50 amendments?

Mr Eddy: Yes. Do you want me to speak to them briefly at this time?

The Chair: You've presented these here to—

Mr Eddy: Yes. We have many amendments and before presenting the amendments of our caucus, I just want to say that it is my sincere hope that the proposed amendments will receive the committee's very serious consideration. The amendments my caucus is presenting are very reasonable amendments which respond to the serious concerns of the many individuals who appeared before this committee.

The main concerns expressed, as members of the committee will know, surround the issue of the size of the annexation which is clearly too large, and that's well documented. Given the complex nature of this act, we have over 50 amendments that we wish to present and it is my hope that the government House leader sees fit to extend the clause-by-clause proceedings by one day. We realize that may not be possible, but that is our hope.

The Chair: Looking at the time, what we have done in this committee before is go through all the government motions first, then we'll go through the Liberal motions and then we'll go through Ms Mathysen's motions. We'll take it in order like that because I think we might find a repeat of some of the Liberal motions already covered by the government and it could be vice versa. Then at the very end we'll go clause by clause with the already agreed-upon amendments to the bill, which progress a lot quicker than going clause by clause and trying to go through three at one time.

If it's agreed by the committee that we proceed that way, I'll hand over to Mr Mills, the PA, and he will read off the first amendment.

Mr Mills: Thank you, Mr Chair. We move to section 2.1 of Bill 75.

I move that the bill be amended by adding the following section after section 2:

"Schedules

"2.1(1) Before the 1st day of January 1993, the Minister of Municipal Affairs shall:

"(a) prepare the schedules referred to in subsection 2(1);

"(b) cause the schedules to be published in the Ontario Gazette; and

"(c) cause copies of the schedules to be deposited with the clerk of each municipality affected by this act.

"Same

"(2) The minister may, at any time, cause the schedules referred to in subsection (1) to be recorded in the bylaw index under section 68 of the Registry Act in the land registry office for the registry division of Middlesex East (No 33).

"Application of Municipal Act

"(3) The copies of the schedules shall be deemed to be a document in the possession of the clerk of a municipality for the purposes of subsection 74(1) of the Municipal Act.

"Application of Registry Act

"(4) The schedules shall be deemed to be an instrument for the purposes of section 68 of the Registry Act.

"Non-application of Regulations Act

"(5) The schedules are not a regulation for the purposes of the Regulations Act."

The Chair: Any discussion on the amendment?

Mr Mills: Maybe I should say that schedules are not attached to this bill because legislative counsel have changed the rules since the bill was printed, so this is normal procedure.

The Chair: Okay. Any discussion on the amendment? Seeing none, are we ready to vote on the amendment?

All those agreed to the amendment? You've got to hold your hand up, how many agree, so I can count here. One, two, three, four, five. Okay, carried.

Mr Mills: Moving along to subsection 5(4) of the bill, I move that section 5 of the bill be amended by adding the following subsection:

"Majority vote

"(4) Despite subsections 68(3), (6), (7) and (8) of the Municipal Act, the council of the city of London may exercise its powers under those subsections with a majority vote of the members of the council present at a meeting."

The Chair: Mr Mills, I'm going to have to stop you. We're going to have to take a recess. The clerk would like to put all of these in order, like the government, the Liberals and Ms Mathysen, and we deal with them as we go through rather than going all the way through. Can we take a recess for 10 minutes and come back so that it's a little bit better to follow?

The committee recessed at 1044 and resumed at 1103.

The Chair: I call this committee to order again. We're going to have to backtrack a little bit, as we've got all the amendments in order now. I'll read out which ones they are. We'll go back to section 2, which is a Liberal motion. Mr Eddy, do you have that in front of you now?

Mr Eddy: Yes, sir.

I move that section 2 of the bill be struck out and the following substituted:

"Annexations

"2(1) On the 1st day of January, 1993,

"(a) the portions of the town of Westminster described in schedule 1 and of the township of London described in schedule 2 is annexed to the city of London and forms one ward of the city;

"(b) the portion of the township of London described in schedule 3 is annexed to the township of West Nissouri;

"(c) the portion of the township of North Dorchester described in schedule 4 is annexed to the village of Belmont.

"Interpretation re Belmont annexation

"(2) The lands annexed to the village of Belmont under clause (1)(c) form part of the county of Elgin.

"Same

"(3) Despite the Education Act, the lands annexed to the village of Belmont under clause (1)(c) form part of the school division of the Elgin County Board of Education."

This amendment is submitted to reflect the 1988 proposal. It is a very strong view I have that if the section is amended to reflect the 1988 proposal, you will indeed have signatories to an agreement effecting such and accepting such amendment, because it was one that was submitted by the city of London and other parties did look at it and agree to it. It's true that the town of Westminster council did not agree to it at the time, but in view of all that's transpired since that date, we fully expect that to be the case.

The Chair: Discussion?

Mrs Mathysen: Interestingly enough, this Liberal motion is very much like the motion I'm going to be putting. Basically, I'd like to expand on Mr Eddy's remarks quite briefly by saying, first, that I'm not only the representative from the county of Middlesex but I also represent a significant population in the east part of London. These people have established a quite vibrant community. They are, by and large, the people who work in the various factories and service sectors. They are by no means wealthy but they are most certainly very significant contributors to the life of the city of London.

My concerns are twofold around this proposed annexation and the problems created by Bill 75, for not just my rural constituents but my urban constituents, because I believe that the size of this annexation is profoundly too large. I understand that there are going to be significant costs attached to this for the city of London and hence the constituents I serve in the east part of London. Among those costs are the proposed $35 million in compensation, the cost of a new official plan, the cost for hard services, soft services, library services, fire protection, police protection, the harmonizing of London city employees, PUC employees, $1 million proposed for suburban roads in perpetuity each year, not to mention the costs of bringing in displaced Middlesex employees. And I believe this is just the surface of costs.

I am convinced by the presentation made by Professor Andrew Sancton and Councillor Joe Swan who, incidentally, mentioned in passing that not all of city council agreed with Bill 75 and in point of fact hadn't had the opportunity to fully debate or even been apprised of the presentation made by Controller Grant Hopcroft, Deputy Mayor Jack Burghardt and Mayor Tom Gosnell. The city did not fully support this proposed annexation and Councillor Swan indicated that he feared that the levy to the people living within the city of London, tax increases in the very short term, would be in the double-digit range, and I'm very concerned for my constituents in London East because of that.

I have concerns in the county because of the loss of tax base, a full 28%, and the profound impact it will have on the Middlesex board of education. The reality is that when you take that very lucrative tax base away from the county of Middlesex you are left with a less-than-wealthy, less-than-affluent county. Parts of the west are seriously disadvantaged.

There are other, non-monetary problems. I won't go on at length. I will simply say that the proposed alternative, the 1988 proposal, would significantly reduce the impact in terms of cost to both municipalities, both the city of London and the county of Middlesex. Yes, it would require a coservicing agreement. But I submit to you that I would be delighted to accept Bill 75, since the minister stated coservicing doesn't work, if he's willing to tell his own constituents in Windsor, St Clair Beach and Tecumseh that their 30-year coservicing agreement doesn't work and to cancel it. I assume that the Minister of Municipal Affairs, since he can disband and cause the town of Westminster to cease to exist, can also tell the town of Tecumseh, St Clair and the city of Windsor that their coservicing agreement is no longer valid and must be dispensed with.

I understand that there is concern around coservicing and that the minister is not particularly delighted with the 1988 proposal. In that case, there is a second alternative proposal that has been submitted by the townships of Delaware and North Dorchester. They propose to take lands, designated on maps provided, south of Highways 401 and 402 and divide those lands. They've also included the cost of this proposal.

My concern about this is that it would still require $35 million in compensation, and of course one of my concerns was with the $35 million in compensation. It would not cost more; it would cost the same.

1110

The advantage to plan B is that it would return agricultural land to a rural municipality where there are councilors who can better understand rural needs. And I believe, since regulations can be made, they can be unmade, that the regulations the Minister of Municipal Affairs plans to protect agricultural land in the city of London may not be as effective as he had wished.

Interestingly enough, while I recognize the fact that the county of Middlesex has not always been diligent in protecting agricultural land, I would point to the record of the city of London. It seems passing strange that you would award land—

The Chair: Mrs Mathyssen, are you—

Mrs Mathyssen: I'm almost finished, Mr Chair—to the custodial care and stewardship of a city that has not been particularly responsible and take it away from the county.

The Chair: I knew you were coming to the end.

Mr Eddy: Thank you for your support.

Mr Mills: One of the key players in this annexation is the city of London, and there's absolutely no evidence of any support by it for any boundary change at this time. That is the ministry's position.

Mr Eddy: I didn't catch that. There is no evidence of support of this amendment?

Mr Mills: At this time. There's no evidence of support for any changes of this.

Mr Eddy: By the council of the city of London?

Mr Mills: City of London.

Mr Eddy: Well, that's not the information we have, but of course what's on record may be something different.

Mr Mills: Yes.

The Chair: All in favour of this amendment? One, two, three, four, five.

All those against? That's five. We have a tie.

Mr Mills: The Chair votes in the case of a tie.

Mr Bernard Grandmaître (Ottawa East): The first time the Chair voted, the second time the Chair voted. Is that how it works?

The Chair: Well, it wasn't the second time.

Mr Eddy: As long as the Chair doesn't have two votes.

The Chair: I couldn't vote the first time, all in favour. It was who was against, and I voted because it was—or do I have to come back to another vote?

Mr Grandmaître: No, no; maybe you'll need to. My question is, is the parliamentary assistant a due member of this committee?

Mr Sutherland: Yes, he's been subbed in.

Mr Grandmaître: A voting member?

The Chair: Yes. He could be sitting down there, but he's sitting up here.

Mr Mills: I am here for the convenience of—

Mr Grandmaître: For the convenience of—good work, Gord.

Mr Mills: So that you can all see me.

The Chair: The next one is a Liberal motion, subsection 2(4). I'll go to Mr Eddy, but if there's someone else, just step in.

Mr Eddy: I move that section 2 of the bill be amended by adding the following subsection:

"Schedules

"(4) On or before the 1st day of January, 1993, the Minister of Municipal Affairs shall prepare the schedules referred to in subsection (1), ensuring that they reflect the boundary lines recommended in the annexation proposal of the city of London dated November, 1988, and shall cause the schedules to be published in the Ontario Gazette."

Of course, this amendment reflects the 1988 proposal.

The Chair: Discussion?

Mr Mills: This amendment rolls back annexation to the 1988 proposal. The ministry doesn't support it. London doesn't support it. One municipality would not be responsible for growth management. It requires intermunicipal servicing and provincial infrastructure support. For that reason, it's not supported by the ministry.

The Chair: All those in favour of the motion? One, two, three, four, five.

Okay, all those opposed? One, two, three, four, five, six. Defeated.

Ms Mathyssen, subsection 2(4).

Mr Sutherland: Did we deal with Ms Mathyssen's 2.1?

The Chair: It's the same, so it's redundant.

Mr Sutherland: On 2.1?

The Chair: I'm coming up to 2.1. Okay, we've already passed 2.1, the government motion. We have a Liberal motion, section 2.1, Mr Eddy.

Mr Eddy: I move that the bill be amended by adding the following section after section 2:

"Watermain and sewage systems, hamlets of Arva and Ballymote

"2.1(1) The city of London shall provide for watermain and sanitary sewage system capacities for the hamlets of Arva and Ballymote located in the township of London as follows:

"1. 400 acres or 1,000 housing and commercial units in the hamlet of Arva.

"2. 200 acres or 500 housing and commercial units in the hamlet of Ballymote.

"Joint servicing agreements

"(2) The city of London shall enter into joint servicing agreements with the township of London to provide the watermain and sanitary sewage system connections for the purpose of subsection (1) and the agreements shall provide that the cost to connect the services shall be borne solely by the township.

“Imposed by regulation

“(3) If the city of London and township of London are unable to reach an agreement, the Minister of Municipal Affairs may, by regulation, authorize the watermain and sanitary sewage system connections for the purpose of subsection (1).”

These are joint servicing agreements between the city and the township of London and were previously part of a negotiated agreement between the city and the township of London. Of course there are already some services there. The township of London would have taken the water from the provincial pipeline from Lake Huron except that it's remote, and this is much less cost to do it in this manner. But it was the basis of a previously negotiated agreement.

The Chair: Discussion?

Mr Mills: In so far as this amendment is concerned, the ministry wouldn't have any problem with this if it was done by negotiations, but what it does is it forces London to extend the services as it is.

Mrs Mathysen: I was a little behind. I have an identical amendment, Mr Chair. The reason for including this amendment is because the township of London had profound concerns. When the city of London needed the township of London, it was quite willing to agree to extending the services the township needed in return for land. As soon as the township conceded the land, London became very, very unclear about how it would coservice, so the township has profound concerns that it will in fact not receive its services.

The Chair: We're ready for the vote. All those in favour of the amendment? All those opposed? Defeated.

Ms Mathysen, your amendment is identical to the other one, so it's redundant.

We go to government motion section 2.1, which has already been passed. Now we go to a Liberal motion, section 3.

Mr Eddy: I move that section 3 of the bill be struck out.

This removes the clause that dissolves the town of Westminster.

The Chair: Discussion?

Mr Mills: This is fundamental to the bill. It dissolves Westminster. The boundary's related.

The Chair: All those in favour of the motion? All those opposed? Defeated.

Mr Bill Murdoch (Grey): Could this be called ethnic cleansing?

Mr Sutherland: Please, Mr Murdoch.

The Chair: Okay, Ms Mathysen, clause 5(1)(b).

Mrs Mathysen: I move that subsection 5(1) of the bill be amended by striking out clause (b).

The Chair: Discussion?

Mr Mills: This amendment removes the board of control, and we've never discussed that with the city, so it's not acceptable to the ministry.

The Chair: All those in favour of the motion? All those opposed? Defeated.

A Liberal motion, clause 5(1)(b), Mr Eddy.

1120

Mr Eddy: I move that subsection 5(1) of the bill be amended by striking out clause (b). Yes, the same as—

The Chair: The same. I'm sorry, but usually the order's changed. I didn't realize, because I thought it would be the Liberal first and then—so it's redundant.

Mr Eddy: That's fine. Go ahead.

The Chair: We have a Liberal motion here, subsection 5(2).

Mr Eddy: I move that subsection 5(2) of the bill be amended by striking out “30th day of November 1994” in the third line and substituting “30th day of March 1993.”

This provides for a by-election within three months of the annexation, so that an individual may be elected and not appointed by the government to represent the annexed area.

Now, it's not as large an area. It would include the town of Westminster plus the areas of the other municipalities being annexed to the city. There are two main reasons: One is to let the people elect the person they wish to represent them, but also to allow the people in the annexed portions of those other municipalities who had no part in electing the mayor of the town of Westminster, who will be appointed—if it's not changed—to represent them. They've never had the opportunity to vote. Those are the reasons. Thank you.

The Chair: Okay. Discussion?

Mrs Mathysen: This motion is the same as my motion. I concur with it because I think the aspirations of the people annexed in the north part of the now city of London may be entirely different from those put forward by the current mayor of Westminster. To be truly democratic, I believe they should not be disfranchised in this way.

The Chair: Any further discussion?

Mr Grandmaître: Can I ask a question? Is this the first time we've done this in the province of Ontario?

The Chair: I'd have to ask the ministry.

Mr Mills: We don't know, but we could find out. We don't know, if it's pertinent.

Mr Eddy: I think perhaps it is, to my knowledge. In the case of the annexation by the city of Brantford of a large portion of the township of Brantford, they took a member of the township of Brantford council, as I recall, to sit on—or was it tied in with the municipal election? Sorry, it was tied in with the municipal election.

Mr Mills: Just to show you how flexible we are, the ministry has no qualms with this amendment at all. We feel we could support it.

The Chair: Okay. All those in favour of this motion? Can I vote on that one too?

Mr Grandmaître: Now all you guys are on the right side.

The Chair: Okay, we come back to another Liberal motion, subsection 5(2.1).

Mr Eddy: I move that section 5 of the bill be amended by adding the following subsection after subsection (2):

"By-election to be held

"(2.1) A by-election under the Municipal Elections Act to elect one or more representatives of the ward described in clause 2(1)(a) shall be held on the 30th day of March, 1993, and the person elected in that by-election shall hold office until the 30th day of November 1994," which is the end of the present municipal term. It's a cleanup clause, housekeeping clause.

The Chair: Okay. Discussion?

Mr Will Ferguson (Kitchener): Just a question: What day is the 30th day of March?

Mr Mills: It's my birthday.

Mr Ferguson: What day of the week. Just provided it's not a Sunday.

Mr Eddy: The 30th is a Tuesday.

The Chair: Is that clarification, Mr Ferguson? Any other discussion?

Mrs Mathysen: Simply to say that I concur with this. It is identical to my motion, and in that I concur.

Mr Mills: I just would like to say that the ministry feels it should be amended to read "held on or before the 30th day of March." And bearing in mind that London has electronic balloting and counting and we look at it from the cost, we'd like to add, "The election shall be a manually counted election," to save costs. This is going to be an enormous expense if we do it the normal way. So those two amendments: "on or before" and "The election shall be a manually counted election." It doesn't really change anything.

Mrs Mathysen: That's fine.

The Chair: All those in favour of the amendment to the amendment and the amendment?

Mr Mills: And the amendment?

The Chair: Passed.

Okay, we come to subsection 5(3), Mr Eddy, Liberal motion.

Mr Eddy: I'm not sure about the motion on the board of control, 5(1)(b). That was put and lost?

Mr Mills: Yes.

Mr Eddy: Then this would be removed.

Mr Mills: Removed?

Mr Eddy: Yes, sir, 5(3) is to be removed as well in view of the previous motion re the board of control.

The Chair: So section 5(3) is removed also.

Okay, we come up to a government motion, subsection 5(4).

Mr Mills: I move that section 5 of the bill be amended by adding the following subsection:

"Majority vote

"(4) Despite subsections 68(3), (6), (7) and (8) of the Municipal Act, the council of the city of London may exercise its powers under those subsections with a majority vote of the members of the council present at a meeting."

This was asked for by the city of London and it's in keeping with the current practice.

The Chair: Discussion?

Mr Grandmaitre: Can we have a little deeper explanation on this one?

Mr Mills: Maybe I can shed some light on that. Council now may exercise its powers regarding the board of control with a majority of members, rather than two thirds as established in the Municipal Act. That clarifies, I hope.

The Chair: Any more discussion? All those in favour of the motion?

Mr Mills: Crumbs, you nearly got caught.

Mr Eddy: I'm following your lead.

The Chair: Okay, all those opposed? Carried.

We have a Liberal motion here, which is subsection 6(1.1).

Mr Eddy: I move that section 6 of the bill be amended by adding the following subsection after subsection (1):

"(1.1) The minister may, despite this or any other act, by regulation redivide the town of Westminster into wards and provide for the number of members of council, up to a maximum of two members, to be elected from each ward."

This provides for the election of up to two individuals to be elected to serve the wards of the annexed areas.

The Chair: Discussion?

Mr Mills: I think this was addressed in a previous motion, so it's really boundary-related and redundant, as far as the ministry is concerned.

Mr Ferguson: So the ministry is in support?

Mr Mills: No.

Mr Grandmaitre: We turned down the ward system, so—

Mr Mills: You turned down—no, I stand corrected. It has to do with the previous motion of a boundary adjustment, so that's why it doesn't really follow.

Mr Eddy: Well, we submit it, and it's to provide for up to two rather than one individual for the annexed areas.
1130

The Chair: Okay, let's have a vote on it. All those in favour? Opposed? Carried.

Mr Mills: Lost.

The Chair: Sorry; lost.

Mr Mills: Crumbs, you got me going.

The Chair: Now we've got a Liberal motion here, subsection 6(3).

Mr Eddy: Withdrawn in view of the previous vote.

The Chair: Okay. We come to a government motion, clause 8(3)(b).

Mr Mills: I move that clause 8(3)(b) of the bill be struck out and the following substituted:

"(b) the 31st day of December, 1995."

If I can explain, the first reading bill required development charge bylaws to expire on December 31, 1994, and it is proposed now that this date be extended one year to December 31, 1995, for lands being annexed to the city of London. This will coincide with the extension being given the city for preparing a new official plan, which it had requested.

The Chair: Discussion? All those in favour of the amendment? Carried.

Government motion, subclause 9(2)(b)(ii).

Mr Mills: I move that subclause 9(2)(b)(ii) of the bill be amended by striking out "1994" in the fourth line and substituting "1995".

The explanation for this is that for annexing municipalities other than the city of London, the first reading bill, as I described previously, also required development charge bylaws to expire on December 31, 1994, and the extension to December 31, 1995, will also apply to the lands that they are annexing.

The Chair: Discussion? If none, all those in favour of the motion? All those opposed? Carried.

Government motion, subclause 10(2)(a)(ii).

Mr Mills: I move that subclause 10(2)(a)(ii) of the bill be struck out and the following substituted:

"(ii) the 31st day of December, 1995."

That again is similar. The extension of the date for development charge bylaws of the county of Middlesex for lands being annexed by the city of London will be December 31, 1995.

The Chair: Discussion? If none, ready to vote? All those in favour of the motion? All those opposed? Carried.

Government motion, subclause 10(2)(b)(ii).

Mr Mills: I move that subclause 10(2)(b)(ii) of the bill be amended by striking out "1994" in the fourth line and substituting "1995".

Again, the date for development charge bylaws of the county of Middlesex for lands being annexed to the village of Belmont will be extended to December 31, 1995.

The Chair: Discussion? Seeing none, all those in favour of the motion? Those opposed? Carried.

We go to a Liberal motion here, subsection 12(4).

Mr Eddy: I move that section 12 of the bill be amended by adding the following subsection:

"(4) Before an annexing municipality repeals an amendment to an official plan adopted by the council of a municipality from which land is annexed but not yet approved by the Minister of Municipal Affairs, the council of the annexing municipality shall give notice and follow the procedures set out in part III of the Planning Act."

This deals of course with the official plan amendments adopted by council but not approved by the minister. Prior to any repeal of an OP amendment, in the above situation, London city council must serve notice and hold a public meeting.

The Chair: Discussion?

Mrs Mathysen: I would concur with this motion simply because it is important that the citizens affected by this annexation have that opportunity to fully understand changes in the official plan.

The Chair: Any more discussion?

Mr Mills: I've got to read the way it's got to be worded:

"(4) The procedures set out in part III of the Planning Act for adopting an official plan amendment apply with necessary modifications to an annexing municipality repealing an amendment to an official plan adopted by the council of a municipality from which land is annexed but which amendment has not yet been approved on the 31st day of December 1992."

I'll pass that to the clerk.

Ms Mary Neumann: You can pass it around.

Mr Mike Cooper (Kitchener-Wilmot): Could we have that one stood down until we get it printed up?

Mr Mills: Yes.

The Chair: Okay, fine.

Mr Mills: We have no problem with this.

Mr Eddy: I just wondered what the words "with modification" meant.

Ms Neumann: It's just the process in the Planning Act, as necessary to modify, because this doesn't quite fit in this situation.

The Chair: Okay, we'll stand this one down and come back to it. We'll go on to a Liberal motion, subsection 13(3).

Mr Eddy: I move that section 13 of the bill be amended by adding the following subsection:

"Exceptions

"(3) Despite subsection (1), the sandpit in the north-east corner of lot 6, concession 5, township of London, and the gravel pit in the township of Delaware shall remain in the ownership of the annexed municipality without compensation."

Declaring that certain assets would remain in the ownership of the annexed municipality lets the townships of London and Delaware retain their gravel pits, which are vital to future road maintenance. As you know, both Delaware and London townships are rural townships and the roads in the areas to be left are gravel roads to a great extent. Roads in the areas to be annexed are, for the most part, paved roads. So this allows them to keep those assets that are needed to continue to maintain local gravel roads.

The Chair: Any further discussion?

Mrs Mathysen: We concur with this—it is identical to mine—and would add that removing these gravel pits and sandpits from the rural municipalities would cause them unnecessary financial distress. So I would support, and ask the committee to support, this motion.

Mr Mills: The ministry feels it won't support the motion because it thinks the problem should be addressed through the transition process rather than an amendment.

Mr Eddy: Will it be addressed in the transition and to what extent? Does that mean there will be compensation to those municipalities for that? How do you mean, it will be dealt with?

Mr Mills: I think they'll have to sit down with the city and discuss this in due process.

1140

Mr Ferguson: Can I ask a quick question? The obvious question is that if this amendment isn't adopted, then this asset is turned over to the city.

Mr Eddy: Yes.

Mr Ferguson: If the asset is turned over to the city, what's there to discuss? I mean, the decision's been made, so what's there to discuss at that point? If I'm sitting as a member of council in the city and I just got this gift—and I don't now what the value of these pits would be, but probably they're substantial—what's the value in sitting down with one of these two townships or both of the townships? What kind of bargaining chip does either of the townships have?

Mrs Mathysen: None.

Mr Mills: I'd just like to comment and say that the ministry does feel that this should be a gesture of a transition process, but nevertheless, if it seems to be a matter of contention and members so desire to pass this amendment, we are not going to oppose that.

Mr Sutherland: I was going to ask if there is anyone here from Municipal Affairs who's dealing with the transition team process who could comment on whether this item has been on the agenda.

Mr Mills: Anyone?

Mr Scott Gray: I could, perhaps.

The Chair: Okay, would you come forward.

Mr Gray: My name's Scott Gray. I work with the legal branch. I can assure you, as some of you clearly know right now, that certainly the issue of these gravel pits has come up a number of times and the townships are quite concerned about the future and how these will be dealt with. The bill as it's set up now doesn't say these gravel pits will go to the city; it doesn't say they will stay with the township. What it says is that those assets that pertain to an area annexed to the city will become city assets.

So when the committee of referee sets down, it's going to have to say, "What does this land pertain to?" In other adjustment processes they may well decide that that gravel pit operation pertains to not just the city but it pertains to the county and they may decide it pertains more to the county and their decision will be to leave it with the county. That is a possible outcome of that process. The act doesn't predetermine where that asset will go, that's all.

The Chair: Mr Eddy, you had your hand up first.

Mr Eddy: There's a misunderstanding. The county doesn't enter into it whatsoever. They are local assets purchased by the local municipalities for the sole purpose of maintaining the gravel roads, mainly. It wouldn't be as much the reconstruction or the paving of roads, because that would take so much out of them, but it's the continued maintenance.

The problem is, in the case of the township of West Nissouri, where 40% of the assessment is going but hardly any of the population and hardly any of the roads maintained by the municipality, it's absolutely necessary, I think, that they maintain title to those pits. Sorry, West Nissouri isn't mentioned; it's London township and Delaware. But they've been purchased for the entire townships. I agree that they were purchased with funds from the entire assessment at the time they were purchased, some time ago, before some development, but it's crucial and it's the local municipality that needs them.

Mrs Mathysen: I would concur with Mr Eddy. I have grave concerns around this, because when this bill becomes law, the Ministry of Municipal Affairs in effect walks away and further negotiations are left between the rural municipalities and the city of London. Just as with the servicing agreement regarding sewage treatment for London township, I haven't much faith in the integrity of the city of London to live up to agreements when it's already got what it wants.

Mr Sutherland: We have this amendment that refers to a specific sandpit in London township and a specific gravel pit in Delaware. Are there any other sandpits or gravel pits in any of the affected areas?

Mr Mills: None.

I'd just like to quickly make a point. Why we felt not to support the amendment originally is that we feel it might sort of undermine the process of transition. Having said that, I feel, on behalf of the ministry, that they would get the sandpit or gravel pit anyway under the transition process, but if you don't feel you want to go through that route, well, we're amenable to support the amendment.

Mr Eddy: I think it's preferable to deal with it now, realizing that if we do say and if it is passed that the townships retain them, certainly I think the transition team will still look at that as having been kept even though it's in the annexed area. So there will be some consideration given, but I'd like to see it dealt with now and then it's final.

The Chair: Okay. I call the question: How many in favour of the motion? Seven. Passed.

We go to government motion subsection 15(2).

Mr Mills: I move that subsection 15(2) of the bill be struck out and the following substituted:

"Payment for special collector's rolls

"(2) On or before the 1st day of April, 1993, an annexing municipality provided with a special collector's roll under subsection (1) or (3) shall pay to the municipality that provided the roll an amount equal to the arrears of taxes, charges and rates contained on the special collector's roll, together with any accumulated interest or penalty, but excluding any amount struck off the roll by the treasurer of the annexing municipality under section 441 of the Municipal Act."

To explain that, this provision will ensure that Delaware and North Dorchester assume responsibility as annexing municipalities to annex municipalities for any taxes owing, including interest and penalties. Exceptions would be taxes considered uncollectible by the annexing municipality.

The Chair: Discussion? Seeing none, all those in favour of the motion? Do you have your hand up, Mr Ferguson? All those opposed? Carried.

We move on to a Liberal motion here, subsection 19(1).

Mr Eddy: I move that subsection 19(1) of the bill be struck out and the following substituted:

"Employees

"(1) Every person who is employed by the town of Westminster on the 1st day of November, 1992, and continues to be so employed until the 31st day of December, 1992, becomes an employee of the city of London on the 1st of January 1993."

Of course, that's the timing of the annexation, changing the section so that there is a transfer of employees from Westminster to the city of London instead of just the provision to offer them jobs. I think this is a usual clause that's been used before in annexations.

The Chair: Discussion?

Mr Mills: I just think, in deference to Mr Eddy's amendment, we will do that better in an amendment that's to come forward in a minute. We're going to improve on your amendment, so perhaps we should just hold off.

Mr Grandmaître: Then can we deal with the government's amendment? Then we can go back to—

The Chair: Yes, I think that would be easier, because Ms Mathysen's is the same.

Mrs Mathysen: I move that subsections 19(1) and (2) of the bill be struck out and the following substituted:

"Employees

"19(1) The city of London or a local board thereof, as agreed upon by the city and its local boards, shall offer to employ every person who was employed by the town of Westminster or a local board thereof on the 31st day of December, 1992.

"Same

"(2) The city or a local board thereof, as agreed upon by the city and its local boards, shall offer to employ every person who,

"(a) was employed by the county of Middlesex, the township of Delaware, the township of London, the township of North Dorchester or the township of West Nissouri or a local board thereof on the 31st day of December, 1992; and

"(b) on or before the 30th day of June, 1994, had his or her position declared surplus by his or her employer, as a result of the annexations under this act."

1150

Very briefly, while I would have preferred it to say "shall employ," I think this does help the employees of the affected townships. Because once again, as witnessed by the kind of job offers that have been made by the city of London—namely, jobs that have no job description, jobs that didn't previously exist—I have profound concerns about the security of Westminster and other county employees who are displaced and affected by Bill 75.

I would also like to point out that clause (2)(b) extends that period to June 1994 in terms of declaration of an employee as surplus in order to protect employees who are not otherwise protected, by virtue of the fact that some county employees may continue to have jobs in the transition, only to find themselves without jobs at a later date.

Mr Grandmaître: I don't have a copy of Ms Mathysen's—

The Chair: That's a government motion; she's moving it.

Mr Mills: She's moving it on behalf of the government.

Mr Murdoch: Does this mean they could hire people right now? Is that what you're saying? I'm going by the Liberals' one now; they'd have to already be working—

Mr Mills: Yes, that's what it means.

Mr Murdoch: So we're going to have a whole lot more people hired in the last month and then London's going to have to take them over. Is that what you're saying?

Mr Mills: It hasn't happened so far and it's not anticipated that it will.

Mr Murdoch: But there's nothing to say it won't.

Mr Mills: It might snow in a minute.

Mr Murdoch: So you load the union up. You can load all kinds of union employees who are unemployed right now, hire them all now and then London's going to have to take them over. Okay. That's what you want, is it?

Mr Sutherland: No, it's to protect the employees.

Mr Mills: It's done in good faith.

Mr Murdoch: But the Liberal motion says the cutoff date was November.

Mr Grandmaître: We haven't dealt with the Liberal motion yet, but what this motion says is "shall offer to employ every person." That's in section 2, "shall offer." I think our amendment is much better. I think we should deal with ours.

Mr Murdoch: I agree with you, as much as I hate to.

Mr Eddy: The main difference is that the government's amendment says "shall offer to employ every person." Our amendment says "continues to be so employed," and I think that's the difference. Does offering employment also mean the right for that person to be employed if they accept the offer? That's maybe the question. Maybe it does, but it's not as clear. We're saying they shall be employed and they shall become employees of the city. The government amendment says they shall be offered employment. It's a greater protection.

The Chair: Would you have a little clarification?

Mr Murdoch: Just explain it, Gord.

Mr Mills: To me, it's a matter of use of words: "shall" or "continue to be," whatever you want to pick. I think the intent is there and it's in very good faith that these folks will be offered employment, continue to be employed. I don't see any great problem with this.

Mr Ferguson: I don't want to debate semantics but I think the intent is that all the existing employees will be offered employment and will be employed by the city of London. Is that correct, Mr Mills?

Mr Mills: I beg your pardon, but I'd just like to say that this amendment is in agreement with the city and with all the unions involved too. So everyone's on side with this. The ones who don't seem to be on side—the discussion is here. These are the key players and they're on side.

Mr Ferguson: There is a little bit of difference between offering somebody employment and saying they shall be employed. They could very well offer somebody employment, without having a job in existence for that individual, and fulfil their obligations.

Mr Mills: You can't force people to take it. You can force people to offer employment, but to force them to take it is another thing. This is really the wordage, what we're getting into here.

Mrs Mathysen: My concern here again is the assumption of good faith. I do not believe that London has been particularly faithful, and it is not good faith that some of these job offers have been made. For example, a building inspector has been offered a job as an engineer. How long do you think he's going to last?

Mr Sutherland: I'd just like to reiterate that the parties directly affected—the union, the Westminster employees' group that was here, the city—are aware of this amendment being proposed and are in support of it and what it stands for. Those people directly involved were consulted and have said that this is what they're asking.

Mr Grandmaître: I realize everybody is on side, but the wording says "shall offer." I realize the parliamentary assistant's argument that you can't force people, so if everybody's on side, why don't you use the words "continues to be so employed"?

The Chair: Instead of "shall offer," put "continues to employ every person."

Mr Murdoch: We started out with an amendment to subsection 19(1) and then we somehow got into a government one and we never did vote on it.

Mr Sutherland: We agreed that we'd deal with the government motion first, before we deal with the Liberal motion.

The Chair: What we've done is that some of the Liberal motion is being incorporated into the government motion.

Mr Murdoch: Then that's fair too, but the Liberal motion also has a date on it of the 31st day of November, which means no one can be employed right now and then get a job out of London. Your motion is not really saying that. There's a fundamental difference.

Mr Grandmaître: Because this is November 1992.

Mr Murdoch: I know. I hear you. Your motion is totally different from theirs.

Mr Mills: If I can respond to your concerns, if we say "continues to be," then the people have got no option. What if they say, "We don't want to be employed."

Mr Grandmaître: Let them say no.

Mr Mills: I want to bring up another point about the government motion and the Liberal motion. The government says in subsection (2), "The city or a local board thereof," and you say every person employed by the town of Westminster. We're including local boards.

I emphasize again that this has been hammered out with the unions and the city. We've got to understand that this is done in good faith. We can all suppose this, that and the other, but the underlying fact is that the key players have agreed to this.

Mr Murdoch: Gord, the bill is not in good faith, so don't expect me to believe that.

Mr Mills: That's a matter of opinion. I believe it is.

Mr Murdoch: I know, but don't expect me to believe that. You can believe what you want.

Mr Sutherland: Mr Chair, on a point of order: We're almost reaching 12 o'clock. We're going to have to adjourn very shortly. I just want to know if we're going to wrap up debate and have an actual vote on this motion before we go for lunch.

The Chair: Mr Eddy wanted to wind up. There's Mrs Mathysen, and then back to you.

Mr Eddy: It's been mentioned that everybody knows about that. Without some evidence of that fact, I can't agree with it, because I understand that some of the groups haven't been.

In addition, we've got to recognize that we have non-union employees of the town of Westminster, but also it's the employees of the township of West Nissouri. West Nissouri is losing 40% of its assessment. That means a tremendous reduction in their staff. It's my understanding that those employees have not been offered anything by the city. I know the bill hasn't been passed etc, but there are other municipalities involved. Their employees should be informed about it and know about it. Recognizing what the parliamentary assistant said, that you can't force somebody to be employed, but you can employ them and they can resign, if they were continued employment. I just think there needs to be a bit more protection than that states and would ask your consideration of that, for all employees. Except for a by-election, I might be on the table myself.

Mrs Mathysen: To add to what Mr Eddy has said, in addition to Westminster employees not being unionized employees, I have just conferred with them and they are not in agreement and fully comfortable with this. They wish to be transferred, because you get into this whole area of seniority and problems surrounding that. This isn't as simplistic as it may seem.

Mr Sutherland: Can we put it to a vote, Mr Chair?

Mr Mills: Can I just make a quick closing remark? The minister has said in Bill 75 "may by regulation define 'employee' or 'retired employee' and provide for the security of employment, the protection of benefits, including seniority and pensions, and early retirement options for employees and retired employees affected by this part."

I don't know how much more—and the minister has also made these promises to the unions that this will be right.

The Chair: Subsections 19(1) and (2): All those in favour of this government amendment? Those opposed? Carried.

Mr Sutherland: Mr Chair, I would move that we adjourn for lunch now—I think we've made significant progress on quite a few—and that we reconvene this afternoon.

The Chair: This committee will recess until orders of the day.

The committee recessed at 1204.

AFTERNOON SITTING

The committee resumed at 1603.

The Chair: We'll resume Bill 75, An Act respecting Annexations to the City of London and to certain municipalities in the County of Middlesex, and we'll get on to the amendments, if we can go back and revisit subsection 5(2.1), a government motion. Mr Mills. That one was rewritten.

Mr Mills: Yes. This one was on hold, I believe, right?

The Chair: Yes.

Mr Mills: I move that section 5 of the bill be amended by adding the following subsection after subsection (2):

"By-election to be held

"(2.1) A manually conducted by-election under the Municipal Elections Act to elect one representative of the ward described in clause 2(1)(a) shall be held on or before the 30th day of March, 1993, and the person elected in that by-election shall hold office from the 1st day of April, 1993, until the 30th day of November, 1994."

The Chair: Thank you, Mr Mills. Mr Eddy, are you satisfied with the changes? It's the Liberal motion originally and we've made some changes to it there.

Mr Eddy: I believe counsel has seen it, yes.

The Chair: So you agree to it. Can you withdraw the original motion that you had put forward there?

Mr Eddy: If that's necessary, yes.

Mr Sutherland: This is 5(2.1), correct?

The Chair: Yes.

Mr Sutherland: Okay, I'm sorry. My question's answered. Thank you.

The Chair: All in favour of subsection 5(2.1)? Opposed? Carried.

To go back to another one we have to revisit—it had to be rewritten—that was subsection 12(4) and that was a Liberal motion presented by Mr Eddy. Would you agree with subsection 12(4) the way it stands now, Mr Eddy?

Mr Eddy: Yes.

Mr Grandmaitre: That means that any annexation that comes out of it will be resolved by the OMB.

Mr Mills: That would be the process, yes.

The Chair: Mr Eddy, could you withdraw the original subsection 12(4)?

Mr Eddy: Agreed.

The Chair: All in favour of the new subsection 12(4)? Could you read that out, Mr Mills.

Mr Mills: I move that section 12 of the bill be amended by adding the following subsection:

"Repeal of annexed municipality's amendment

"(4) The procedures set out in part III of the Planning Act for adopting an official plan amendment apply with necessary modifications to an annexing municipality repealing an amendment to an official plan adopted by the council of a municipality from which land is annexed but which amendment has not yet been approved on the 31st day of December, 1992."

The Chair: Any discussion? Ready for the vote? All those in favour? All those opposed? Carried.

We go on to Liberal motion subsection 19(2).

Mr Eddy: Clause 19(2)(a) withdrawn.

Mr Ferguson: Gee, I was going to support that one.

The Chair: Mr Eddy, if you can withdraw subsection 19(1), because it's already been passed in subsections 19(1) and 19(2) of a government motion.

Mr Eddy: Which one?

The Chair: Subsection 19(1). Remember we had the two subsections, 19(1) and 19(2)?

Mr Eddy: Yes.

The Chair: So you withdraw. Thanks, Mr Eddy. We go on to another Liberal motion, clause 19(2)(a).

Mr Eddy: I withdrew that just a few minutes ago.

The Chair: That one's withdrawn too?

Mr Eddy: Yes. That's gone.

The Chair: Subsection 19(3), Liberal motion.

Mr Eddy: I move that subsection 19(3) of the bill be amended by adding at the end "and whether or not an employee who became a city employee under subsection (1) or (2) was fairly placed."

I don't know how that fits in now with what we've done.

The Chair: Yes, with what we've done now. So you withdraw that motion?

Mr Eddy: Yes.

The Chair: Mrs Mathysen, do you withdraw your motion?

Mrs Mathysen: Can I have some clarification so I can fully understand how it fits in terms of the motions passed? I think it's a concern that employees be fairly placed and that their needs be met.

The Chair: If I'm not mistaken, it was offering the job. We'll let the ministry answer on that.

Mr Mills: First of all, you can't define "fairly placed" anyway. We can't define it.

The Chair: We go on to subsection 19. Did you withdraw your motion there, Mrs Mathysen? Okay, fine.

Subsection 19(5.1), a government motion.

1610

Mr Mills: I move that section 19 of the bill be amended by adding the following subsection after subsection (5):

"Volunteer firefighters

"(5.1) Every person who was a volunteer firefighter, as defined in the Fire Departments Act, of the town of Westminster on the 31st day of December, 1992, becomes a volunteer firefighter of the city of London on the 1st day of January, 1993."

This new provision allows Westminster's volunteer firefighters, as at December 31, 1992, to continue to provide volunteer firefighting services to the city of London. The Westminster volunteer firefighters sought this provision, and the city of London fire department has agreed to it.

The Chair: Any discussion?

Mrs Mathysen: I have just one question. I wonder how it will work when you have firefighters for the city of London who are paid and firefighters for the city of London who are not paid. Will that create problems?

Mr Mills: They've developed an integration program, and the union has agreed to it, the firefighters agreed to it. Everybody's happy.

Mr Grandmaître: Does that mean they will be paid?

Mr Mills: No. Only the original chief will be paid. He's the captain. The others are not, and it's all agreed to.

The Chair: There are a lot of cities in Ontario that have a full-time fire department plus volunteers.

We'll have the vote on it here. All in favour? Those opposed? None opposed? Carried.

We go on to Liberal motion, subsection 19(6).

Mr Eddy: I move that subsection 19(6) of the bill be struck out and the following substituted:

"Rights of employees

"(6) A person who becomes an employee of the city or a local board thereof under subsection (1), (2) or (4) shall,

"(a) receive a salary or wage at a rate no less than the person was receiving on the day this act receives royal assent;

"(b) be credited for all purposes with the same seniority that he or she had on the 31st day of December, 1992; and

"(c) be employed for the same number of hours a week as in the position he or she held on the 31st day of December, 1992."

The Chair: Discussion?

Mr Mills: I'd like to speak to the amendment before offering the government motion. As far as (a) is concerned, the government motion is better than that one; as far as (b) is concerned, it's the same; as far as (c) is concerned, the ministry sees this as being problematic, 36 hours and 40 hours and things like that. Those are the problems.

The Chair: So we'll have a vote on subsection 19(6). All those in favour?

Mr Sutherland: Sorry. We're voting on Mr Eddy's 19(6)?

The Chair: Yes, Mr Eddy's. All those in favour? All those opposed? Defeated.

Ms Mathysen's motion, which read the same, is defeated also.

Mr Mills, subsection 19(6), an amendment to the bill.

Mr Mills: I move that subsection 19(6) of the bill be struck out and the following substituted:

"Salary or wage

"(6) A person who becomes an employee of the city or a local board thereof under subsection (1), (2) or (4) shall,

"(a) receive a salary or wage at a rate no less than the person was receiving on the day before the person began his or her employment with the city or a local board thereof under subsection (1), (2) or (4); and

"(b) be credited with the same seniority that he or she had on the day before the person began his or her employment with the city or a local board thereof under subsection (1), (2) or (4).

"Salary, etc, reduced for cause

"(6.1) Nothing in subsection (6) prevents the city or a local board thereof from reducing or eliminating the salary or wage rate or the seniority of an employee for cause."

That explains that salary and seniority rights for people who become employees of the city of London as a result of the annexation remain what they were prior to annexation. This provision applies regardless of when the people were declared surplus. The amendment does, however, allow an employer the normal right to make adjustments to salaries or seniorities for just cause. Finally, I let you know that this amendment was agreed to by CUPE and Westminster.

The Chair: Discussion?

Mr Ferguson: I would assume that a friendly amendment would be on the last line, "for just cause," rather than just "for cause."

Mrs Mathysen: Again, I would like to put on the record that the representative for the employees of Westminster would like to say they have not agreed. They have some concerns that relate to who determines just cause and to the date and dates, because some employees have anniversary dates that go past April 1 and they are concerned that they will lose salary as a result of Bill 75 and the way it is currently written.

Mr Ferguson: I appreciate and understand the concern expressed, but I think the intent is fairly clear. You know, anybody can challenge any piece of legislation and try to put their own—heaven forbid I say it—spin on it or interpretation, but it's the intent that is being looked at.

I think the intent's fairly clear, that if somebody is transferred from Westminster to the city of London, he should be transferred at the same rate of pay and maintain his seniority. If they're going to be terminated, for whatever reason, there has to be just cause. I would view that just cause would not include the city of London making an arbitrary decision.

Mr Mills: No, not at all.

The Chair: Did we have an amendment there for "just cause?"

Mr Mills: We have no problem with that, to insert after the word "for" in the last paragraph of the motion the word "just."

The Chair: Everybody agrees? All those in favour of the motion with the amendment? Those opposed? Carried.

Liberal motion, subsection 19(7), Mr Eddy.

Mr Eddy: I move that subsection 19(7) of the bill be amended (a) by striking out "may" in the first line and substituting "shall" and (b) by striking out "employee or" in the second line.

This would make it mandatory for the minister to define "retired employee."

The Chair: Discussion?

Mr Mills: The word "may" is the normal wording in legislation such as this. It gives us broad powers to do a whole lot of things. If you insert the word "shall," that's somewhat restrictive.

Clause (b), "by striking out 'employee or' in the second line," this reduces our ability to protect employees, which reduces the ability to protect. If you say, "by striking out 'employee or' in the second line," you've reduced that level of protection. We can't make the regulations that apply to employees if that's out. I mean, you're cutting off employees.

The Chair: All those in favour of the motion?

1620

Mr Mills: You want to cut off the employees? Okay. We want to keep them in.

The Chair: Opposed? Defeated. Ms Mathysen's is the same; it's defeated.

We move on to a Liberal motion, subsections 19(9), (10) and (11).

Mr Eddy: I move that section 19 of the bill be amended by adding the following subsections:

"Arbitrator appointed

"(9) The Minister of Municipal Affairs may, upon the application of the city or local board thereof or an employee, appoint an arbitrator to determine whether or not the city is meeting its obligations under subsection (6) in any particular case.

"Decision final

"(10) The decision of the arbitrator is final.

"Definition

"(11) In this section, 'employee' means a full-time, part-time, permanent part-time or contract employee or a volunteer firefighter."

This is for employee protection.

The Chair: Discussion?

Mr Mills: Subsections (9) and (10) have already been done in our government motion, and under "Definition" we find that there's less flexibility to define in regulations for special situations. You know, we don't really know what the situations are going to be, so if we define it here, there's less flexibility to do that in the regulations subsequent to this, and it's not recommended by the ministry to do that.

The Chair: Any further discussion?

Mr Sutherland: So what you're saying is that under this definition, not all categories of employee may be covered.

Ms Neumann: We're just not sure. We think they all are, but we're not sure. We think that under your definition, they probably all are, but we're not sure.

Mr Mills: So we need that flexibility.

Mr Ferguson: I agree. What you don't have in here—I don't know specifically how London operates, but you don't have, for example, temporary full-time employees. I mean, municipalities have temporary full-time employment for 10 months of the year. Rather than getting caught up in a situation, it makes sense to delete that.

Mr Mills: This gives us flexibility, in special situations, in the regulations.

The Chair: All those in favour of the amendment? Those opposed? Defeated. Also, Ms Mathysen's is defeated also; it's the same.

We're still on subsections 19(9), (10) and (11).

Mr Mills: I move that section 19 of the bill be amended by adding the following subsections:

"Conflict with OLRB order

"(9) In the event of a conflict between subsection (6) or a regulation made under subsection (7) and an order of the Ontario Labour Relations Board under the Labour Relations Act, the subsection or regulation prevails.

"Arbitrator appointed

"(10) The Minister of Municipal Affairs may, upon the application of the city or a local board thereof, an employee or a bargaining agent, appoint an arbitrator to hear and determine whether or not subsection (6) or a regulation made under subsection (7) is being properly applied in any particular case.

"Decision final

"(11) The decision of the arbitrator is final."

I'd just like to make a comment. This motion adds subsections (9), (10) and (11) to section 19 of the bill and reflects discussions between the minister and employee organizations and has the concurrence of the Ministry of Labour. To maximize flexibility regarding security of benefits, the amendment ensures that regulations made under Bill 75 take precedence over an order of the Ontario Labour Relations Board under the Labour Relations Act. The amendment also provides for an arbitration process in the event of a concern with the application of the minister's regulation.

The Chair: Further discussion? All those in favour of the motion? All those opposed? Carried.

We move on to the Liberal motion to section 20.

Mr Eddy: Withdrawn, thank you.

The Chair: Withdrawn? Section 21, Liberal motion.

Mr Eddy: I move that section 21 of the bill be struck out and the following substituted:

"London PUC continued

"21(1) The public utilities commission for the city of London is continued and shall consist of five persons of whom the head of the council of the city shall be one by virtue of his or her office and, subject to the results of the referendum under subsection 21(5), the others shall be elected by general vote at the elections held under the Municipal Elections Act.

"Same

"(2) The public utilities commission for the city shall be deemed to be a commission established under part III of the Public Utilities Act and a municipal commission within the meaning of the Power Corporation Act."

This allows for the election of PUCs.

The Chair: Discussion?

Mr Mills: The ministry doesn't support this amendment because it's going to be an appointed board and that is in common with many other municipalities.

The Chair: Any further discussion?

Mr Grandmaitre: Can you give me examples?

Mr Mills: Yes. Do you want examples?

Interjections.

Mr Mills: Okay? Are you happy?

Mr Grandmaître: Yes.

The Chair: Do they—

Mr Mills: No. They don't want to. We can, but—
Interjection.

Mr Mills: You want to know?

Interjection: Yes, please.

Mr Mills: Okay. I call forward the appropriate staff person, if someone has got that on the tip of his tongue.

Mr Gray: I don't know if I have it on the tip of my tongue. I know there are a small number of private bills individual PUCs have got to make their commissions appointed. I don't know how many are there. I have seen them and they're generally small municipalities. I know in some of the regions, when the regions were created, their hydro-electric commissions did provide them with the option either to appoint or elect. They had to choose within a specified time which way they wanted to go and some of them no doubt did choose to go the appointed route. I can't tell you which ones they are at this moment.

Mr Eddy: Is the gentleman saying that in all cases it's been local option whether it's appointed or not?

The Chair: It sounds like it. The Chair hears it that way.

Mr Eddy: Is that what I hear?

Mr Sutherland: I know from the standing committee on private bills and regulations that we've had some before that have decided to switch.

Mr Eddy: Local option is the point I'm making.

The Chair: I think Burlington was one.

Mr Sutherland: But I think they have to come here and get approval to switch it.

Mr Eddy: But the point is it's the local elected council responsible to the people that has decided in some way that it wants to change the system.

The Chair: Correct.

Mr Grandmaître: So you need special legislation?

The Chair: Yes.

Mr Sutherland: You need a private bill.

Mr Ferguson: I think it's part of the Municipal Act. The Municipal Act gives the council the local option.

Interjections.

Mr Eddy: The Power Corporation Act indeed covers the formation, I believe, of hydro-electric commissions and public utilities commissions. It's decided, as I understand, by the local council, and I feel strongly that is a local decision. In the case of some bills, appointed hydro-electric commissions are used where the commission does not serve the entire municipality, a portion of it, such as a former police village or something like that. I'm familiar with that system, but I think it's been in all cases local option. That's the point I'm trying to make.

The Chair: That's what I hear.

Mr Gray: In this situation, of course, the city is in that situation. They won't be serving the whole of the new city. I just want to point that out. They'll be serving basically the city and the areas in Westminster that have their PUC at the moment.

Mr Mills: I'd just say that this PUC is being dissolved.

Mr Grandmaître: We all know that.

Mr Mills: Yes. This is the difference. You know that?

The Chair: Okay, call the question. All those in favour of the motion will raise their hands. Those opposed? Defeated.

Liberal motion subsection 21(3), Mr Eddy.

Mr Eddy: Withdrawn in view of the previous vote.

1630

The Chair: Government motion, subsection 21(3).

Mr Mills: I move that subclauses 21(3)(a)(i) and (ii) of the bill be struck out and the following substituted:

"(i) one of whom shall be the mayor of the city;

"(ii) four of whom shall be the persons who, on the 31st day of December, 1992, were the elected members of the public utilities commission of the city dissolved under section 20; and

"(iii) one of whom shall be the person who, on the 31st day of December, 1992, was the chair of the public utilities commission of the town of Westminster dissolved under section 20."

By way of comment, the first reading bill said that the five current members of the public utilities commission, including the mayor of the city of London, would sit on the commission until November 1994, but it didn't address the possibility that if there is a new mayor, that person should fill the vacant position on the PUC. This new provision makes for that adjustment.

The Chair: Any questions?

Mr Sutherland: Sorry. You said in your explanation "should fill a vacant position on the PUC." You meant the hydro-electric commission?

Mr Mills: Yes.

Mr Sutherland: Not the PUC. I just want to make sure we're clear.

The Chair: All those in favour of the amendment? Those opposed? Carried.

Liberal motion, subsection 21(4).

Mr Eddy: I move that subsection 21(4) of the bill be amended by striking out "is appointed by the succeeding council" in the sixth and seventh lines and substituting "takes office."

It provides for the election of a PUC.

The Chair: Discussion?

Mr Mills: It's already been addressed. It's going to be an appointed hydro commission.

The Chair: Do you want to withdraw that, Mr Eddy?

Mr Eddy: No. We're very strong on this one. It's the difference between appointed and elected.

The Chair: All those in favour of the motion? All those opposed? Defeated.

Liberal motion, section 21.

Mr Mills: It's the same. It's been decided.

Mr Eddy: I move that section 21 of the bill be amended by adding the following subsection:

"Referendum

"(5) A referendum shall be held during the November 1994 municipal election to determine whether the members of the hydro-electric commission of the city will for future terms be appointed by the succeeding council or directly elected."

Again it comes back to a local option. It's giving the people to determine whether they in fact want to continue with an appointed commission, members appointed by council, or indeed have the opportunity to elect the members to their hydro commission. It comes down to local choice by the three people of the city.

The Chair: Discussion?

Mr Mills: The ministry will not support that amendment. We need and see it all to be under the control of the council and that's why it's appointed.

The Chair: All those in favour of the motion? All those opposed? We still have to vote on that one.

Mr Eddy: I wonder if we'll be proceeding then to eliminate all the elected hydro commissions and the PUCs in Ontario.

The Chair: It's been drawn to my attention Mr Tilson doesn't have a vote.

Mr Sutherland: He doesn't have a vote.

Mr Mills: He's not subbing.

Mr Eddy: Can we extend the privilege to him, as a member of the—

Mr Mills: No. He's got to be subbed in. We had a member here, but he didn't vote either.

The Chair: He wasn't sitting here.

Mr Mills: No, but he could have been.

The Chair: Okay. Liberal motion, section 22, withdrawn.

Liberal motion, section 23.

Mr Eddy: I move that section 23 of the bill be struck out and the following substituted:

"Bylaws and resolutions

"23(1) A bylaw or resolution of the public utilities commission of the town of Westminster dissolved under section 20 pertaining to an area annexed to the city of London shall be deemed to be a bylaw or resolution of the public utilities commission of the city of London and shall remain in force in that area until the earlier of the date it is repealed and the 31st day of December, 1995."

I believe that should read, instead of PUC, "hydro-electric commission."

"Same

"(2) A bylaw or resolution of the public utilities commission of the city of London continued under section 21 shall remain in force in the area of the city, as it existed on the 31st day of December, 1992, until the earlier of the date it is repealed and the 31st day of December, 1995.

"Exception

"(3) Nothing in this section repeals or authorizes the repeal of bylaws or resolutions conferring rights, privileges, franchises, immunities or exemptions that could not have been lawfully repealed by the commission dissolved under section 20 or the commission continued under section 21."

Of course, that refers to a hydro-electric commission, not a PUC of London.

The Chair: Discussion?

Mr Mills: The problem the ministry sees is that we see two rules for the new hydro commission. It may become a problem, as referred to the town of Westminster and London, so we're not prepared to support that. It's a problem, two sets of rules for a new hydro commission.

Mr Eddy: Well, it's covered by the point "until repealed." The new hydro commission will have the authority, I understand, to repeal any bylaw, resolution etc that has been passed by the former PUC of the town of Westminster. I think that's what it's all about, so it continues until it's repealed. I'm not sure whether, given the new hydro commission, you have absolute authority but it's normal to continue things until they are repealed. Is it covered perhaps in some other place?

Mr Mills: I guess to identify it. It's a problem, but we don't really understand or know what sort of problem it is at this moment. But we see it as a problem. It could be.

Mr Eddy: I could compare it then—when a municipality's restructured and several municipalities are put together, usually the bylaws and resolutions in force in those particular areas remain in force until there's something changed overall. That's the purpose of it. Whether the wording is absolutely correct or not—oh, it did come from legal counsel. Legal counsel could comment on that one, or do you want to leave it tabled?

Mr Mills: Until when?

The Chair: Until later.

Mr Eddy: We agree with the parliamentary assistant. It's based on the point of continuing a PUC in the city of London. However, I would ask that it be reviewed, what happens in the case of the hydro commission where there are rules and regulations etc in the town, how they'll be continued. I'll just leave it with you.

The Chair: So you're going to withdraw that motion.

Mr Eddy: Yes, sir.

1640

The Chair: Okay, thank you, Mr Eddy.

Government motion, section 23.1, Mr Mills.

Mr Mills: I move that the bill be amended by adding the following section after section 23:

"Powers under special acts

"23.1 The provisions in any special act relating to the public utilities commissions of the town of Westminster and the city of London dissolved under section 20, in so far as the provisions of the special act are not in conflict with the provisions of this act, continue in force, and the powers conferred by the special act may be exercised,

“(a) by the hydro-electric power commission of the city established under subsection 21(1) if they relate to the distribution and supply of electrical power;

“(b) by the city or local board thereof if they relate to the production, treatment, distribution and supply of water or if they relate to parks and recreation.”

This motion deals with the new London hydro-electric commission. It will add section 23.1 to the bill that is currently drafted.

As currently drafted, Bill 75 restricts the right of the new London hydro-electric commission to the rights which exist in general legislation, like the Power Corporation Act. Any rights which exist now under special legislation were not continued. The city has asked that any special powers the former public utilities commission may have had related to hydro, parks, and recreation and water be continued. This motion will continue these hydro-related rights for the new commission and any parks, recreation and water rights for the city. No new rights are being provided. The amendment only deals with existing rights.

The Chair: Discussion? I guess we're ready to vote. All those in favour of the motion? Those opposed? Carried.

Government motion, subsections 24(1) and (2).

Mr Mills: I move that subsections 24(1) and (2) of the bill be struck out and the following substituted:

“Employees

“24(1) The city of London or a local board thereof, as agreed upon by the city and its local boards, shall offer to employ every person who was employed by the public utilities commission of the town of Westminster and the public utilities commission of the city on the 31st day of December, 1992.

“Salary or wage

“(2) A person who becomes an employee of the city or local board thereof under subsection (1) shall,

“(a) receive a salary or wage at a rate no less than the person was receiving on the day before the person began his or her employment with the city or a local board thereof under subsection (1); and

“(b) be credited with the same seniority that he or she had on the day before the person began his or her employment with the city or a local board thereof under subsection (1).

“Salary, etc, reduced for cause

“(2.1) Nothing in subsection (2) prevents the city or a local board thereof from reducing or eliminating the salary or wage rate or the seniority of an employee for cause.”

Perhaps we should amend that, as we did the other one, by inserting after “for” the word “just” cause.

This offers employment to be extended to all employees of the city of London's and the town of Westminster's public utilities commissions as at December 31, 1992.

The first reading bill required that London and Westminster PUC staff, as of April 1, 1992, all be provided with job offers from the city. The proposed amendment will require the city to offer jobs to employees of the PUCs as of year's end. Salaries and seniority rights for PUC employees who become employees of the city of London as a result of the annexation remain what they were prior to annexation. The amendment, however, does allow an employer the normal right to make adjustments to salaries or seniority for just cause.

The Vice-Chair (Mr Kimble Sutherland): Okay. Any discussion?

Mr Eddy: Could counsel comment on “just cause”? Does that include such things as positions being declared redundant, or a surplus of employees in a certain—

Ms Susan Klein: If you're looking at me, I'm not sure about the employment law, but I see the counsel for the ministry coming forward.

Mr Gray: “Just cause” is certainly a term that the courts have defined any number of times. What it means is that somebody is worthy of discipline. It doesn't mean your job is redundant or you decide to get out of a certain area of activity.

Mrs Mathysen: Can I take it then that employees will be provided with counsel, legal help, in the case that the city of London did try to reduce their salary and seniority?

The Vice-Chair: Who would care to comment on that?

Mr Mills: It's probably the union that would provide that representation.

Mrs Mathysen: That would include all the non-unionized employees brought in? Everyone would be safe and protected?

Mr Mills: But I think the union will only protect the membership, if I'm correct.

The Vice-Chair: I think the assumption would be that those who aren't necessarily protected now, who would have to get their own counsel, would still have to get their own counsel otherwise.

Mr Mills: I think you do that in the general workplace.

Mr Ferguson: Just in response to the member for London-Middlesex's concern—

Mrs Mathysen: No, Middlesex. The London-Middlesex—

Mr Ferguson: I'm sorry, Middlesex. Maybe to her concern, the minister, by regulation, I think has the power under the act to provide for the security of employment and protection of employees. We have to assume certain things in this bill, and I think it's safe to assume that if the city—there's been no indication at this point that it is going to act in an arbitrary fashion, but if it does, the minister will be able to exercise his powers.

The Vice-Chair: Seeing no other comments at this time, I'll put the question. All those in favour? All those opposed? Carried.

Moving on, subsections 24(5), (6) and (7).

Mr Mills: I move that section 24 of the bill be amended by adding the following subsections:

“Conflict with OLRB order

“(5) In the event of a conflict between subsection (2) or a regulation made under subsection (3) and an order of the Ontario Labour Relations Board under the Labour Relations Act, the subsection or regulation prevails.

"Arbitrator appointed"

"(6) The Minister of Municipal Affairs may, upon the application of the city or a local board thereof, an employee or a bargaining agent, appoint an arbitrator to hear and determine whether or not subsection (2) or a regulation made under subsection (3) is being properly applied in any particular case.

"Decision final"

"(7) The decision of the arbitrator is final."

These are the same provisions that apply to municipal employees in a previous—

The Chair: Motion.

Mr Mills: Motion, yes. I had a mind block there for a minute.

The Chair: Any discussion? All those in favour of the motion? Opposed? Carried.

Mr Eddy, Liberal motion, subsection 26(1).

Mr Eddy: Withdrawn.

The Chair: Mr Eddy, Liberal motion, subsection 26(2.1).

Mr Eddy: I move section 26 of the bill be amended by adding the following subsection after subsection (2):

"Same"

"(2.1) The city shall pass a bylaw by the 31st day of December, 2002, adding all the lands described in clause 2(1)(a) to the area of the hydro-electric power commission of the city to distribute and supply power."

1650

The Chair: Discussion?

Mr Mills: This amendment won't be supported by the ministry. It just forces them to do what they're going to do earlier, that's all.

Mr Eddy: It's covered in the bill?

Mr Mills: It's going to be covered.

Mr Sutherland: To clarify, they already have to do that before that date; is that what you're saying?

Mr Mills: It forces them into a timetable—that's what it does—that might not be appropriate.

The Chair: All in favour of the motion? Opposed? Defeated.

Liberal motion, subsection 26(21).

Mr Eddy: Withdrawn.

The Chair: Liberal motion, subsection 26(22).

Mr Eddy: Withdrawn.

The Chair: Subsection 26(23).

Mr Eddy: Withdrawn.

The Chair: Liberal motion, subsection 26(27).

Mr Eddy: Withdrawn.

The Chair: Government motion, clause 26(27)(b).

Mr Mills: I move that clause 26(27)(b) of the bill be amended by striking out "of the hydro-electric power commission of the city" in the eighth and ninth lines.

This is a technical amendment which deletes superfluous information related to the expansion of the service area.

The Chair: Discussion? All those in favour? Opposed? Carried.

Liberal motion, subsection 27(1).

Mr Eddy: Withdrawn.

The Chair: Liberal motion, section 29.

Mr Eddy: I move that section 29 of the bill be struck out and the following substituted:

"Official plan"

"(1) The city of London, before the 1st day of January, 1996, or such later date as may be prescribed by the Minister of Municipal Affairs, shall prepare, adopt and forward to the minister for approval an official plan,

"(a) to cover all of the lands within the city; and

"(b) to include policies or land use designations to replace policies and land use designations in the official plan of the city prescribed by the minister.

"Regulations"

"(2) The Minister of Municipal Affairs may by regulation prescribe,

"(a) a later date by which the city of London shall prepare, adopt and forward to the minister for approval an official plan for the purpose of subsection (1); and

"(b) policies and land use designations for the purpose of clause (1)(b)."

It just adds additional criteria.

The Chair: Discussion?

Mr Mills: Most of the amendment by Mr Eddy—well, (2)(a) and (b) are already done in our government motion, but to change the other one would require a complete new official plan. Of course, once you do that, everything could be appealed to the OMB, including everything we've done here today. Anything that's currently before the OMB could be appealed. There would have to be a whole new official plan, and they've just done one and it's before Municipal Affairs at this moment.

Mrs Mathysen: So you're saying that the agricultural land will be protected? You mentioned regulations. I have a question. When are the regulations that will accompany this bill going to be ready, the regulations that will protect land?

Mr Mills: As we sit here, it's being worked on right now.

Mrs Mathysen: When will they be ready?

Mr Mills: I can't foretell that. I know they're being worked on at the moment. It all depends.

Ms Neumann: Hopefully very soon.

Mr Mills: Immediately, if not forthwith.

Mrs Mathysen: Because I'm aware of legislation that was supposed to have regulations to accompany it which is currently on the books, and regulations have not been forthcoming. So I want to know that these are forthcoming as soon as possible, absolutely, no question.

Mr Mills: They are. Unequivocally.

Mrs Mathysen: You guarantee it?

Mr Mills: Guaranteed. Cross my heart. Everything.

Mrs Mathysen: Signed in blood—and trust me, I draw blood.

The Chair: All in favour of this motion? All those opposed? Defeated, and also Ms Mathysen's amendment, which is the same.

We go on to section 29, the government motion.

Mr Mills: I move that section 29 of the bill be struck out and the following substituted:

"Official plan required

"29(1) The city of London, before the 1st day of January, 1996, or such later date as may be prescribed by the Minister of Municipal Affairs, shall prepare, adopt and forward to the minister for approval an official plan that covers or includes,

"(a) all of the lands annexed to the city by this act;

"(b) all or part of the land that formed the city on the 31st day of December, 1992, as designated by the minister; and

"(c) policies and land use designations to replace certain policies and land use designations in the official plan of the city that is in effect on the 31st day of December, 1992, as designated by the minister.

"Idem

"(2) The minister may by regulation,

"(a) prescribe a date for the purpose of subsection (1);

"(b) designate lands for the purpose of clause (1)(b); and

"(c) designate policies and land use designations for the purpose of clause (1)(c)."

By way of explanation, the first reading bill stipulated that the new official plan for the total enlarged London area be prepared by January 1, 1995. The city has asked for more time to prepare a new official plan, so the deadline has been extended one year, to January 1, 1996.

Also, because the city of London has worked on a comprehensive official plan very recently, the coverage of the new official plan has been made clearer so that the city can keep some aspects of that official plan.

The Chair: Discussion?

Mrs Mathysen: I find this a bit confusing. It seems to me that you're creating two official plans, one for the current city and one for the annexed area. Is that what you are doing?

Mr Mills: Yes, that's true. Except for some amendments to the current plan, what you said is true.

Mrs Mathysen: How will this be beneficial? I'm confused, because it was my understanding that all this land was to be annexed so that London could have room for massive planning and good planning. And two official plans are going to do this, they're going to effect this wonderful planning?

Mr Mills: It doesn't necessarily follow that we want everything in the old official plan to be changed. Some of the stuff is good.

Mrs Mathysen: Have you been to London?

Mr Sutherland: I just want to clarify. First of all, we have a current official plan. The city has gone through a process to develop a new official plan. Has that new official plan been ratified?

Mr Mills: No.

Mr Sutherland: But work has been done on that, and then you've got the official plan for the enlarged area?

Mr Mills: That's right.

Mr Sutherland: So we're really talking three different elements: the current official plan, the one they've done the work on and then one for the enlarged.

Ms Neumann: The one that's had work done on it is currently at the OMB; the point is not to have that whole OMB process repeated.

Mrs Mathysen: It will be the divine official plan when it's done. Is this what you're saying?

Ms Neumann: It can be amended as necessary, but we won't require them to amend the whole thing, which means it could all be back at the OMB for another year-long hearing.

1700

Mr Ferguson: My only question about the government motion is the option for the Minister of Municipal Affairs that it may be extended. I just wonder where the impetus is to have it completed by 1996 if in fact the minister can arbitrarily extend the deadline for an official plan. Under the current Planning Act—I haven't memorized the Planning Act—does that kind of discretionary power lie with the minister?

Ms Neumann: They can take as long as they like now.

Mr Ferguson: Under the Planning Act.

Ms Neumann: They can take 20 years to do one plan.

Mr Ferguson: What's being suggested here is that provided the minister says, "Yes, that's okay, we'll give you a couple of more years," they can take 20 years as well.

Ms Neumann: I think we're just worried about a couple of more months, if we got that. We've got no intention of extending it.

Mr Sutherland: You said about the one before the OMB now and about one for the enlarged area. In Ms Mathysen's question it was implied that there are almost two plans. What can be amended out of the one before the OMB, of course, would be the protections we put in here. For example, the social plan: If they haven't developed any social planning in the current one, they have to go back and make accommodation for that, environmental planning etc, the protections here.

Ms Neumann: Yes.

Mr Sutherland: Okay.

The Chair: All those in favour of the amendment, put up their hands.

Mr Mills: Which amendment? What are we talking about?

The Chair: Section 29, on the government motion. What have we got? Those opposed? One? You're not opposed, or—

Mr Eddy: I see the advantage. It's a lot of work to do the city of London official plan. There are some good things, I hope, in it.

Mr Mills: Incredible as it may be—

The Chair: Okay, it's carried. Go ahead.

Mr Mills: I was going to say, the book is fat and it's 5 o'clock.

The Chair: I have a hard time counting votes by expressions on faces.

Government motion, subsection 30(2).

Mr Mills: I move that subsection 30(2) of the bill be amended by striking out "the official plan" in the first and second lines and substituting "an official plan."

It's a technical amendment reflecting the fact that under section 29 more than one official plan will cover the city.

The Chair: All those in favour of the government motion? Okay, carried.

Government motion, subsection 31(1).

Mr Mills: I move that subsection 31(1) of the bill be amended (a) by striking out "section 29" in the second line and substituting "clause 29(1)(a)," and (b) by striking out "the lands annexed to the city" in the seventh line and substituting "the lands to which this subsection applies."

By way of explanation, the first reading bill specified that until the city's new official plan is approved no building permits can be issued for annexed land that is not fully serviced. This proposed amendment is technical, resulting from proposed changes to section 29 regarding official plan coverages in the city.

The Chair: Discussion? All those in favour of the government motion? Opposed? Carried.

Government motion, subsection 31(2).

Mr Mills: I move that subsection 31(2) of the bill be struck out and the following substituted:

"Application

"(2) Subsection (1) applies to the following lands:

"1. The lands in the city of London, formerly in the town of Westminster, consisting of part of lots 14 to 20 in Concession IV and part of lots 13 to 18 in Concession III and designated 'special commercial,' 'commercial' or 'industrial' in the city of London official plan in effect on the 1st day of January, 1993.

"2. The lands in the city of London, formerly in the town of Westminster, consisting of part of lots 19 to 26 in Concession III and part of lots 30 to 36 in Concession II and designated 'special commercial,' 'commercial,' 'industrial' or 'industrial special policy area' in the city of London official plan in effect on the 1st day of January, 1993.

"3. The lands in the city of London, formerly in the town of Westminster, consisting of part of lots 68 to 73 in Concession West of Talbot Road and part of lots 68 to 73 in Concession East of Talbot Road and designated 'commercial' or 'residential' in the city of London official plan in effect on the 1st day of January, 1993.

"4. The lands in the city of London, formerly in the township of London, consisting of part of lot 24 in Concession II, part of lots 24 to 26 in Concession III, part of lots 24 to 26 in Concession IV and part of lot 25 in Concession V and designated 'hamlet,' 'industrial' or 'highway commercial' in the city of London official plan in effect on the 1st day of January, 1993.

"Regulations

"(2.1) The Minister of Municipal Affairs may by regulation prescribe,

"(a) additional lands to which subsection (1) applies;

"(b) any land included in subsection (2) to which subsection (1) shall no longer apply; and

"(c) any land uses to which subsection (1) shall apply."

By way of explanation, this proposed amendment specifies what lands are affected by the development restrictions mentioned in subsection 31(1). The restrictions apply only to land presently designated for urban types of development. This is to prevent sprawl-type, privately serviced development, which has led to health and environmental problems in the past. These areas were agreed upon as part of the transition exercise.

An additional clause has been added that allows the minister to prescribe other lands in the annexed area that would be subject to the same restrictions, land identified in subsection 31(2), where the restrictions would be lifted on any specific land uses to which subsection 31(2) applies.

The Chair: Discussion? All those in favour of the government motion? Opposed? Carried.

Liberal motion, subsection 31(2.1), Mr Eddy.

Mr Eddy: I move that section 31 of the bill be amended by adding the following subsection after subsection (2):

"Same

"(2.1) Despite subsection (1), building permits may be issued for the construction of accessory buildings, internal renovations, replacement of a structure damaged by fire, wind or similar causes beyond the owner's control and for any construction that does not add any additional loadings to existing septic operations."

This expands on the exceptions listed in the bill with respect to the issuing of building permits. I'm not sure whether it's covered or not already.

Mr Mills: I believe the member for Middlesex has an improved amendment of this, if she'd like to read it.

Mrs Mathyssen: Yes, with all due respect, I would like to move subsection 31(2.2). It's a renumbering.

I move that section 31 of the bill be amended by adding the following subsection after subsection (2):

"Same

"(2.2) Despite subsection (1), building permits may be issued for the construction of accessory buildings, internal renovations, replacement of a building damaged by fire, wind or similar causes beyond the owner's control and for any construction that can be adequately serviced by a sewage system existing on the 31st day of December, 1992."

Quite simply, it's to ensure that people in rural areas needing accessory buildings or who, through no fault of their own, have suffered damage by fire or wind or who are in fact renovating aren't penalized or prevented from doing what is necessary.

The Chair: Would you withdraw your motion?

Mr Eddy: Yes. This is better.

The Chair: Okay. Discussion on the amendment?

Mr Mills: The ministry can support this amendment.

The Chair: All those in favour of subsection 31(2.2), Ms Mathyssen's motion? Carried.

Government motion, subsection 31(3).

1710

Mr Mills: I move that subsection 31(3) of the bill be amended by striking out "section 29" in the second line and substituting "clause 29(1)(a)."

By way of explanation, in the first reading of the bill, section 31(3) states: "Until the official plan...is approved, the city" of London "shall not extend its water or sanitary sewage systems or assume ownership and responsibility for the operation of a water or sanitary sewage system that will service any of the lands annexed to the city without the approval of the Minister of Municipal Affairs." The above provision remains, but there is a need for this consequential amendment to reflect a newly numbered subsection.

The Chair: Discussion? All those in favour? Opposed? Carried.

Ms Mathyssen, subsection 31(4).

Mrs Mathyssen: I move that section 31 of the bill be amended by adding the following subsection:

"Exception

"(4) Despite subsection (3), the city may extend its water and sanitary sewage systems to provide the services as set out in section 2.1 without the approval of the Ministry of Municipal Affairs."

My concern here is that there are some areas in the newly annexed areas that are in need of sewage remediation and they must be remediated, specifically Southwinds and Canterbury Estates; also, of course, the area in Arva. So I need assurances that nothing within the bill would preclude the remediation necessary there.

The Chair: Ms Mathyssen, at the very end, it said, "without the approval of the Minister"? You said "Ministry." Do you mean "Minister"?

Mrs Mathyssen: I'm sorry, I didn't realize I said "Ministry."

The Chair: Okay, the "Minister of Municipal Affairs." Discussion?

Mr Mills: I'd like to comment that they can do this now with the permission of the minister, but if this amendment were to go ahead, it would provide, in the ministry's opinion, for substantial development in the annexed area prior to the new official plan coming into force and would conflict with the need to study appropriate land uses and densities in the annexed area. For that reason, we will not support it.

Mr Eddy: The very reason for the January 1, 1993, deadline and the fact that we're rushing to complete this bill so it can indeed be presented for third reading in the House is so that certain developments can proceed. I understood the rush is simply because the city has on hold certain developments it needs and wants. It's the whole reason for the hurried agenda and this would stifle that, it seems to me.

Mr Mills: That's not quite correct. This can happen now with the minister's approval.

Mr Eddy: Oh, with the minister's approval?

Mr Mills: Yes.

The Chair: Okay, all those in favour of Ms Mathyssen's motion? Those opposed? Defeated. The Liberal motion, which was worded the same, is defeated also.

Government motion, clause 32(a).

Mr Mills: I move that clause 32(a) of the bill be amended by striking out "section 29" in the second and third lines and substituting "clause 29(1)(a)."

The reason? It's a consequential amendment to reflect the newly numbered subsection.

The Chair: Discussion? All those in favour of the government motion? Opposed? Carried.

Government motion, subsection 32(2).

Mr Mills: I move that section 32 of the bill be amended by adding the following subsection:

"Exception

"(2) The Minister of Municipal Affairs may by regulation designate lands or uses to which this section does not apply."

By way of explanation, as in the first reading of the bill, section 32 doesn't allow for any redesignation of agricultural land to other uses for 10 years from the date of the approval of the new official plan of the city of London.

The proposed subsection 32(2) allows the Minister of Municipal Affairs by regulation to designate lands or land uses to which this provision does not apply in the agricultural area. This is intended to allow for minor amendments that would reflect land uses typical of an agricultural area, as well as for any specific economic renewal opportunities. This proposed amendment derives from suggestions made by local municipalities as part of the transition exercise.

The Chair: Discussion?

Mr Eddy: I had a question. I'm not quite clear. It had to do with the explanation from the parliamentary assistant and it was for buildings and agricultural land and renewal.

The Chair: Economic renewal?

Mr Eddy: There's a lot more than agricultural land. There are many hamlet areas etc.

Mrs Mathyssen: I understand this is to allow for agriculturally related practices, like a dryer or a repair shop. I have a question. Are these subject to regulations under the Planning Act?

Mr Mills: No, they're under this act.

Ms Neumann: What's the question?

Mrs Mathyssen: Are these subject to regulations under the Planning Act?

Mr Mills: Agriculture and things like that, you mean?

Ms Neumann: This is meant to allow for an official plan amendment that's unforeseen but would be a normal use in an agricultural area, such as a tractor dealership that hadn't been foreseen and that we would have the power to permit. Otherwise, the official plan prevails in the area. So most agricultural uses would be permitted as a right and don't require any ministerial approval.

Mrs Mathyssen: Usually these things are done by zoning?

Ms Neumann: Yes. Most things would be approved by the existing zoning, would be permitted under the existing rural and agricultural zoning. This is just to allow further minor changes.

Mrs Mathysen: It just seems that in many of these there's a double-edged sword. There's a fear of abuses, and I guess I need to know that there won't be abuses.

The Chair: All those in favour of the government motion? Those opposed? Carried.

We have a Liberal motion on section 33. I move that—oh, go ahead, Mr Eddy.

Mr Mills: Don't get carried away.

Mr Eddy: I'd be pleased to have you do that.

I move that section 33 of the bill be struck out.

This section eliminates or disallows the townships of Delaware, Lobo, London, North Dorchester and West Nissouri from issuing building permits.

The Chair: Discussion?

Mr Mills: We've got a better motion coming.

The Chair: All those in favour of the motion? Those opposed? Defeated.

Also, Mrs Mathysen's, which is the same, is defeated.

We'll go on to subsection 33(3).

Mr Mills: I move that subsection 33(3) of the bill be struck out and the following substituted:

"Building permits withheld by township

"(3) The chief building official of a township shall not issue a building permit for the construction of a building on any of the lands in the township designated by the minister under subsection (2) unless,

"(a) the building is for the purpose of a land use that conforms with the official plan of the township in effect on the 1st day of January, 1993; or

"(b) the building is for the purpose of a land use that is prescribed by the minister.

"Regulation, land uses

"(3.1) The minister may by regulation prescribe land uses for the purpose of clause (3)(b)."

1720

By way of explanation, the proposed subsection 33(3) states:

"The chief building official of a township shall not issue a building permit for the construction of a building on any of the lands in the township designated by the minister—of Municipal Affairs—"under subsection (2) unless,

"(a) the building is for the purpose of a land use that conforms with the official plan of the township in effect on the 1st day of January, 1993; or

"(b) the building is for the purpose of a land use...prescribed by the minister" of Municipal Affairs.

This proposed amendment also derives from discussions with local municipalities as part of the transition process. It reflects the up-to-date nature of the underlying official plan policies and designations in the affected townships.

The Chair: Discussion? Mr Eddy.

Mr Eddy: I oppose the amendment because I think all property owners should have the right to apply to change designations under the planning process that's in use in the province of Ontario for all property owners.

The Chair: Further discussion? Vote on the motion: All those in favour of the government motion? Those against? Carried.

Government motion, subsection 33(4), Mr Mills.

Mr Mills: I move that subsection 33(4) of the bill be struck out and the following substituted:

"Official plan deemed to conform

"(4) An official plan or an official plan amendment that affects any of the lands designated under subsection (2) and that is approved by the minister or the Ontario Municipal Board shall be deemed to be in conformity with any regulation made under subsection (3.1) that is in force on the day of the approval."

By way of explanation, this section confirms that a regulation made by the Minister of Municipal Affairs under clause 33(3)(b) conforms to any official plans approved after the regulation is made.

The Chair: Discussion? All those in favour of the government motion? Those opposed? Carried.

Mr Mills: Come on, Ron, this is your moment.

Mr Eddy: I had it a long time ago.

The Chair: Section 34 is out of order, the motions from the government, Mrs Mathysen and the Liberals.

We go on to government motion, section 36.

Mr Sutherland: What do you mean, they're out of order?

The Chair: We just vote against the section when it comes up in the bill. We haven't voted on the sections yet. I'm just taking direction from the clerk on this one. We have to vote on all the sections, so when it comes through we'll vote at that time.

Mr Eddy: Mr Chair, I move that section 34 of the bill be struck out.

Mr Sutherland: That's what he just ruled out of order.

Mr Eddy: Oh, did he?

Mr Mills: We're going to come back to that one.

The Chair: I'm just taking direction from the clerk on that one, because we're doing it a little bit differently here going through this bill.

Government motion, section 36, Mr Mills.

Mr Mills: I move that section 36 of the bill be amended by striking out the definitions "weighted assessment" and "weighted equalized assessment."

Again, this is a technical amendment. As a result of the deletion of sections 37 and 38, this is no longer required. Technical stuff.

The Chair: Discussion? All those in favour of the government motion? Opposed? Carried.

We'll deal with sections 37 and 38 when we go to clause-by-clause.

We go on to government motion, subsection 39(1), Mr Mills.

Mr Mills: I move that subsection 39(1) of the bill be amended by striking out "Despite section 38" in the first line and substituting "in 1993."

This is due to changes in sections 38 and 47. This section only applies in 1993, so it wouldn't make much sense to have "1992" there.

The Chair: Discussion? All those in favour? Opposed? Carried.

Mr Ferguson: A lot of these are housekeeping items now. I'm wondering, in order to expedite the process, if we could deal with any further concerns that Mr Eddy has or Mrs Mathysen has and then deem that all the other government motions that are before the committee are deemed to have been made.

The Chair: They have to be read, Mr Ferguson.
Liberal motion, subsection 40(1.1), Mr Eddy.

Mr Eddy: I move that section 40 of the bill be amended by adding the following subsection after subsection (1):

"Limitation

"(1.1) For the merged areas, the education levy after 1993 shall not be raised greater than one half the average of the Board of Education for the City of London and the Middlesex County Board of Education levy for three subsequent years."

This provides some protection for the ratepayers in the annexed areas.

The Chair: Discussion. Mr Mills.

Mr Mills: The Ministry of Municipal Affairs cannot support this amendment, because the education levies and education taxes may be continued or changed in the Ministry of Education's apportionment regulations, and the Ministry of Municipal Affairs is not dictating to the Minister of Education or overriding the Education Act. That is why we can't—are you happy with that explanation?

The Chair: Okay. Are we ready for the vote?

Mr Eddy: I was asked a question, so in response I would say I'd rather see this passed, and then if there's something further about education it could affect this.

Mr Mills: Yes, I see.

The Chair: All in favour of this motion? All those opposed? Defeated.

We go on to the government motion on subsection 41(1).

Mr Mills: I move that subsection 41(1) of the bill be struck out. This is a technical amendment. The subsection is no longer required because of changes to section 47.

The Chair: All those in favour? No opposed. Carried.
Government motion, section 42, Mr Mills.

Mr Mills: I move that section 42 of the bill be struck out and the following substituted:

"Apportionment of conservation authority levies

"42. Where this act directly or indirectly affects the relative cost-sharing of conservation authority levies for any municipality outside the county of Middlesex or causes within the county substantial tax shifts between municipalities, property classes or individual properties, the Minister of Municipal Affairs may, in order to minimize such effects, make regulations prescribing an alternative basis of apportionment to that specified under the Conservation Authorities Act."

By way of explanation, the proposed amendment eliminates provisions contained in section 42 of the first reading bill, which dealt with the reassessment of the entire city of London under section 58 of the Assessment Act.

It also adds a section, which would allow the minister to regulate an alternative apportionment to the one specified in the Conservation Authorities Act, but only where relative cost-sharing is affected. This provision will resolve concerns expressed by many municipalities in southwestern Ontario that would have been adversely affected.

The Chair: Discussion? Mr Sutherland.

Mr Sutherland: Could I just ask, in terms of where the status of reapportionment is right now in terms of the conservation authorities: Is that something being discussed through the transition process, or how is that resolved? Does the authority have to do that itself?

Mr Mills: We have just asked staff to make a comment on that.

Dr Kathleen Chinnery: I'm Dr Kathleen Chinnery. I'm from the municipal finance branch. I guess what I can say is that we have received submissions from all the conservation authorities in this area that will be affected by the annexation.

We are looking at the redistribution of the levies that will occur because of changes in the assessment bases of all the municipalities, particularly the contributions that the city of London will make in the future, given its new tax base.

At the moment, we are working with the Ministry of Natural Resources in order that its regulation will reflect the same basis of apportionment as is consistent at this time so that we will make sure there are not significant tax shifts just because of the annexation.

1730

Mr Sutherland: If I could just ask, though, implied with what you said is that the city, with its increased tax base, would therefore get a greater apportionment of that. That would imply some tax shifts downward for the other municipalities who apportion the share, or no?

Dr Chinnery: I guess the concern, for example, of the township of Lobo in the county of Middlesex has been that the basis on which the levies are apportioned is not only the assessment base of a municipality but also the land area of the municipality within that conservation authority. As a result of the shifts in the city of London boundary, the township of Lobo will have to contribute more towards the levy because the city of London's proportion declines. For example, it's a case where the township of Lobo has made it clear to the minister and to ministry staff that it feels it cannot afford additional levies.

Mr Eddy: I'm sorry, I'm at a loss on this one. I can't see why the township of Lobo would have to pay one more cent to the Upper Thames—I think that's the only one in the case of Lobo—because the town of Westminster and so much area is to be annexed into the city. I would have thought that was automatic. What's happening here? Are you saying the formulae have to be changed to recognize the increased assessment of the city, to pay more?

Dr Chinnery: That's right, and it's also the land area of the city, because it's not just based on the amount of assessment; it's based on the proportion of the total land area in the conservation authority, and because those are shifting, we have to alter the apportionment of the levies.

Mr Eddy: So the city will pay its share plus what had been the town of Westminster's share, perhaps?

Dr Chinnery: For example, yes.

The Chair: All those in favour?

Mr Murdoch: Mr Chairman, just a minute. You said the township of Lobo is going to have less land now, right?

Dr Chinnery: No, what I—

Mr Murdoch: They're going to pay more, though, because London's taking land from somewhere else? I can't understand how they could pay more. If nothing happened to them, they shouldn't—

Dr Chinnery: Because conservation authority areas do not coincide with municipal boundaries—

Mr Murdoch: Yes, I know that quite well.

Dr Chinnery: So for example, in the case of the Upper Thames, because of the change in the city of London boundaries, the township of Lobo will have to pay a higher proportion of the total cost because its land area in the conservation authority is more.

Mr Murdoch: In the watershed, you mean, not the conservation authority. The land the conservation authority owns has nothing to do with it.

Dr Chinnery: No, it's the watershed.

Mr Murdoch: That's right. But the township of Lobo hasn't changed in size.

Dr Chinnery: That's right, its tax base has not changed. It has to do with the other municipalities which are contributing to the levy—

Mr Murdoch: But other municipalities are going to have to pay more too then, not just the township of Lobo.

Dr Chinnery: That's right. I was just giving an example of the case of the township of Lobo.

Mr Murdoch: So everybody's going to have to pick up what they're losing from London.

Dr Chinnery: Yes.

Mr Murdoch: Then that's maybe a little better. I just couldn't think why one township would have to pay more.

Dr Chinnery: No, I was just giving that as an example of a township that had made it clear to the minister that it was definitely concerned.

Mr Mills: All this does is straighten it out to make it as it was before. There's no change in anything. It's exactly the same as it was before.

Mr Murdoch: If someone pays more money, there's a change.

Mr Sutherland: My apologies for opening up the issue.

The Chair: Thank you, Mr Sutherland.

Mr Sutherland: There are a few municipalities in my riding that may be affected, so I just wanted it clarified.

The Chair: Okay. After all the discussion, are we ready to vote? All in favour of the government motion? Those opposed? Mr Murdoch?

Mr Mills: You can't sit on the fence.

The Chair: Carried.

The Chair: Ms Mathysen, subsection 43(1).

Mrs Mathysen: I move that subsection 43(1) of the bill be amended by adding at the beginning "Despite any other provision of this act."

Mr Mills: That amendment is not required. The government motions to strike out sections 37 and 38 have already occurred.

The Chair: All those in favour? All those opposed? Defeated, and also the Liberal motion is defeated; same wording.

Government motion, subsection 43(1.1).

Mr Mills: I move that section 43 of the bill be amended by adding the following subsection after subsection (1):

"Idem

"(1.1) In 1993, for the areas annexed under clauses 2(1)(b) to (e), inclusive, the annexing municipality shall, in the manner prescribed by the Minister of Municipal Affairs, levy on the whole of the assessment for real property and business assessment according to the last returned assessment roll pertaining to the area,

"(a) rates of taxation for general purposes which shall be the total of the 1992 rates of taxation in that area for general purposes, increased or decreased by the percentage change in the 1993 own purpose general mill rate of the annexing municipality as compared to the 1992 own general mill rate of the annexing municipality; and

"(b) rates of taxation for county of Middlesex or county of Elgin purposes, as the case may be, which shall be the total of the 1992 rates of taxation in that area for county purposes, increased or decreased by the percentage change in the 1993 county purposes mill rate of the annexing municipality as compared to the 1992 county purposes mill rate of the annexing municipality."

By way of explanation, this amendment extends tax protection measures beyond the city of London. It provides that anyone living in the municipality in Middlesex, directly or indirectly affected by the annexation, won't see their tax rate increase beyond what people in the annexing municipality pay. This applies to annexed municipalities in the county of Middlesex and properties annexed to the village of Belmont in the county of Elgin.

The Chair: Any discussion on the motion? Seeing none, all those in favour of the government motion? Those opposed? Carried.

Government motion, subsection 43(2), Mr Mills.

Mr Mills: I move that subsection 43(2) of the bill be struck out and the following substituted:

"Regulations

"(2) The Minister of Municipal Affairs may by regulation prescribe the manner in which an annexing municipal shall levy rates of taxation for the purposes of subsections (1) and (1.1).

“May be retroactive

“(3) A regulation under subsection (2) may be made retroactive to a date not earlier than the 1st day of January, 1993.”

This amendment prescribes how annexing municipalities will levy rates of taxation for the purposes of subsections (1) and (2).

The Chair: Discussion?

Mr Mills: I beg your pardon, Mr Chairman, there seems to be—that’s why I had trouble pronouncing it. After the word “annexing” in subsection (2), “Regulations,” it says “annexing municipal” and that’s where I got fouled up. It should be “municipality,” and I make that amendment. When I read it, it didn’t sound right.

The Chair: Discussion? Okay.

All those in favour of the government motion? Those opposed? Carried.

1740

Ms Mathysen, subsection 44(1).

Mrs Mathysen: I move that subsection 44(1) of the bill be amended by striking out “may” in the second line and substituting “shall.”

Quite simply, if any of you know the status of the rural community these days, you’ll know that the life on the farm and the amount of money that people make is very limited, so increases in their taxes are going to perhaps preclude them from continuing in the occupation of farming. I believe that if “shall” is substituted for “may,” there is a sense that they will indeed be given the kind of protection that they need so that they can continue and be viable and feed this province.

Mr Mills: Just to speak to that, the word “may,” as we have discussed previously, is the usual legislative term. As well, the minister has stated publicly that he has every intention of extending tax-increase protections for a 10-year period.

The Chair: Discussion?

Mr Eddy: That matter has come up before, and I support the amendment. I recall in the Municipal Act that there’s section after section stating “the council shall,” “the council shall.” It is very common to use the word “shall” in statutes. I support the amendment.

Mr Mills: There’s a difference between municipal “shall” and legislative minister “shall.”

Mr Ferguson: Given the minister’s statement that he’s going to put in the protection, then I assume the ministry wouldn’t object to “shall.”

The Chair: They object. It’s the language.

Mr Mills: Yes, it’s not legislative form. We don’t use that language, believe it or not. We do not use the word “shall.” The usual legislative term is “may.”

Mr Sutherland: Because it’s enabling. If it’s enabling, the word “may” is used.

Mr Mills: That’s right.

Mr Sutherland: The other provisions you talked about where “shall” was used are not enabling in that sense. That’s something you have to follow. This is enabling.

Mr Eddy: All legislation is enabling; some is mandatory and some is permissive, but it’s all enabling, in a sense.

Mr Murdoch: I would like to support Mr Ferguson. He said the minister has said that, so what’s wrong with using it? I certainly could support him.

The Chair: Mr Murdoch, this motion had come up in another clause, and it was already passed that they would use the word “may.” I guess we have to put it to a vote here again.

Mr Murdoch: Well, that’s fine.

The Chair: All those in favour of Miss Mathysen’s motion? Four. Those against? I guess I’ve got to vote on that one. Defeated.

We’re on to government motion, section 44.

Mr Mills: I move that section 44 of the bill be amended as follows:

“1. In subsection (1), by striking out ‘the city of London’ in the fourth line and substituting ‘an annexing municipality’.

“2. In subsection (2), by striking out ‘the city’ in the second line and substituting ‘an annexing municipality’.

“3. In subsection (4), by striking out ‘the city of London’ in the sixth and seventh lines and substituting ‘the annexing municipality’.”

By way of explanation, the proposed amendment to section 44 provides that all municipalities in the county and county tax rates may be protected from 1994 to 2003, inclusive. It will permit the minister to make regulations to limit tax increases in areas annexed to the city of London, municipalities in the county of Middlesex and properties annexed to the village of Belmont in the county of Elgin.

The Chair: Discussion? All those in favour of the government motion? Opposed? Carried.

Mr Sutherland: Mr Chair, on a point of order at this time: As you recall, earlier this morning we talked about the time limits we are faced with in terms of dealing with all these amendments, given the fact that we originally were to have two days to do clause-by-clause, and we gave up one of those days so we could have another day of hearings because there were a great number of groups who wanted to.

I would like to suggest at this time that we go to the amendments, have them read in by each group—Liberal, Ms Mathysen and government—and then vote on them as omnibus in each group to speed up the process. We still have to have section-by-section vote and it is getting on in the day. I would suggest that we do that, read them all in at once from each group, and then vote on them as one.

The Chair: I’ll take direction from the committee, if the committee agrees.

Mr Mills: Agreed.

Mr Eddy: I absolutely disagree. This is a very important bill. So what if we have to go 10 minutes beyond? We’re making good progress. We lost some time at the beginning through all of us wanting to do some other things probably.

The Chair: Carry on the way we are?

Mr Sutherland: Can we now put that to a vote? What are the rules?

Mr Eddy: It's up to the government. We're at the mercy of the government. It's as simple as that.

The Chair: The clerk figures that this is a better and quicker way.

Mr Eddy: The clerk doesn't have a vote.

The Chair: This is what we agreed upon when we started.

Mr Eddy: If you want to have a vote, we'll vote. This here is democracy.

Mr Sutherland: Mr Eddy, earlier today you agreed upon that that basic principle. I'm just trying to help facilitate that principle.

Mr Eddy: Mr Sutherland, it's far too important to cut it off at this stage. We lost time at the beginning. If we'd had that time—and I was quite willing. If somebody wants to show a video and it will help us, I want to see what it's like. I try to get as much information on any and every issue that I can. You have to do that and sometimes you might do what's called wasting time, and we did lose some time. We were at fault on one occasion. We didn't have our amendments. I apologize to everyone. It should not have happened, it did happen and I apologize for that action. I'm sorry that we didn't have our amendments.

Mr Mills: Might I suggest a solution, if we can have agreement for extended time this evening, understanding that we do have to deal with this by tonight? If everyone is in agreement to extending the time, I think that would be the way to proceed.

Mr Brad Ward (Brantford): For how long?

The Chair: Until we're done.

Mr Mills: Until we're done. I mean, we have to get it done tonight.

Mr Sutherland: I would say that at the rate we're going, it's going to be close to 30 minutes we're looking at, at least—to 6:30.

Mr Eddy: Is 30 minutes a crime?

Mr Sutherland: No, but some members do have to leave. They have commitments back in their riding.

Mr Eddy: I do too. I have to be in Dunnville at 7 o'clock.

Mr Murdoch: I'd have to agree with Kimble, because I don't think it's worth the time we're taking. If you notice, we didn't have any amendments. I didn't think they were worth bringing in. I had one amendment, and that was to scrap the bill because the whole bill is flawed. That's what I would have done, but obviously you can't do that. So I'd agree with Kimble Sutherland that there's no sense sitting here. I understand what Ron wants to do, because it's more dear to his heart; he was the clerk-administrator of the municipality that you're destroying. But I think that it is a waste of time being here. Sorry, Ron; I think after you've been here a lot longer, you'll find out that there's no democracy anyway.

Mr Sutherland: Let's be clear that I'm not moving it because I'm saying it's a waste of time. Amendments from oppositions have been—

Mr Murdoch: I didn't say that; I just agreed with you that it was a waste of time.

The Chair: Mr Murdoch and Mr Sutherland, we just wasted another five minutes. We should carry on. We could have got through three more amendments.

Mr Murdoch: Mr Sutherland asked for a vote. Do we not get a vote? Maybe we don't get votes around here any more.

The Chair: I don't believe I heard him asking for a vote.

Mr Murdoch: I mean, they don't mean a hell of a lot anyway when we do get them.

Mr Sutherland: Keep going, then.

The Chair: Liberal motion, subsection 44(1.1).

Mr Eddy: I move that section 44 of the bill be amended by adding the following subsection after section (1):

“Limitation

“1.1 Where existing special purpose charges are in effect, special area rates shall not increase by more than 5 per cent in any one year from 1994 to 2003.”

This is limiting tax increases to no more than 5%.

Mr Mills: We cannot support this amendment, because the special area rates are supposed to reflect the true costs of providing the specific services to the area. If this cost increases faster than 5%, the rate should go up to reflect the true cost. In other words, this amendment sticks them at 5% for any one year, and we shouldn't do that.

1750

The Chair: Further discussion? All those in favour of the Liberal motion? Opposed? Defeated.

Mrs Mathyssen, subsection 45(2).

Mrs Mathyssen: I move that section 45 of the bill be amended by adding the following subsection:

“Same

“(2) The minister may by order, on such conditions as the minister considers appropriate, make grants or loans for the purpose of offsetting undesirable increases in taxes caused by this act and such grants or loans may be designated to apply to the taxes from any one or any combination of merged areas.”

The Chair: Discussion?

Mr Mills: I'd just like to comment. This amendment is not required because under section 45, dealing with tax raising, we can do this thing already.

The Chair: Further discussion? All those in favour of Mrs Mathyssen's motion? Opposed? Defeated.

Also, Mr Eddy's Liberal one is defeated.

Liberal motion, subsection 46(2).

Mr Eddy: I move that subsection 46(2) of the bill be amended by striking out “may” in the first line and substituting “shall.”

It makes it necessary that the city of London make bylaws re urban services.

The Chair: Discussion, again?

Mr Mills: We will not support this amendment because traditionally we don't bind the minister's regulation requirements in legislation, and that's what this would do.

The Chair: All those in favour? All those opposed? That's three and three.

Mr Mills: Well, I think—

The Chair: No, no. I have to vote and I'm against it. Defeated.

Liberal motion, subsection 46(4).

Mr Eddy: I move that subsection 46(4) of the bill be amended by striking out "may" in the first line and substituting "shall."

This makes the minister make regulations re determination of rates for urban services.

The Chair: Shall the vote be the same? Agreed? Defeated.

Government motion, subsection 46(4).

Mr Mills: I move that subsection 46(4) of the bill be amended by striking out "1993" in the third line and substituting "1994."

By way of explanation, this amendment is to provide the minister with authority to implement urban service areas by January 1, 1994, instead of January 1, 1993. Extending the implementation period for urban services permits the city of London additional time to prepare for providing new urban services to areas annexed to the city. In 1993, section 43 of this act limits tax increases in annexed areas. In 1994 and future years, ratepayers in the areas annexed to the city will not pay for urban services they're not receiving from the city.

The Chair: All those in favour of the government motion? Those opposed? Carried.

Ms Mathysen, subsection 46(6).

Mrs Mathysen: I move that section 46 of the bill be amended by adding the following subsection:

"Appeal

"(6) The appeal provisions in subsections 26(13) to (20) apply with necessary modifications to a bylaw made under this section."

The Chair: Questions or comments?

Mr Mills: I can't support this amendment because the regular OMB appeal service provisions should apply in this situation. There is no need for special provisions as were required to the hydro-electric situation.

The Chair: Further discussion? All those in favour of Ms Mathysen's motion? All those against? Defeated.

Also, the Liberal motion which stated the same is defeated.

Government motion, section 47.

Mr Mills: I move that section 47 of the bill be struck out and the following substituted:

"Assessment roll for 1993, London

"47(1) For the purposes of the assessment roll to be prepared for the city of London under subsection 14(1) of the Assessment Act for the 1993 taxation year, the real property in an area annexed to the city shall be assessed in the same manner as similar real property in the municipality from which the real property was annexed.

"Same, other annexing municipalities

"(2) For the purposes of the assessment roll to be prepared for an annexing municipality other than the city of London under subsection 14(1) of the Assessment Act for the 1993 taxation year, the real property in the area annexed to the annexing municipality shall be assessed in accordance with the classes of real property and the factors prescribed for the annexing municipality by regulation under the Assessment Act or the Municipal Act, as the case may be.

"Assessment roll of 1994, London

"(3) For the purposes of the assessment roll to be prepared for the city of London under subsection 14(1) of the Assessment Act for the 1994 taxation year, the real property in the area annexed to the city shall be assessed in accordance with the classes of real property and the factors prescribed for the city by regulation under the Assessment Act."

This section sets out how properties will be assessed following annexation in London and other annexing municipalities. It's important to note that regardless of how annexed properties end up being assessed, there is no tax increase protection set out in sections 43 and 44.

The Chair: Discussion?

Interjection.

The Chair: Wait a minute; the mike didn't go on. Okay, Mr Eddy.

Mr Eddy: Does that mean market value assessment is—

Mr Mills: Oh, I'd just like to correct something. In my notes here, it says there is tax increase protection set out in sections 43 and 44. I think I said there is no tax increase. I apologize for that error.

Mr Eddy: I just wondered, though, if market value assessment city-wide—that's not included in the bill as a requirement?

Mr Mills: No, we're not requiring that.

Mr Eddy: The council would decide?

Mr Mills: Yes.

The Chair: All those in favour of the government motion? Those opposed? Carried.

Ms Mathysen, section 48.

Mrs Mathysen: I move that section 48 of the bill be struck out and the following substituted:

"Compensation from London

"48(1) For 1993 to 2003, inclusive, the Minister of Municipal Affairs shall by regulation require that in the manner specified in the regulation, the city of London pay compensation to the county of Middlesex, the township of Delaware, the township of London, the township of North Dorchester, the township of West Nissouri, and a local board of any of them.

"Levy

"(2) The council of the city of London may by bylaw in the years 1993 to 2003, inclusive, before the adoption of the estimates for the year, levy rates, to raise the compensation the city is required to pay under a regulation made under subsection (1), against,

"(a) the land within the city on the 31st day of December, 1992; and

"(b) any property that changed in use or character after the 1st day of January, 1993.

"Same

"(3) For the purpose of subsection (2), "change in use or character" of a property has the meaning set out in subsection 44(3)."

The Chair: Discussion?

Mr Mills: Part of this amendment is done by the government's amendment. As far as sections (2) and (3), they're inappropriate because it limits those paying compensation to the county to those in the former city only.

Interjection.

Mr Mills: Oh, I'm sorry; wait a minute. It limits those paying compensation to the county to those in the former city. We'll get it right.

The Chair: Further discussion?

Mrs Mathysen: This is a double-edged sword for me. I am still concerned about the ultimate cost of this bill to London taxpayers, but there has to be a recognition that the townships and towns in the county of Middlesex are going to be seriously hampered by the loss of the tax base of the town of Westminster. I want there to be a recognition of the problems that this bill creates financially for all my constituents.

The Chair: All those in favour of Ms Mathysen's motion? All those opposed? Defeated. Also Liberal motion, which stated the same, defeated.

We go on to section 48, a government motion, Mr Mills.

1800

Mr Mills: I move that section 48 of the bill be struck out and the following substituted:

"Compensation from London

"48. During 1993 to 2003, inclusive, the Minister of Municipal Affairs may by regulation require that the city of London pay compensation, in the amount and manner specified in the regulation, to the county of Middlesex, the township of Delaware, the township of London, the township of North Dorchester, the township of West Nissouri, or a local board of any of them."

By way of explanation, subsections 48(1) and 48(2), as they appear in the first reading of the bill, are removed and they have been replaced with a provision enabling the minister to provide by regulation more flexibility to respond to local concerns about compensation. It allows payments by the city to be made directly to the county and local municipalities, whichever is appropriate.

Compensation paid to the county of Middlesex will be used by the county to pay the Middlesex county library board. The minister has stated that the county and affected local municipalities will receive sufficient funds to ensure that there will be no annexation-related tax increases for five years following annexation and an additional four years where increases will be phased in.

The Chair: Thank you, Mr Mills. Discussion? Seeing no discussion, call for the vote. All those in favour of the government motion? Carried.

The Liberal motion here, subsection 49(2), Mr Eddy.

Mr Eddy: I move that subsection 49(2) of the bill be struck out and the following substituted:

"Payments to county of Middlesex

"(2) The city of London shall, on or before the 1st day of March in each year in perpetuity, pay the county of Middlesex, as compensation for the reduction in income due to the dissolution of the London-Middlesex Suburban Roads Commission, the proceeds of a rate of one mill, applied to the value of the rateable property in the city in that year.

"Regulation

"(2.1) The Minister of Municipal Affairs may by regulation prescribe a mill rate that is greater than zero for the purpose of subsection (2)."

This keeps the suburban roads commission with funding from the city of London.

Interjection.

Mr Eddy: It shouldn't have been there? Sorry: Withdraw "Regulation," at the bottom; sorry about that.

Mr Mills: We've addressed these concerns in our amendments, coming up.

The Chair: All those in favour of the Liberal motion? Those opposed? Defeated.

Government motion, section 49, Mr Mills.

Mr Mills: I move that section 49 of the bill be struck out and the following substituted:

"Payments to the county of Middlesex

"49(1) The city of London shall pay the county of Middlesex $2,000,000 on or before the 1st day of March in each year from 1994 to 1996, inclusive.

"Idem

"(2) The city of London shall, on or before the 1st day of March in each year, pay the county of Middlesex, as compensation for the reduction in income due to the dissolution of the London-Middlesex Suburban Roads Commission, the proceeds of a rate of one mill or such other mill rate as the Minister of Municipal Affairs may prescribe, applied to the value of the rateable property in the city in that year.

"Regulation

"(3) The minister may by regulation prescribe a mill rate for the purpose of subsection (2).

"Special reserve fund

"(4) The county of Middlesex shall establish a special reserve fund designated for the capital costs of providing sewers and water lines and shall place all payments received under subsection (1) in the special reserve fund.

"Idem

"(5) The county shall not, without the approval of the Minister of Municipal Affairs,

"(a) make any payments out of the special reserve fund; or

"(b) change the designation of the special reserve fund."

By way of explanation, subsection 49(2) states that given that the county is expected to maintain suburban roads, payments to compensate for suburban roads commission payments will continue in perpetuity. This addresses a fundamental concern raised by the county. Payment is based on an actual local assessment of the city of London, and if a reassessment of the city of London occurs at a future date and the payment exceeds amounts required by the county of Middlesex for road expenditures, the minister has the authority to adjust the rate of one mill to be applied to the local assessment.

Subsection 49(4) provides for the county's use of a special reserve fund for water and sewer capital costs.

The Chair: Discussion?

Mr Eddy: I thank the parliamentary assistant for submitting this amendment. However, the one problem I have with it is under "Regulation." Realizing that the minister by regulation may prescribe a mill rate, which might be very, very low—it couldn't be zero, but it could be very low—I would rather see the requirements of the Public Transportation and Highway Improvement Act kick in. That's the system used by all other counties and separated municipalities in the province where it's a stated amount.

Of course, it's not a wide-open thing if the assessment was to increase. It's on an assessment of the separated municipality as equalized by the Minister of Transportation. There is a limiting factor there and it seems to me that's a better way to go as to what's used by all other municipalities in the Public Transportation and Highway Improvement Act.

The Chair: Any comments, Mr Mills?

Mr Mills: Just the fact that I don't agree with that philosophy.

Mr Eddy: This way, it's a regulation that may have to be changed every year by the minister. The other way, it's handled in the same way as all other local municipalities. Every county every year gets the assessment of the separated municipality as equalized by the minister of highways for suburban road purposes. I don't know whether that's applicable or not. It's a good system.

The Chair: Okay.

Mr Mills: Just a minute, Mr Chair. Can we have a comment from staff on that?

The Chair: Oh, yes, we're pleased to have it.

Dr Chinnery: I guess the concern Mr Mills brought up was that if the city of London is reassessed at a future date, the rate of one mill on its local assessment would exceed what it's paying now, which is approximately $1 million a year. That's what that one-mill rate is to reflect, approximately $1 million a year, what they're getting now.

The reason we are not tying the payment to the Public Transportation and Highway Improvement Act section is because for one thing we're dissolving the London-Middlesex Suburban Roads Commission. One of the provisions of section 68 of that act was that you had to have one of these suburban roads commissions.

Mr Eddy: No, that's not correct.

Dr Chinnery: I guess what I'm saying is that for the purpose of calculating this, we're looking at the total number of roads in the county and how much money it's going to cost to provide the services on those roads. So it isn't really as flexible as the section and the rate we are attempting to introduce in this section.

Mr Eddy: In response, I just point out that the speaker may want to refer to the Brantford system, where there is no suburban roads commission. There are no designated suburban roads, but the city of Brantford does, by agreement under the—well, you know about that one.

Dr Chinnery: Yes.

Mr Eddy: It's a different situation.

Dr Chinnery: It's a different situation.

Mr Mills: We are satisfied this will satisfy the fund need.

Mr Eddy: And you will attempt to satisfy that?

Mr Mills: Yes. I hope I have.

The Chair: All those in favour of the government motion? Those opposed? Carried.

Ms Mathysen, subsection 50(2.1).

Mrs Mathysen: I move that section 50 of the bill be amended by adding the following subsection after subsection (2):

"Same

"(2.1) The minister shall appoint to each committee one person to represent the interests of the residents of the former town of Westminster."

This is in response to the concern that in an urban municipality the needs and wishes of a rural and smaller population may not be suitably heard.

1810

Mr Mills: Just to comment, we can't support that amendment because it will require Westminster, which will no longer exist, to have a representative on the committee of referees.

Mr Sutherland: Can I just ask for a point of clarification? I'm trying to follow it. If I look at what section (2) says in the act, it says, "Each committee shall consist of one or more treasurers of the municipalities directly affected by the adjustment of particular assets and liabilities." Does that not in itself include Westminster, or what am I missing here?

Mr Mills: Westminster won't exist. It won't have a treasurer, so why should it have—

Mr Sutherland: So this is only for the other areas?

Mr Mills: Yes; that's right.

Mr Sutherland: I guess what I would ask for Ms Mathysen to comment on is, what areas or assets or liabilities will this committee be deciding upon that are currently with the town of Westminster?

Mrs Mathysen: The point is representation.

Mr Sutherland: But is this committee dividing up assets and liabilities of the town of Westminster or is it doing what the other municipalities that have representation on it do? That's what I need clarified regarding your amendment.

Mrs Mathysen: All the town assets—

Mr Mills: Maybe, just to clarify that, Doctor, would you like to come forward just for a minute? I hate to prolong it, but I think we need to know.

Dr Chinnery: Maybe I could just clarify that. Because the town of Westminster is in part going to the city of London, in part going to the townships of North Dorchester and Delaware, there should be a committee that will look at the transfer of all of those assets and liabilities. So there will have to be a part of the committee of referees that looks at all of that, including representatives from those municipalities.

There would be someone representing the town of Westminster because people from the town of Westminster are the only people available who know about the situation of the assets and liabilities of that municipality. Even though the town of Westminster won't exist on January 1, 1993, the city of London is not familiar with the assets and liabilities, so it's clear that we intend to appoint someone from the town of Westminster to be on the committee of referees.

Mr Sutherland: So that's implied by section (2) already, is what you're telling me?

Dr Chinnery: Yes.

Mr Sutherland: Because that's what my interpretation was, that they're an affected municipality, that they would already have someone on there. I just want to get this clear because that wasn't the same response I got from the parliamentary assistant. You're saying that someone will be there from the town?

Dr Chinnery: That is my interpretation of this section, that someone has to be there who can represent the interests of that former municipality.

Mr Mills: I'd just like to defend myself. What I said is that I had that information differently, but that is the ultimate decision.

Mr Sutherland: So they are going to be represented, then? That's the assurance given? Okay; thank you.

Mrs Mathysen: The concern has been that that's not what's been communicated in transition.

Mr Mills: I see.

Mr Sutherland: And we've got it stated here on the record that someone from the town of Westminster will be there?

Interjection.

Mr Sutherland: Great. Thank you.

Mr Mills: Even though Westminster doesn't exist.

The Chair: All those in favour of Ms Mathysen's motion? All those opposed? Defeated. Also, the Liberals had the same motion; it's defeated.

Now we go on to a government motion, subsection 50(6).

Mr Mills: I move that subsection 50(6) of the bill be amended by inserting after "may" in the third line "within thirty days of receiving it".

The addition of an appeal time from a decision of the committee of referees ensures that the decision-making process to reach a conclusion has a realistic time frame.

Thirty days represents ample time for a municipality or a board to decide whether to appeal or not.

The Chair: Discussion? All those in favour of the government motion? Three?

Mr Mills: I hope people are not getting tired, you know.

The Chair: Opposed? Carried.

Government motion, section 52.

Mr Mills: I move that section 52 of the bill be struck out and the following substituted:

"Operation of Lambeth and Glanworth libraries

"52. The London Public Library Board shall continue to operate the existing libraries in Lambeth and Glanworth until at least the 31st day of December, 1997."

By way of explanation, this provision is to allow the city of London public library board to provide library services in Glanworth and Lambeth, instead of county board with city funding. Libraries will stay open at least till the end of 1997. The London and Middlesex library boards both asked for this arrangement in public hearings held in London in September.

The Chair: Discussion?

Mrs Mathysen: I'd like to say I support this. I think that it confirms that Mr Brant created problems, rather than solutions, very often in this bill and in his report.

The Chair: Okay. All those in favour of the government motion? Opposed? Carried.

Government motion, subsection 56(1).

Mr Mills: I move that subsection 56(1) of the bill be struck out and the following substituted:

"School division boundaries

"(1) Despite any other act, the Minister of Education may, before the first day of December 1994, by order,

"(a) alter the boundaries of the school divisions of the Middlesex County Board of Education and the Board of Education for the City of London;

"(b) amalgamate the Middlesex County Board of Education and the Board of Education for the City of London; and

"(c) dissolve the Middlesex County Board of Education or the Board of Education for the City of London."

By way of explanation, this provision allows the Minister of Education greater flexibility in dealing with changes to two public school boards and, in addition to altering the boundaries, the minister now has the option to either amalgamate or dissolve the boards. The change was requested by the Minister of Education.

The Chair: Discussion? Seeing no discussion, all those in favour of the government motion? Those opposed? Carried.

Government motion, subsection 56(2).

Mr Mills: I move that subsection 56(2) of the bill be amended by adding after "employment contracts" in the seventh line "for the payment of money or transfer of real property between the Board of Education for the City of London and the Middlesex County Board of Education."

Explanation: An addition has been made to expand the regulation-making power of the Minister of Education to also permit the transfer of money or real property between the two affected boards.

The Chair: Discussion? Seeing no discussion, all in favour of the government motion? Those opposed? Carried.

Government motion, section 57.

Mr Mills: I move that section 57 of the bill be struck out and the following substituted:

“Social services plan

“(1) The city of London shall prepare, in association with the organizations and persons responsible for or concerned with the planning and delivery of social and community services, a plan for the delivery of those services within the city.

“Adoption of plan

“(2) The city shall adopt the plan before the 1st day of January, 1995.

“Public information

“(3) The city shall ensure that, in the course of the preparation of the plan, adequate information is made available to the public and before adopting the plan, the city shall afford members of the public an opportunity to submit comments in respect of the plan up to such time as is specified by the city.

“Content of plan

“(4) The plan shall include objectives and policies for the delivery within the city of social and community services including affordable housing, arts and cultural programs, child care and other children’s services, community centres, general education programs, adult education and retraining, fire protection, police protection, health services, long-term care services, multicultural services, recreation, social assistance, transportation services for people with disabilities and other transportation services.

1820

“Advisory committee

“(5) The city shall establish a social planning advisory committee.

“Composition of committee

“(6) The social planning advisory committee shall include representatives from organizations and persons responsible or concerned with the planning and delivery of social and community services within the city.

“Reports of committee

“(7) The social planning advisory committee shall report on a regular basis to the council of the city and its standing committees to ensure the integration of the delivery of social and community services within the city with other municipal plans of the city, including the official plan.”

I would just like to comment on that by way of explanation. One of the major issues discussed at the public hearings in London in September was the development of a social plan by the city and the general comment surrounding the need to provide some flesh to the very general direction that is currently contained in Bill 75.

This provision reflects the issues raised at those hearings as well as the work that is taking place with stakeholders since then. The proposed amendment will replace the current section 57 with the new clause, which requires the city to prepare a social plan in association with stakeholders; requires that the plan be adopted by January 1, 1995; ensures adequate public participation in the development of the plan; directs that the plan address such issues as affordable housing, child care, cultural programs, police and fire protection, recreation and health services among other matters, and provides for the creation, composition and the reporting of a social planning advisory committee. These provisions have been agreed to by the city and the various stakeholders involved in social issues.

The Chair: Discussion? All those in favour of the government motion? Opposed? Carried.

Mrs Mathysen: Are you ready?

The Chair: Ms Mathysen, section 57.1.

Mrs Mathysen: I would like to move the government motion as it relates to section 57.1.

I move that the bill be amended by adding the following section after section 57:

“Rural issues advisory committee, London

“57.1 The Minister of Municipal Affairs may by regulation,

“(a) establish, or require the council of the city of London to establish, a rural issues advisory committee in the city of London;

“(b) prescribe the size, composition and functions of the rural issues advisory committee;

“(c) require the city council to consult with the rural issues advisory committee before passing a bylaw pertaining to a rural issue; and

“(d) define rural issues for the purpose of this section.”

I ask members to support this because it has become clearer and clearer as time has gone on and evidenced by a meeting as late as Monday evening that the city hasn’t understood fully the need to protect the agricultural issues by giving those in the community a real voice and real power in the council of the city of London. I hope regulations coming from the minister will compel the city to give adequate protection to those rural people by virtue of this representation.

Mr Mills: I’m afraid this amendment cannot be supported in its entirety. Clause (b) of the amendment is being done in the government’s amendment, clause (d) is being done in the government amendment and, as far as clause (a) is concerned, standing committees in London are all elected officials and therefore it does not seem appropriate to have an unelected body as a standing committee. Clause (c) doesn’t seem appropriate, to have special committees of adjustment for rural areas only and, as I said, (d) is done by our amendment. The government will move an amendment but will not support this amendment.

Mr Sutherland: I just want to state for the record that certainly in the testimony we’ve heard there’s concern about the way the city has responded so far in terms of whether this committee should be an advisory committee or a standing committee.

I think the sense of it being an advisory committee is that those issues may not get dealt with that need to be dealt with or taken seriously. I want to know, if we’re opposed to it being a standing committee because they’re elected officials, how do we ensure that an advisory committee gets a little more teeth in terms of how the council will respond to its advice?

Mr Mills: Maybe we can address those concerns in the government motion.

Mr Sutherland: I'm looking at the government motion and—

Mr Mills: I see. Let's go to clause (c): "require the city council to consult with the rural issues advisory committee before passing a bylaw pertaining to a rural issue."

The Chair: Which one did you read out, Ms Mathysen?

Mrs Mathysen: I read the government motion.

The Chair: Because I was looking at the Liberal one here and the one that was submitted by—

Mr Mills: Sorry.

The Chair: There are three of them here.

Mr Sutherland: Sorry. I didn't think you read out the government motion either.

Mrs Mathysen: I did say I was reading the government motion.

The Chair: I didn't hear. I didn't even ask for the government motion.

Mr Eddy: That's why I got so mad. She said "advisory" and I didn't—

Mr Mills: Yes, that's what—I'm sorry.

Mr Sutherland: My apologies. I thought you'd read out the other motion as well. Okay. Fair enough then.

Mrs Mathysen: We think it's lovely.

Mr Ward: Great motion.

The Chair: They're pretty close. There are just a few word changes.

Mrs Mathysen: I read it because I thought it had a better chance of passing. Fooled again.

Mr Eddy: I think I could fully support the motion moved by Ms Mathysen.

Mr Mills: I beg your pardon.

The Chair: Would you withdraw your other motion there, Ms Mathysen?

Mrs Mathysen: I will.

Mr Mills: I beg your pardon to all.

Mrs Mathysen: No, it's all right, Mr Mills. I guess I didn't emphasize "government" enough.

The Chair: Mr Eddy, any discussion on this?

Mr Eddy: Yes. I'm opposed.

The Chair: You're opposed.

Mr Mills: To your own motion?

Mr Eddy: Pardon.

Mr Mills: No, to this one.

The Chair: This is the government motion.

Mr Mills: Yes.

The Chair: All those in favour? Those opposed? Carried.

Mr Mills: I beg your pardon, Irene.

The Chair: It supersedes the other amendment, Mr Eddy.

Mr Sutherland: See, this is why we shouldn't have gone late.

The Chair: Liberal motion, section 57.2.

Mr Eddy: I move that the bill be amended by adding the following section after section 57:

"Agricultural committee

"57.2 The Minister of Municipal Affairs shall by regulation,

"(a) provide for the creation, size, composition and functions of an agricultural committee in the city of London;

"(b) require the council of the city of London before passing a bylaw pertaining to an agricultural issue to consult with the agricultural committee; and

"(c) define agricultural issues for the purpose of this section."

This establishes an agricultural committee as a standing committee of council.

Mr Mills: Can I make a comment? We won't support this amendment because we believe the rural committee should be constituted to cover agricultural issues and that two committees would be confusing since they'd deal with many of the same issues, if not exactly the same issues. I don't know why you would need two committees to deal with that.

The Chair: All those in favour of the Liberal motion? Those opposed? Defeated.

Government motion, section 57.2.

Mr Mills: I move that the bill be amended by adding the following section after section 57:

"Right to operate buses

"57.2 Despite any bylaw the city of London made under subparagraph i of paragraph 104 of section 210 of the Municipal Act and subsection 3(1) of the City of London Act, 1960-61, the right of any person to maintain and operate buses for the conveyance of passengers within the limits of the city of London in accordance with a valid operating licence issued to the person under the Public Vehicles Act on or before the 31st day of December, 1992, is not affected by this act."

The proposed amendment deals with another issue raised by private concerns at the public hearings in London: the existence of private bus operators in the area to be annexed in the city. The new section, 57.2, will be added to allow these bus operators to continue under licence after the annexation has taken place.

1830

Mr Sutherland: Can I just be clear? That's giving them access to all the city now?

Mr Mills: No, I don't think so.

Mr Sutherland: Okay, because that's my reading. It would say they'd have access to all the city. Could you clarify that?

Mr Gray: I think what this is saying is they can operate in accordance with their existing licences, and their existing licences only allow them to operate within the areas that are being annexed.

Mr Mills: We're not taking away their rights to operate.

Mr Gray: So that is what is being grandfathered, because otherwise the city, the London Transit Commission, has exclusive right to operate buses within the city.

Mr Sutherland: That's what I thought and that's why I wanted to have that clarified.

Since the LTC has that authority, though, are they mandated to extend that to the entire area? If not, then there's kind of this agreement that part of the new city is LTC and part of it is these other companies?

Mr Gray: They have private legislation at the moment that gives them exclusive right within the city. When the city boundaries are expanded, that right extends to the full city, and that includes the annexed areas where these people already have operating licences. This is grandfathering those licences. If you already have a licence, you can continue, but only in that same area.

The Chair: Further discussion? Seeing none, all those in favour of the government motion? All agreed. Carried.

Liberal motion, section 57.3.

Mr Eddy: I move that the bill be amended by adding the following section after section 57:

"Joint agreements

"57.3(1) The city of London, the township of London, the township of Delaware and the town of Westminster shall enter into agreements for joint services, including joint services for water supply, sewage treatment and financing of capital improvements related to sewer and water service.

"Joint implementation committees

"(2) The councils of the county of Middlesex, the city of London, the township of Delaware, township of London and town of Westminster shall establish joint implementation committees to make recommendations with respect to the joint agreements.

"Recommendations

"(3) The joint implementation committees shall submit their recommendations for the required services to the Minister of Municipal Affairs on or before the 1st day of April, 1993.

"Order

"(4) Subject to any other act, the Lieutenant Governor in Council may, within 30 days after receiving a recommendation of a joint implementation committee and upon the recommendation of the minister, by order give effect to the recommendation."

This provides for joint servicing agreements. Every municipality has them; every municipality will have them. They're essential to the operation of any municipality.

Mr Mills: We won't be supporting this amendment because it's redundant now, because Westminster is amalgamated with London, and it's not appropriate to force the city of London to extend services. We feel that they should be negotiated rather than forced.

Mr Eddy: I'll agree with the parliamentary assistant to delete "town of Westminster."

Mr Mills: We're still left with the problem about it being inappropriate to force London, rather than negotiate. I think they should be negotiating. This says we have to.

The Chair: All those in favour of the Liberal motion? All those opposed? Defeated.

Government motion, section 60.

Mr Mills: I move that section 60 of the bill be struck out and the following substituted:

"Commencement

"60(1) This act, except as provided in subsections (2), (3) and (4), comes into force on the day it receives royal assent.

"Same

"(2) Sections 1, 2, 3 to 6, 8 to 45, 47 to 49 and 51 to 59 come into force on the 1st day of January, 1993.

"Same

"(3) Section"—

Mr Ward: On a point of order, Mr Chair: Are there many remaining amendments? Mr Eddy's amendments are gone now, right?

Mr Mills: There's only one more.

"(3) Section 46 comes into force on the 1st day of January, 1994.

"(4) Section 7 comes into force on the 1st day of December, 1994."

These are technical amendments which change the section numbers for the coming into force.

The Chair: Any discussion? There being none, all in favour of the government motion? Carried.

We have a Liberal motion, we have Mrs Mathysen and a government motion.

Mr Eddy: Mine's withdrawn.

The Chair: Yours is withdrawn, and they're out of order.

Mr Mills: I still need ours.

The Chair: Okay. They're out of order.

Mr Mills: Oh, I see. We're going to go through the bill.

The Chair: Okay. We have a Liberal motion here, schedules 2, 4, 5, 6, 7—

Mr Eddy: Withdrawn.

The Chair: Withdrawn. Okay. Liberal motion, schedules 3, 8 and 9.

Mr Eddy: Withdrawn.

The Chair: Okay. Liberal motion, schedule 1.

Mr Eddy: Withdrawn.

The Chair: Okay. That's all the amendments.

Mrs Mathysen: Before we end, I'd like to ask a few questions for the record. I'll be brief. I would like clarification. On October 29, 1992, the London Chamber of Commerce testified before this committee that in July of 1991 the London Chamber of Commerce provided John Brant, arbitrator, a position paper outlining the principles necessary in reaching a final boundary adjustment solution. I would like to ask why the chamber of commerce consulted with John Brant in July of 1991 when he wasn't appointed until January of 1992.

Second, there have been a number of petitions submitted to the Legislative Assembly. How many people have signed those petitions, in terms of the numbers from London and Middlesex?

Mr Mills: I'd just like to say to the first question that the ministry has absolutely no idea of why that is. In so far as the second question, we don't know that either.

Mrs Mathysen: When can I expect that the ministry will investigate that and get back to me?

Mr Mills: It's kind of difficult to know if we don't know.

The Chair: Speak into the mike.

Mr Mills: The first question, if we have no idea of how it happened, I don't know how we can look at it and get back and find out how it happened if we don't know how it happened.

Mrs Mathysen: Perhaps you could consult with the chamber of commerce.

The Chair: Do your best.

Mr Mills: Yes, we'll ask the chamber. We'll see what we can do.

Mrs Mathysen: Or perhaps Mr Brant; I'm sure he hasn't left town yet.

The Chair: Okay. We're going to be going clause-by-clause.

Sections 1 through 4. Shall they carry? Carried.

Shall section 5, as amended in the bill, carry? Carried.

Shall sections 6 and 7 carry? Carried.

Shall sections 8, 9 and 10, as amended, carry? Carried.

Shall section 11 carry? Carried.

Section 12, as amended? Carried.

Section 13, as amended? Carried.

Section 14? Carried.

Section 15, as amended? Carried.

Sections 16 through 18? Carried.

Section 19, as amended? Carried.

Section 20? Carried.

Section 21, as amended? Carried.

Section 22? Carried.

Section 23? Carried.

Section 24, as amended? Carried.

Section 25? Carried.

Section 26, as amended? Carried.

Section 27? Carried.

Section 28? Carried.

Sections 29, 30, 31, 32 and 33, as amended? Carried.

Section 34 to be struck out? Agreed.

Section 35? Carried.

Section 36, as amended? Carried.

Section 37 to be struck out? Agreed.

Section 38 to be struck out? Agreed.

Section 39, as amended? Carried.

Section 40? Carried.

Sections 41, 42, 43 and 44, as amended? Carried.

Section 45? Carried.

Sections 46, 47, 48, 49 and 50, as amended? Carried.

Section 51? Carried.

Section 52, as amended? Carried.

Sections 53, 54 and 55? Carried.

Sections 56 and 57, as amended? Carried.

Sections 58 and 59? Carried.

Section 60, as amended? Carried.

Section 61? Carried.

Schedules 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9 and 10 to be struck out? Agreed.

Shall the bill, as amended, carry? Carried.

Shall the title carry? Carried.

Shall I report the bill to the House? Agreed.

This committee is adjourned.

The committee adjourned at 1842.

CONTENTS

Thursday 26 November 1992

London-Middlesex Act, 1992, Bill 75 F-259

STANDING COMMITTEE ON FINANCE AND ECONOMIC AFFAIRS

Chair / Président: Hansen, Ron (Lincoln ND)

Vice-Chair / Vice-Président: Sutherland, Kimble (Oxford ND)

Caplan, Elinor (Oriole L)

Carr, Gary (Oakville South/-Sud PC)

Christopherson, David (Hamilton Centre ND)

Jamison, Norm (Norfolk ND)

Kwinter, Monte (Wilson Heights L)

Phillips, Gerry (Scarborough-Agincourt L)

Sterling, Norman W. (Carleton PC)

Ward, Brad (Brantford ND)

Ward, Margery (Don Mills ND)

Wiseman, Jim (Durham West/-Ouest ND)

Substitutions / Membres remplaçants:

*Cooper, Mike (Kitchener-Wilmot ND) for Mr Ward

*Cunningham, Dianne (London North/-Nord PC) for Mr Sterling

*Eddy, Ron (Brant-Haldimand L) for Mr Phillips

*Fawcett, Joan M. (Northumberland L) for Mrs Caplan

*Grandmaître, Bernard (Ottawa East/-Est L) for Mr Kwinter

*Mathyssen, Irene (Middlesex ND) for Mr Jamison

*Mills, Gordon (Durham East/-Est ND) for Mr Wiseman

*Murdoch, Bill (Grey PC) for Mr Carr

*In attendance / présents

Also taking part / Autres participants et participantes:

Chinnery, Dr Kathleen M. Chinnery, senior economist, Ministry of Municipal Affairs

Gray, Scott D., solicitor, Ministry of Municipal Affairs

Mills, Gordon, parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Municipal Affairs

Neumann, Mary, policy assistant to the Minister of Municipal Affairs

Tilson, David (Dufferin-Peel PC)

Clerk / Greffier: Decker, Todd

Staff / Personnel: Klein, Susan, legislative counsel

CA2 on XC25
-F31

1-800-387-2378

Ontario

F-14

F-14

ISSN 1180-4386

Legislative Assembly of Ontario

Second Intersession, 35th Parliament

Official Report of Debates (Hansard)

Monday 11 January 1993

Standing committee on finance and economic affairs

Pre-budget consultations

Assemblée législative de l'Ontario

Deuxième intersession, 35^e législature

Journal des débats (Hansard)

Lundi 11 janvier 1993

Comité permanent des finances
et des affaires économiques

Consultations prébudgétaires

Chair: Ron Hansen
Clerk: Todd Decker

Président : Ron Hansen
Greffier : Todd Decker

Published by the Legislative Assembly of Ontario
Editor of Debates: Don Cameron

Publié par l'Assemblée législative de l'Ontario
Éditeur des débats : Don Cameron

Table of Contents

Table of Contents for proceedings reported in this issue appears on the outside back cover, together with a list of committee members and others taking part.

Index inquiries

Reference to a cumulative index of previous issues may be obtained by calling the Hansard Reporting Service indexing staff at 416-325-7410 or 325-7411.

Subscriptions

Subscription information may be obtained from: Sessional Subscription Service, Publications Ontario, Ministry of Government Services, 50 Grosvenor Street, Toronto, Ontario, M7A 1N8. Phone 416-326-5310, 326-5311 or toll-free 1-800-668-9938.

Table des matières

La table des matières des séances rapportées dans ce numéro se trouve sur la couverture à l'arrière de ce fascicule, ainsi qu'une liste des membres du comité et d'autres personnes ayant participé.

Renseignements sur l'index

Il existe un index cumulatif des numéros précédents. Les renseignements qu'il contient sont à votre disposition par téléphone auprès des employés de l'index du Journal des débats au 416-325-7410 ou 325-7411.

Abonnements

Pour les abonnements, veuillez prendre contact avec le Service d'abonnement parlementaire, Publications Ontario, ministère des Services gouvernementaux, 50 rue Grosvenor, Toronto (Ontario) M7A 1N8. Par téléphone : 416-326-5310, 326-5311 ou, sans frais : 1-800-668-9938.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

STANDING COMMITTEE ON FINANCE AND ECONOMIC AFFAIRS

Monday 11 January 1993

The committee met at 1405 in committee room 1.

PRE-BUDGET CONSULTATIONS

The Chair (Mr Ron Hansen): I call the standing committee on finance and economic affairs to order. The first order of business we have is the report of the subcommittee:

"Your subcommittee met on Tuesday 15 December 1992 and recommends the following with respect to pre-budget consultations for 1993.

"1. The Treasurer and officials from the Ministry of Treasury and Economics shall be invited to brief the committee on the Ontario economy and finances. Forecasters from the private sector who have previously assisted the committee in this role shall be invited to brief the committee on prospects and forecasts for the Ontario economy. Principal transfer recipients from the municipalities, universities/colleges, schools and hospital sectors (MUSH) who appeared last year shall also be invited to appear before the committee.

"2. The clerk pro tem of the committee shall send a letter of invitation to all individuals, groups and organizations who appeared last year.

"3. The Treasurer and officials from the Ministry of Treasury and Economics shall be allotted ½ day for their briefing. Forecasters and MUSH sector groups shall be allotted 45 and 30 minutes respectively per presentation.

"4. The clerk pro tem of the committee shall place an advertisement in all daily newspapers in Ontario in early January 1993 inviting the public to participate in the pre-budget hearings.

"5. The subcommittee agreed to meet again after the deadline for requests to appear for an oral presentation to review the list of those who requested to appear and to select those groups and individuals who would be invited to make oral presentations."

Can I have someone to move it? Mr Carr?

Mr Gary Carr (Oakville South): Yes, I move the adoption of that.

The Chair: Any discussion? All in favour? All opposed? Carried.

Also what we have is the budget for the committee. Last year our budget was $217,000. This year I have the budget—has everybody got the budget in front of him?—and it comes to $150,652. The details are on the following pages. This takes in Bill 164 for travelling also, so if you see the travelling expenses, that's for travelling for Bill 164. Can I have someone move the budget for the committee? Mr Carr?

Mr Carr: Yes, I move that the budget in the amount of $150,652 be approved and that the Chair be authorized to present the budget to the Board of Internal Economy.

The Chair: Thank you. Any discussion? All in favour? All opposed? It's carried.

We'll start our hearings with the first group. I'd like to welcome all the committee members back here. Maybe just for the presenters who are here now, I could start off with Mr

Johnson, your name and your position in the government. You're on my right, but on the left to the people down there.

Mr Paul R. Johnson (Prince Edward-Lennox-South Hastings): Thank you. Paul Johnson. I'm the parliamentary assistant to Floyd Laughren, the Treasurer of Ontario, and MPP for Prince Edward-Lennox-South Hastings.

Mr Brad Ward (Brantford): Brad Ward, MPP for Brantford, parliamentary assistant for Industry, Trade and Technology.

Ms Anne Swarbrick (Scarborough West): Anne Swarbrick, MPP for Scarborough West.

Ms Margaret H. Harrington (Niagara Falls): I'm Margaret Harrington. I represent the city of Niagara Falls and I'm the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Housing.

Hon Shirley Coppen (Minister without Portfolio): Shirley Coppen, MPP, Niagara South, chief government whip.

Mr George Mammoliti (Yorkview): George Mammoliti, MPP for Yorkview, parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Correctional Services.

Mr Monte Kwinter (Wilson Heights): Monte Kwinter, member for Wilson Heights and the Liberal critic for Industry, Trade and Technology.

Mr Gerry Phillips (Scarborough-Agincourt): Gerry Phillips, Scarborough-Agincourt.

Mr Sean G. Conway (Renfrew North): Sean Conway, Renfrew North.

Mr Norman W. Sterling (Carleton): Norm Sterling, Carleton.

Mr Carr: Gary Carr from Oakville South.

Mr Michael D. Harris (Nipissing): Mike Harris from Nipissing.

Mr Sterling: Before we begin, Mr Chairman, I was wondering if you could request that tomorrow when we have the Treasurer in front of us, because of the interest by the media in this, we seek to meet in the Amethyst Room rather than this room and perhaps switch with the public accounts committee. Perhaps if you could make that request this afternoon, then we could do it. I think the public might be interested in some of the presenters tomorrow morning as well and they would have the opportunity to view and hear the presenters.

Mr Conway: Shameless pander to the fourth estate.

The Chair: Is everybody in favour of that? Nobody is opposed? Okay. We'll see about transferring tomorrow to the Amethyst Room.

TORONTO DOMINION BANK

The Chair: The first presenter will be the Toronto Dominion Bank, Mr Peter Drake and Teresa Chandler. Would you come forward. Welcome to the standing committee on finance and economic affairs. You have 45 minutes for your presentation, and at the end you could leave some time for questions of the committee. You may proceed.

Mr Peter Drake: I intend to speak for just a few moments on the framework, if you will, for the outlook for Ontario, Canada, some of the international issues, and then my colleague Teresa Chandler will speak specifically to economic outlook issues concerning the economy of Ontario.

Taking this in no particular order, one of the first things we're looking at in 1993 is expecting gradually falling interest rates throughout the year. To be a little more specific, we expect that three-month treasury bills may fall about 120 basis points from the first quarter of 1993 to the first quarter of 1994. Rates may stabilize or even rise a little in 1994 as the Bank of Canada reacts to the slight increase expected in inflation. Throughout all of this period, if the Canadian dollar suddenly weakens in foreign exchange markets, then short-term rates will rise just as they did in the fall of 1992.

A second thing that we are expecting is a more stable Canadian dollar, trading between 77 and 78 cents US. The Canadian dollar seems to have reached a realistic level, but more turmoil in world foreign exchange markets or political uncertainty in Canada could result in more volatility.

We expect slightly higher but still low inflation. The consumer price index for Canada is forecast to rise by 2.5% in 1993. This is higher than the 1.5% recorded in 1992, but it is still a very low rate of inflation.

We expect rising employment but little decline in the Canadian unemployment rate until late in 1993. Employment will rise only slowly as employers strive to maintain hard-won reductions in their cost structures. The unemployment rate will remain high because people who dropped out of the labour force during the recession will come back in. Because the national rate won't begin to decline until later in the year, the average unemployment rate for Canada will actually rise from 11.3% in 1992 to 11.5% this year.

We expect expansion in the United States economy. Growth has strengthened in the United States economy and economic output is now above its pre-recession level. Real growth in US gross domestic product in 1993 is forecast at 3%. We also expect continued weakness in the Japanese economy and only modest improvement in Europe.

We are looking for rising Canadian exports to the United States. During the recession, Canadian firms lowered their cost structures and increased their competitiveness vis-à-vis firms in the United States. The more than 10% decline in the value of the Canadian dollar since late 1991 provides an added bonus in making Canadian exports competitive in US markets. Exports to non-US markets may be weak and imports to Canada will rise more rapidly as the Canadian economy improves, but Canada's merchandise trade surplus will widen.

We are looking for increased consumer spending. Consumer confidence will improve and consumers will be more willing to spend. Growth in consumer spending won't be nearly as strong as in the 1980s but at a forecast rate of 1.9% this year, it will be twice as rapid as in 1992.

We expect continued spending restraint by governments. The recession reduced tax revenues to most governments, which made their already large deficits even larger. Some provincial governments may raise taxes in 1993, but for most governments tax increases are not a viable way to cut deficits in the current economic environment. The only course left is for governments to cut or at least restrain their spending.

We expect some increase in business inventories. Businesses now keep smaller inventories than they used to, and they keep much tighter control over the inventories they do keep. The result is that the Canadian economy no longer experiences large swings in business inventories. Nevertheless, inventories declined significantly in 1992 and inventory-to-sales ratios are very low. Therefore, there should be some inventory rebuilding in 1993, which will contribute to economic growth.

We expect some increase in business investment in machinery and equipment. Even though corporation profits are still only half of their pre-recession peak, businesses will invest heavily in new machinery and equipment in 1993 because these investments will improve their competitiveness.

Investment in non-residential construction will continue to be very weak because this market is oversupplied. We expect an increase in housing starts and residential construction activity. Housing starts in Canada will increase from just under 170,000 units in 1992 to about 180,000 units in 1993. Lower mortgage rates and improved housing affordability will help spur housing activity.

We expect increased economic growth in Canada. Real gross domestic product, the widest measure of economic output, will grow by about 3% in 1993. That is much lower than the growth rates of past recoveries but well ahead of the estimated 1.2% growth in 1992.

Finally, we expect ratification of the North American free trade agreement. The United States has insisted on some changes in the rules governing environmental and labour standards, but it appears to us that NAFTA will be ratified by the US, Mexico and Canada. If it is ratified, it will be implemented at the beginning of 1994.

Those are my remarks, Mr Chairman, and now I will turn to my colleague Teresa Chandler.

Ms Teresa Chandler: As you all know, the 1990s have not been kind to Ontario so far. Real GDP in Ontario contracted in both 1990 and 1991 and grew by only 1.2% in 1992. If we look at the year as a whole, it's pretty hard to see the good news; it looks pretty bleak, with employment lower in 1991 than in 1990. But if we compare where we are now to where we were a year ago, things look a little brighter.

In Ontario, there was a net increase in jobs in December 1992 of 3,000 workers, compared to December 1991, and employment, as usual, was one of the last indicators to move into the black. The evidence is growing that a sustainable recovery is under way in Ontario. There is at least some good news in retail trade, housing and manufacturing.

We could characterize the first few years of the 1990s as a restructuring phase in Ontario, and now, although restructuring will still go on, it appears that the most painful part is over. In the next few years, Ontario will begin to get some of the benefits of this difficult restructuring and the economy will strengthen.

In 1993, as Mr Drake mentioned, the US and Canadian economies will strengthen, growing by about 3%. We expect Ontario to grow by 3.2% in 1993, helped by the pickup in the US economy. By 1994 growth is expected to pick up in Ontario to 4.3%. This is not a return of the glory days in Ontario of the late 1980s, but it is strong enough growth to accommodate a steady increase in jobs in the province. As we start out 1993, the main concerns that people have are about jobs, the retail sector and the construction and manufacturing sectors.

Before we get into the detailed outlook, I'd like to go into where we've been and where we are right now. Let's start with the job market. Obviously, Ontario has been hit much harder this time around during the recession than in 1981-82. Peak to trough in 1981-82 jobs lost in Canada amounted to 612,000, while in Ontario job losses were 205,000. That means that one third of the jobs lost last time around were in Ontario.

More recently, the peak-to-trough change in employment in Canada between April 1990 and April 1992 was 476,000 jobs; in Ontario, 285,000 jobs were lost. So a full 60% of the jobs lost this time around were in Ontario. Consumers have been afraid not only because of the sheer number of jobs lost but because job losses continued for so long, and people who had jobs began to worry that they would be next.

Looking closer at layoffs in Ontario last year—and these are data from the Ministry of Labour—conditions got worse overall. Layoffs rose by 6.1% compared to 1991, but they were still lower than levels in 1990. There was a sharp jump in the number of complete closures of operations last year. Overall, about 60% of the layoffs that occurred were the result of complete shutdowns of operations. This is very different than in the early 1980s, when reduced operations accounted for more than half of the layoffs in Ontario. The layoffs were concentrated in manufacturing and retail trade.

1420

But if we look at where we were at the end of 1992 compared to the end of 1991, the picture does not look quite as bleak. There's been a net gain of 42,000 jobs between April and December 1992 in Ontario. If we look at employment by industry between December 1991 and December 1992, the gains were in community, business, personal services, construction and agriculture. Although job losses continued in manufacturing and trade, they were at a slower pace than a year ago.

Let's turn to the retail sector. I mentioned that consumers were afraid of losing their jobs. Many have also been worried about the value of their house falling, and that's especially true in Toronto. Whatever the reason, when consumers are uncertain they don't spend as much. That's what happened last year. Retail sales grew slightly, by just over 1% in Ontario last year. In the second half of 1992 there have been some strong gains in retail sales, and year-over-year growth reached almost 3% in October 1992 in Ontario. The early indications are that Christmas sales were quite good, so the news overall is improving in the retail sector.

Now, if we turn to the construction sector, obviously the non-residential market was in severe trouble last year. Commercial and industrial building activity fell sharply in Ontario. In the downtown Toronto market, office vacancy rates, which were as low as 3.7% in 1987, climbed to 17% by the end of last year.

In the housing market there's some better news. There was quite a bit of improvement last year, but there's certainly much room for more strength in the coming months, as low mortgage rates and recent job gains boost consumer confidence. The December housing starts, which came out today, show that starts in December were at a rate of 178,000 units for Canada, which was good news and an improvement compared to October and November.

If we look at housing starts in Ontario, they rose from about 53,000 units in 1991 to 56,000 units last year. But on the downside, if we exclude socially assisted units from this number, housing starts in Ontario actually declined in 1992. That's based on January-to-October data.

In the resale market there were declines in house prices in most areas of Ontario. Toronto's prices fell for the third year in a row. Now Vancouver is the most expensive housing market in the country; it replaced Toronto last year.

There was an increase in home sales, even in the Toronto market. Home buyers were attracted by the RRSP and down payment incentives, low mortgage rates and, in some areas, declines in house prices. Sales were up by 9.3% in Toronto as the market rebounded at the end of the year. The fundamentals are there for a recovery in the housing market in 1993.

If we turn to manufacturing, if we look at only job losses, we get quite a bleak perspective on the manufacturing sector last year. The number of manufacturing jobs was down by close to 50,000, on average, in 1992, but the pace of job losses has slowed. It's also true that competitiveness is improving and that exports have risen.

Let's look at competitiveness first. First of all, to get at the problem, manufacturing in Ontario has clearly undergone major restructuring. To see why, we have to glance back at the 1980s. During the second half of the 1980s, Canadian productivity growth was very poor, especially compared to productivity growth in the United States. By 1990 many Canadian manufacturing companies found themselves to be at a cost disadvantage. The steady rise in the Canadian dollar, combined with cuts in tariffs under the FTA, added to the pressure on Canadian manufacturers.

Let's look at what companies have done. Since the start of the recession, there has been a major change in the way companies are doing business. What companies have done is cut costs and employment in order to become more competitive. Restructuring has meant that many companies are doing the same job with fewer workers and resources.

What has this meant? In 1992 productivity grew by about 4% in manufacturing compared to the average productivity growth of under 1% per year between 1985 and 1990, and wage growth moderated substantially in 1992. At the same time, the Canadian dollar fell from a peak of close to 90 cents US in late 1991 and is now hovering around 78 cents. We've got stronger productivity growth, slower wage growth and a lower Canadian dollar. These three make Canadian exports more competitive.

We've already seen the benefits of that. In 1992 we had very strong export growth in Canada and Ontario. Canadian exports were up by 9.2% in the year to September, and Ontario's exports were up even more, by 14%. The areas that grew the strongest were transportation equipment, rubber and plastic products, electrical equipment, paper, iron and steel furniture. All these industries recorded gains of over 10% in the first nine months of 1992.

This restructuring process is a very difficult one, but by making these changes companies are becoming more competitive, which is necessary for survival in the 1990s.

To sum up the good news, employment's on its way back up, jobs in Ontario are up by 42,000 since April, retail sales are starting to grow, there's some good news from housing markets and exports continue to climb.

Let's turn to the outlook for Ontario. The recovery appears to be well under way. The year 1992 represented a year of change for the economy, change that's been very painful. The adjustments have not simply been companies laying off people; employees have to work harder and companies have to do more with fewer workers. Real GDP growth in Ontario is forecast to rise by 3.2% in 1993 and 4.3% in 1994, above the national average.

I'd like to go over a few signs that point to a strong recovery in the Ontario economy this year. The first, as Peter went into, was the stronger US economy. The other signs are that the dollar is lower and there's improved productivity and competitiveness. Since Ontario sends 88% of its exports to the United States, the impact of stronger spending in the US will be felt right away in Ontario.

There will be a boost to confidence and to spending in the next few months because of recent increases in jobs in Ontario. Housing starts are forecast to rise in Ontario to 65,500 units compared to 56,000 units in 1992. The recovery in non-residential construction activity will be more gradual; it will continue to lag behind the rest of the economy. High office vacancy rates will stay with us for some time.

As Ontario companies benefit from recent cost-cutting and gains in productivity, these gains are expected to be mirrored by an improvement in the job market, but this improvement will be gradual. In 1993 employment in Ontario was forecast to grow by 1%, but the picture will look brighter in 1994, with employment growth recovering to 1.7%. High unemployment rates are expected to stay with us for a few years. Unemployment rates in Ontario are forecast to rise to 11% on average, from 10.8% in 1992, but they will start to decline slightly, to 10.7% on average in 1994.

Although a return of the rabid growth of 1987-88 is not likely in the short term, we expect a significant recovery in the Ontario economy over the next few years. Of course Ontario still has the advantage of its location, close to major US markets, as well as other advantages, such as the education and skills of its labour force. Ontario remains the financial and commercial centre of the country, and as prospects in both Canada and the US improve Ontario will prosper.

That concludes the formal part of our presentation. We'd be happy to answer your questions.

Mr Kwinter: I have a question for Mr Drake. I'd just like your comment. In your comments you suggest that the Canadian dollar is trading at about 77 to 78 cents and expected to remain there for the coming year. The exports we make are primarily in the primary section, with raw materials and some secondary manufacturing, and our imports are primarily consumer goods. With the change in the value of the dollar from nearly 90 cents at the beginning of this year to the point where it's 77 or 78 cents, how is that going to impact on the rate of inflation?

Mr Drake: We are inclined to think that it will have relatively little impact on the rate of inflation. That is a much different situation than would have been the case two or three years ago, when the economy was booming. I think the reason it will have relatively little impact is that there is still a great deal of slack in the economy.

There is sufficient slack in the economy that it simply will not support significant price increases. The economic situation itself will simply prevent the decline in the dollar from having very much impact on inflation. It'll have a little—as I said, we expect inflation to be in the range of 2.5% this year, maybe even 2.7% next year—but I think it will have far less than it would have had, for example, two or three years ago.

1430

Mr Phillips: I don't know whether you've had a chance to go over the government's economic forecasts, but you are slightly more pessimistic than it is on virtually every front. I think you're predicting a gross domestic product increase of 3.2% and they're predicting 3.8%. You're predicting that the unemployment rate actually will rise and they're predicting it will drop. I think you're predicting housing starts at 65,000 and they're predicting 71,000. Is there a reason why they may be somewhat more optimistic than you people would be, or are those statistically insignificant differences?

Mr Drake: I don't think there are huge differences in the forecast. Certainly I haven't and I don't think Teresa has had a chance to sit down and go through them with a fine-tooth comb. I would think the best answer is they're not hugely significant differences. Teresa, do you want to add anything?

Ms Chandler: The one thing I mentioned, the area where the most importance difference is in the labour market. We do have a significantly slower employment growth forecast than the Ontario government. I guess it reflects our concerns about the restructuring that's going on and that it may continue somewhat. We have growth of 3.2% in Ontario, and with a growth in jobs of about 1%, that implies further productivity gains in the next year which we expect to occur.

Mr Phillips: So your judgement would be on the employment side. I see they're predicting maybe 50,000 to 60,000 more jobs than you are. You think they may be somewhat optimistic on the job creation front?

Ms Chandler: I'm sure it's a little too early to tell right now. Right now, that's our best guess, yes.

The Chair: Is the Liberal caucus finished?

Mr Phillips: I had some additional questions.

The Chair: Six minutes for each caucus.

Mr Phillips: Have you done any forecasting on things like corporate profits and personal income increases? I'm anxious to get comparatives versus what we're looking at from the government estimates right now. Have you any feeling on those things?

Mr Drake: In the handout we gave out there are some forecasts. These of course are for Canada.

Mr Phillips: I'm looking at Ontario. Have you had any?

Mr Drake: I don't think we've forecast those particular variables for Ontario, but they are on the second page of the handout we gave you for Canada. For example, in pre-tax corporate profits we're expecting an increase of about 21% this year.

Mr Phillips: For 1993?

Mr Drake: For 1993, yes. That's up significantly from the 8.5% increase in 1992. Of course those two numbers are a remarkable turnaround from the very severe declines in 1990 and 1991.

Mr Phillips: Would there be a reason why in Ontario the government would be predicting a 39% increase in pre-tax corporate profits when you're predicting a somewhat lower number nationally?

Mr Drake: I think one wants to be very careful about commenting on someone else's forecast unless one is very familiar with the assumptions that have gone into it. I don't think there's anything meaningful that I could say about it.

Mr Phillips: Would Ontario corporations or corporate profits in Ontario likely be better than the national average in your feeling?

Mr Drake: I would think that Ontario is certainly going to participate in the recovery, just as Teresa said. Certainly this province—this is no news to anybody here—got hit very hard in the recession and corporate profits were absolutely no exception to that. So to the extent that the province recovers, I would certainly expect that profits would do significantly better.

Mr Phillips: So it's possible we could be looking at a 39% increase here when you've got a national number at 21%.

Mr Drake: I don't want to comment on the statistical differences, but it is certainly possible to have a difference.

The Chair: Mr Harris, you have six minutes.

Mr Harris: Thank you very much, Mr Chairman. I have a couple of questions, Teresa, on some of the statistics. The housing starts are projected at 65,000. How many of those housing starts are government-assisted, non-profit, co-op etc versus private sector? Do you have that breakdown?

Ms Chandler: We do not.

Mr Harris: You broke it down, though, for last year.

Ms Chandler: The historical numbers, yes. We obtain that information, but we don't for the forecast.

Mr Harris: If you projected last year's versus this year's, what would that be? Do you know?

Ms Chandler: We do not have a forecast for that.

Mr Harris: Teresa, as well, you talked about the economy picking up next year. The factors you gave for that, particularly for the province of Ontario, were that the US is going to recover, that we're tied to its economy—I'm paraphrasing a little; correct me if I'm wrong—and that we can't help but succeed because of our geography and the built-in infrastructure of an educated workforce, that we are the financial centre and we don't see them moving out over the next year, and so if economic activity picks up in the United States, Ontario will do a little better in spite of itself. Am I paraphrasing you wrongly there?

Mr Drake: I would phrase it just a little bit differently. There's no question the US has a very important influence.

Mr Harris: I appreciate you answering, but I didn't hear one thing that Ontario is doing. I heard about the US picking up. I heard that we're the financial centre. I heard about our educated workforce. I heard about our geography. Is there something else we're doing?

Mr Drake: There is no question that the recession this province and this country went through in 1990-91 was a very painful recession. Part of the pain was the restructuring Teresa talked about. Firms faced a very difficult choice. They either became more competitive or they went out of business. As you know, a number of them, a very large number, did go out of business.

The result of lowering cost structures, the result of making some investments in machinery and equipment, is that our cost structures are lower and our productivity is up. We have had, as I mentioned, the added bonus of the external value of the Canadian dollar falling. All of that has improved competitiveness in the country and in the province very significantly. It should allow us to get terrific leverage off the US expansion. There is certainly something that has happened here.

Mr Harris: So our disasters of 1992, if you like, in job losses will translate into leaner, more efficient, more competitive companies coming into 1993?

Mr Drake: I think that's true.

Mr Harris: In the early 1980s, we were in a recession. Unemployment was at about the same rate. The job losses in Ontario were about 33% of the country's. In the early 1990s, 10 years later, we're in a recession. Of the job losses across the country now, 60% are Ontario jobs lost. Do you have any explanation of why we're being hit more than doubly hard than any other part of the country?

Ms Chandler: I bring that back again to the discussion of competitiveness. It appeared that in the late 1980s it was particularly the case that in central Canada competitiveness was lagging behind. To do a bit of a comparison, following the previous recession there wasn't as much of the structural adjustment in Canada as went on in the United States generally.

Mr Harris: But I mean recession versus recession now, not recovery versus recovery.

Ms Chandler: Okay. Since the recession started, we're looking at further adjustments that have gone well beyond the extent of the last one. The recession started in 1990 and we're still in the restructuring phase. My point is simply that the restructuring has gone on for a long time. This recession has been longer than the last one, and I think that's part of it.

Mr Harris: But you told me that Ontario is losing 60% of the jobs in this recession. In the recession of the early 1980s, we lost 33% of the jobs that Canada lost. Why are we being hit so much harder now than in the early 1980s? That's the question.

Mr Drake: Part of the explanation is that a number of things were going on in 1990-91. We had a recession. Everybody knows why it happened. It was induced by the high interest rates. It was an inflation-fighting recession. But there were other things going on. This country, and especially this province, was adjusting to the Canada-US free trade agreement and it was a significant adjustment. We knew it would be significant in manufacturing. I don't think many of us in the economics profession realized quite how significant it would be on the retail side, but it proved to be very significant there. That was another very important thing.

Mr Harris: So other provinces adjusted better than we did?

Mr Drake: No. I think Ontario had the big adjustment to make in manufacturing. One doesn't have to read much Canadian economic history to know that over the years manufacturing has been one of the protected sectors, and the free trade agreement changed that very significantly, so that was an issue. Another thing that was there was tax reform; that was another issue. It took people a while to get used to the goods and services tax. There are a number of things that made the 1990-91 recession different than the 1981-82 recession.

1440

Mr Harris: I'll just ask one other quick question. You don't have any recommendations here for the Treasurer. I don't know whether that's because he didn't listen the last few times anybody gave him recommendations or because you thought it was falling on deaf ears. Perhaps I could ask you this: Bill Clinton in the United States—you've talked about economic recovery there—has said we need some stimulation of the economy. He's proposing to do it by tax cuts for the middle class. Most have said there is a need for stimulation in the economy in Canada as well. Would you recommend that it be by way of a tax cut or would you recommend it be by way of a tax hike, as Floyd Laughren has suggested here? Do you have a recommendation for the Treasurer?

Mr Drake: In general, we are going to be very careful not to tell any government how to do its job. I guess in general—

Mr Harris: But do you have a recommendation for them, or why are you here?

Mr Drake: We're here partly to give our view on the outlook, and I think the policy recommendation I would give to this government, and I would probably give the same policy recommendation to virtually any government in Canada at the moment, is this: We certainly seem to have a recovery coming on. It is not a strong recovery by historical standards and certainly there are some parts of the economy that are pretty fragile. I think I would say to any government that when you're making your policies, you're going to have to think about the fact that the economy is still fragile. You're going to have to think about the fact that competitiveness is not just an issue which has been with us for the past two or three years and which is now going to go away. As far as I can tell, it's going to be with us for a number of years.

You're going to have to think about the size of the government deficit. You're going to have to think about financial markets and how they're going to react. You're going to have to think about the fact that financial markets look not only at the size of a government deficit but at the credibility of a fiscal plan. As the elected representatives, the government is going to have to take all of those factors into consideration and make what I'm sure are going to be some very difficult decisions.

Mr Harris: But no advice.

The Chair: I'm going to have to go on to Mr Ward.

Mr Ward: Thanks for your presentation. When you attempt to forecast future projections, it's a very fine art, and obviously we won't know how accurate the forecasts are until next year when we're perhaps sitting around this same table.

This is my third go-around participating in the finance committee and I've noticed, the last two times anyway, that the forecasts made by the banks and by the economists in general have been overly optimistic, to say the least. The projections from an economic standpoint have not come true.

I look at your forecasts for 1993, and your one example is that the real gross domestic product growth is projected to be 3.2%, which I would like to see happen because that's good economic news. But based on what I heard the last two times, I'm not overly optimistic that we can hit those targets. How confident do you feel? I'm not saying something catastrophic could happen, like the destabilization of Europe or whatever, but how confident are you that our economy, both in the province and nationally, can achieve these forecasts, based on the last two years?

Mr Drake: Your comments about the accuracy of the forecasts are absolutely right. It's one of the humbling things about being an economist. I think we are a little more confident, perhaps, than we were and I guess there are two or three reasons.

First of all, certainly we are seeing the US recovery. The US had at least one, if not two false starts getting on its recovery. I think the evidence that the US is on its way is much stronger than it was a year ago, or than it was when some of those other false starts were made. I think that's one thing.

Certainly, the numbers as far as increased competitiveness is concerned seem to be pretty firm and that's something we can build on. The fact of the dollar being down is, I think, very important. One should always remember that a depreciation in a currency provides only a one-time benefit. It's not something you can continue to rely on, but I don't think it could have come at a better time.

There are a number of other economic statistics that have come in that suggest things are much closer to firming up. There are still some things that are very elusive. Consumer confidence is one of them. Consumers, I have always believed, are much smarter than most people gave them credit for. They may not have degrees in business and they may not have degrees in economics, but their instincts are not far off the mark. One of the reasons consumers have been so reluctant to spend is that they have been worried about job security. I think everybody in Ontario knows somebody who lost his job through no fault of his own, and that tends to make people tighten up. We think we are seeing some indication that consumers are more confident than they were, but I grant you that consumer confidence is elusive.

Mr Ward: It's an intangible.

Mr Drake: It is, but we think we are seeing some indications. Admitting there is risk every time you make a forecast, I think we feel rather more confident about this forecast than we would have been justified in being, say, a year ago or two years ago.

Mr Ward: This is based on the economic indicators that have occurred in the last quarter or the last half year—

Mr Drake: Both.

Mr Ward: —to give this renewed confidence in your own forecast, let alone others.

Mr Drake: That's right.

Ms Harrington: I would like to pursue a little further some of the comments you made, which I found quite interesting. Normally, we think of the 1980s as the good times and now we're in the bad times. But what you actually stated, and I'd just like to clarify that this was your intent, was that during the 1980s productivity was poor, that in fact it was about 1% growth during the 1980s annually, whereas now it is 2.5% in, I think, last year or the year before. What I'd like to possibly conclude from that is that what we are now doing is laying a solid base for a strong, sound economy, not the artificial type of situation that we had in the 1980s.

Mr Drake: I think that's true. We are not expecting to see the same strength in real economic growth, but neither are we expecting to see the same inflation. Simply to paraphrase, I guess, what you're saying, if we could see a number of years of steady growth that's 3% or 4% and low inflation, I think we'd probably all take it and be grateful after what we've been through. Teresa, do you want to add to that?

Ms Harrington: You would say that the 1980s were artificial, that the economy was an artificial high.

Ms Chandler: I'd just like to clarify the numbers you were citing on productivity. When we look at productivity and we look at manufacturing productivity, the period of the problem was the 1985 to 1990 period, when productivity growth was below 1% a year, and now in manufacturing in Canada productivity growth is up by roughly 4% in 1992.

Ms Harrington: It's 4% in 1992?

Ms Chandler: In 1992, yes.

Hon Mrs Coppen: Just briefly, I'd like to thank both of you for making these policy recommendations to us. It is a great way to start off a year, with the optimistic report you gave.

Both of you in your reports very quickly went over the free trade agreement and you, Mr Drake, mentioned the NAFTA agreement. I wonder if you could share with us your feelings of what will be the repercussions to this province if that deal goes through. We're talking about several amendments on the environment and so on, but what do you sincerely think will be the impact to this province and our recovery if the NAFTA agreement goes through?

Mr Drake: I think the adjustments we would expect if the NAFTA deal is ratified would be fewer and much less severe than the adjustments we made to the Canada-US agreement. In other words, I think many of the adjustments—and I stress the word “many”; I'm not saying “all”—many or most of the adjustments have been made.

I think indeed it is the United States that will be doing the major adjustments to the NAFTA deal if it goes through. I cannot sit here and tell you that there will be no adjustments, because I'm sure there will be, and based on the experience of watching the reaction to the Canada-US deal, there may be something that we haven't even thought of, as there was then. But it is our strong sense that most of the adjustments have been made and that any adjustments that took place to the North American deal would be considerably less than we've already gone through.

The Chair: Time has run out. I'd like to thank you for coming before this committee. I think you've actually given us information we can use in this upcoming budget.

1450

INFORMETRICA LTD

The Chair: Mr McCracken, president of Informetrix, welcome back again this year to this committee. You know all the rules in this committee. You've been here enough. You have 45 minutes.

Mr Michael McCracken: Can I get a coffee?

The Chair: Yes, you can. It's going to be a long presentation, if you need a coffee.

Mr McCracken: No, that's to keep awake for the questions.

The Chair: Okay. You're good until 3:30.

Mr McCracken: Okay. What I've handed out to you are just the arrows we've used, I think, on at least one other occasion. I can perhaps just run very quickly through it. You've been hearing numbers from other people. I think you'll perhaps simply want to contrast them and then we can open it for questions.

If we can start with the real economic growth, speaking to the Canadian aggregate economy, which I think is the environment within which you'll be operating, I will have a few words about the province subsequently. With regard to real economic growth, this year is the second year in a row with substandard performance. We're expecting about 1% real growth in 1992, following a decline of 1.7% in 1991.

In the year coming we're probably, at least from what I heard a few moments ago, in the optimistic camp. Real growth of 3.5% is a conditional forecast we're making for 1993, and similar growth in 1994, 1995 and 1996, with investment exports adding to growth and inventory change providing an added boost. The Department of Finance, as you recall, put forward a number of 2.5% in the December economic statement. But this growth, even our 3.5%, is subdued when compared to previous forecasts.

If you turn to the next page, you'll see a diagram of the gross domestic product monthly over this recession compared in the grey line to the previous recession. We are still at this point in time, and this would be through October data, not back to where we were nationally in March 1990. We're still depressed in terms of level of output.

You can also see that after a drop that roughly coincided in the first 10 or 11 months with the previous recession, we have essentially been tracking sideways since that point, with very modest uptake in the last several months. While many pointed out that this recession has not been as bad as the previous recession, clearly it's been as long. It has taken at least as long to recoup the level at the beginning of the recession.

Just so we have some perspective also on where we are, if you look at the next chart, this is a plot of what the potentials of the Canadian economy are on the basis of a growth of approximately 3% labour force plus 1.5% productivity growth. If we take the view that 1988 was potential—and that's a conservative view, both small-c and large—we would at the moment, in 1992, be operating about 9% below the potential of the economy. Over the next several years, with our growth at 3.5%, we begin to close that gap, but looking out over the balance of the decade we find that we do not succeed in closing that gap; indeed it's a number of years beyond before that succeeds with the kind of policy assumptions we're making.

Now 9%, what's 9%? You guys throw numbers around all the time. Let's just translate that into about $60 billion of wasted output per year that we're not producing, that we could be producing with the people, the capital that's idle and the smarts that we already have. This doesn't require any magic other than managing our economy better.

On the interest rate front we are expecting some further declines. We had hoped to see more of them this year. Some of us have been disappointed at the hiccup in September, October and November which brought interest rates back up. In 1993, however, we think the prime can go back to 6% or less by the end of the year or earlier and we think we'll see some continuation of lower interest rates in the 1994-95-96 period, helped by reduction in real interest rates.

My warning to you is, of course, and I think I've warned you of this on several other occasions, don't bet against the Bank of Canada. They are certainly capable, and they've shown that again this fall, of reversing field when they feel the dollar is under some pressure or the economy is starting to grow a bit too rapidly.

On the inflation front, 1992 has been a particularly low level of inflation or rate of inflation. We expect something on the order of 1.7% on average for the year compared to last, and the November numbers on a year-over-year basis are in that same ballpark, coming off of a very high rate of 5.6% occasioned by the introduction of the GST in 1991.

This year, 1993, we're expecting a somewhat higher pay, some 2.8%, and averaging about 2% per year over the 1994-95-96 period. That 2.8% reflecting, as does this year, some of the consequences of a depreciation of the Canadian dollar.

These targets that we're forecasting on the next chart lie well within the band of the Bank of Canada's targets and hence there is no reason for any bashing by the bank of the Canadian consumer.

The unemployment rate this year: a slight decline average compared to 1992, 11.1% versus 11.3%, as the average for 1992, but nothing spectacular. The good news is that we're growing rapidly enough to stop the unemployment rate from rising, and that's essentially what is meant by potential growth rate. A growth rate of around 3% is sufficient to stabilize that unemployment rate and make a little bit of progress on it perhaps.

In 1994-95-96, again some modest improvement, but it is unlikely, with the kind of forecast we're making on the output side here, that we will get the unemployment rate nationally below 10% by 1996. You'd require much more rapid growth to achieve that.

Federal government balance 1992: We're suggesting there may be some modest improvement in the calendar year compared to 1991. In 1993 we expect again some improvements, an up arrow here meaning a balance moving towards possible deficit declines to $27 billion in 1993. These are on a national accounts basis; if you want a public accounts basis, add about $5 billion to the numbers.

One of the reasons the 1993 deficit improvement is not more is the delay in the unemployment insurance premium hike for a year, announced in the December economic statement, which adds about $3.7 billion to that number. In 1994-95-96, however, we would suspect, even with a reversal on the UI side or some uptake on the UI premium rates, that government balance will improve, helped by low interest rates and the return of growth.

1500

Exchange rates: The basic message there, as you've already heard, is that in 1992, following an appreciation in 1991, the dollar depreciated, averaging some 83 cents for the year. In 1993 to 1996, we're making an assumption of about a 79-cent dollar for the balance of this period. That may still be somewhat overvalued, but we expect the bank will only slowly turn loose. As I indicated to you earlier, while interest rates are coming down, they still remain high in real terms.

The consumer in Canada has been buffeted in 1991 with the decline in per capita terms of some 2.8% in growth. That continued in 1992 with a further hit of about 1.4% decline in per capita terms, reflecting higher unemployment insurance premiums at the beginning of the year, slow growth in wages and other taxes eating into income, and 1990 was also a weak year for real disposable income per capita.

In 1993 there will be a modest improvement, roughly 1%, and in 1994, 1995 and 1996 we would expect a continuation of that pace of improvement. That is not substantial and it leaves you at the end of 1996 still well below the per capita income levels of 1989 or 1990, but we will at least see consumer expenditure begin to pick up.

Just very quickly looking at the unemployment rate so far in this recession, the diagram by province that I've provided to you for this recession suggests that through December of this year Ontario's increase has been some 6.3 percentage points more than any other province; more than Newfoundland and indeed double that of western Canada and about 50% higher than a number of the Atlantic provinces as well.

Also, Ontario came into this recession or started in terms of a rising unemployment rate much earlier than other provinces, some 4.8%, the base level being reached in April 1989 and then rising since that time. These little hash marks that you see in certain lines indicate a few months in which the unemployment rate did decline on sort of a three-months basis. In the middle of 1991, it looked like we might be out with a slight decline in unemployment in Ontario, Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, and we got back into the pit after only a few months. At the moment, in terms of unemployment reversing, BC is the only one that's had a declining unemployment rate in the last several months.

Compared to the last recession, Ontario's increase was 6.2% over a shorter period of time, roughly a duration of about one year. So it rose more rapidly and it started at a higher base, 5.9% versus 4.8%. Hence it got higher, but the magnitude of the increase was somewhat—well, it was about the same order of magnitude as has occurred this time around, 6.3% versus 6.2%.

In case the question comes back up or for those of you who were asking about this recession vis-à-vis others, you might just file away, in the 1982 recession, the substantially higher jump in unemployment in Alberta, BC and Newfoundland compared to this time around.

In Ontario, as all of you I'm sure are aware, our data lags are such that you don't have actual data yet even for 1991 much less 1992, but the sense we have is a decline of about 3% in 1991 in real terms on gross domestic product, with that hit coming not just from the weakening in consumer, business, construction and government restraints but also slowdowns in exports and inventories. Federal and provincial budgets added restraint, giving us a negative year.

In 1992 it would look to us as if our growth was about 1.6%. That's slightly above the roughly 1% expected nationally, with somewhat lower interest rates, improved trade, lower inflation and a recovery in housing starts helping pick up the growth in 1992.

We would expect in 1993 the growth in Ontario would again be slightly higher than the national, with investment and exports expanding, inventory change picking up and also auto exports to the US of particular help, and growth in the 1994, 1995, 1996 period averaging, again, about a half a point higher than Canada as a whole.

This growth, however, is quite subdued relative to previous recoveries. I think on other occasions we've talked about the double-digit growth that occurred in the post-1981-82 recession.

All forecasts that people put out, ourselves included, are conditional on a number of assumptions. There is no other way to do forecasting unless you just pull numbers out of a hat. Certainly we're making a number of assumptions: no OPEC price shock, and we're assuming that the GATT deal does not fall apart, so we don't get any adverse shock to the system and have protectionist fences being erected in Europe and the US. We are assuming that real interest rates can continue to decline, although we're doing so slowly. And although we recognize that both the US and Canadian financial systems are having their difficulties, we are assuming that those are met and that we do not run into a complete shut-down of credit or a failure of financial institutions to the degree that both consumer and business confidence is shocked.

We also are assuming, at least for the next several years, that we have in fact put the constitutional debate behind us and that we don't try to divert our attentions to that in a major way or that there is no major follow-up. But that's an assumption; we should not be assuming that's automatic. And we have no major shooting match between federal and provincial governments in our forecast. We are assuming they will have roughly similar tensions as in the past: no great partnership leading to improved economic performance, but at the same time, no tit-for-tat policies that push us and again shatter business and consumer confidence.

That will give you a sense of at least the outlook and some of the assumptions behind it. I'm yours for questions until you blow your whistle.

The Acting Chair (Mr Paul R. Johnson): The Chair is returning; maybe I should let him proceed. He's going to give us our time frames. We're going to start with the PCs.

The Chair: We've got 24 minutes, eight minutes a caucus. I've just been trying to get the Amethyst Room. It seems like Remo—you have to get down on your knees to get that room. Okay, we'll start off with Mr Carr.

Mr Carr: He's the only Chairman who wears makeup to be on TV. We know he likes the limelight. Don't tell him I said that.

Mr Phillips: Hansard may have picked it up.

Mr Carr: We do like to have a little fun around here occasionally.

I'm interested in what your recommendations would be from the Treasurer's standpoint. I remember that last year you came in and had the reputation of being more forthcoming with some of the recommendations. The US is going to lead some of our recovery because of exports, but I'm thinking specifically about Ontario consumers. As you know, last year the budget put a surtax on anyone making $53,000—a massive surtax—which hurt consumer confidence.

I'd ask you, if you were the Treasurer, specifically with regard to taxes, what would you say he should be doing in the budget?

Mr McCracken: He has the advantage, at least in past practice, of following what the federal government does, following the federal budget. Last time, when he saw a personal income tax cut federally, along with restraint federally in other areas and on the spending side, he quite properly said, "Oh, you left that there for me," and filled in the hole very quickly.

1510

If the federal government does nothing or moves to restrain, then it's going to be awfully tough for the Treasurer of this province or any province to move to stimulus. All you will be doing then is twisting the consumer or business with movements in the opposite direction. If the federal government does move in a stimulative fashion, with, for example, a reduction in the goods and services tax or some changes on the personal income side, I would encourage the Treasurer of Ontario and indeed those of other provinces to consider complementing that, moving in the same direction, reinforcing those movements, with the hope that together there may be sufficient to kickstart this economy.

That might take the form of a temporary reduction in the retail sales tax. It may take the form of a reduction in the tax on investment goods: retail sales tax on non-manufacturing, non-processing. It could take the form of some moves on the personal income tax side, although most economic studies we and others have performed suggest that if your interest is in jobs and in growth, you get more bang for your buck out of the indirect tax side, the sales tax side, than you get out of income tax, and certainly more than you get out of corporate tax changes. The other area of course where you get a bang for your buck is on spending, particularly infrastructure spending in the province.

I would certainly encourage, first, for him to think about the direction, net, that he's going to move. I think the economy still needs stimulus. It needs it from wherever it can get it. One reason for pointing out to you this 9% gap in output is to point out that there's no danger we're going to run into a brick wall any time soon—it's almost inconceivable we could overstimulate at this juncture, we are so far from full employment or from potential output—and the first order of business is to get the direction right, to get us closing that gap rather than opening it.

We think we will see some of that. We have the December economic statement in mind in making this forecast, but we're assuming there is no major stimulative action in the federal budget or in the provincial budgets in the numbers we've given you.

Mr Carr: I think you're right. One of the difficulties we've got is that provincially and federally we go in different directions. It's not only here we've done that.

You came in last year, and I remember we were talking about the tax structure as well. If I remember correctly, you came up with a bold solution regarding the corporation tax. I don't know if you remember it, but you said with the percentages we get out of corporation tax, which I believe is somewhere in the neighbourhood of around 7%, last year you said if this government wanted to do something bold, it could reduce the corporate tax provincially altogether, and it would be something to show the business community it was a little different.

Looking at the finances and the deficit and so on, what would you recommend with regard to corporation tax, knowing that in the province of Ontario we only get 7% of our revenue from it? What do you suggest the Treasurer do specifically about the corporation tax?

Mr McCracken: On the corporate tax side, if you want to eliminate it, I think if you'll recall I suggested you might want to get the same revenue another way with the equivalent of a GST or what used to be called a business transfer tax. But the point of doing that is simply to give a signal to the business community that you're trying to motivate it to go somewhere. I suspect at this point in time, when people's focus is on what's happening south of the border, when people's focus is on, "Is there any reason to change my mind from pessimism?" any kind of a tax reform move is not going to catch their attention in the same way a spending change might, although it will be interesting to see what the Fair Tax Commission reports out, and I guess corporate tax would be one of the areas it might be looking at.

Again, I have no strong concern about the corporate tax side. At the same time, I think we want to make sure that in one form or another corporations do contribute to the society in which we live.

Mr Sterling: Mr McCracken, last year you and a number of other economists who appeared in front of this committee predicted real GDP growth in the province quite in excess of what really has happened.

Mr McCracken: About double. I think we were about 3%, and we got about 1.6, I think, is what we're now saying happened, right?

Mr Sterling: I have that you predicted, for instance, 4.8%.

Mr McCracken: For 1992 or for 1993?

Mr Sterling: For 1992.

Mr McCracken: I don't have my submission from last year, but that's fine. The point was that we had a US recovery that was substantially stronger, with an auto pickup that was substantial, and of course Ontario benefits substantially from that.

Mr Sterling: You weren't alone. The TD Bank, which was here before, predicted a 3.6% GDP growth and the conference board 3.5%. Couple that with some of the other things that are happening and you wonder why the economists are so far off. The difference is significant in terms of what has happened over the past year: 3.5% to 1.5% is 66% off, if you want to look at it that way. Why were the economists so far off on this?

Mr McCracken: It's easiest perhaps to talk about it at the national level. The Department of Finance, if you recall, in its February budget last year was reporting some 2.7%. They now are saying 1% between February and December, and I would say that would reflect the revisions that most have made.

When you look at what's happened, the US economy has not recovered as was thought it would at that stage. Most people were looking at a 3%-plus growth last year. That's faltered and come in perhaps around 2% on a year-over-year basis, maybe even less.

The Canadian dollar weakened, I would say, roughly in line with what people expected, but the drop in interest rates that was expected did not materialize as much and that was the area of difficulty. That reflected in more weakness in non-residential construction, the building side, which has been dropping like a rock this year, and not much strength—in fact, we'll see what numbers come out in the end, but certainly weaker machinery and equipment investment than had been anticipated and substantially weaker inventory buildup, which last year had been expected to all by itself add a per cent of growth this year; it's in fact taken away growth.

Those are the main elements to it. I think this has had further weakness in the consumer, occasioned by the fact that the productivity growth in 1992 has been better than anticipated by most, so employment has in fact been weaker. That means payrolls are smaller and that means real disposable income grows less, so you have a weaker consumer on top of that. Those would be the main areas.

Mr Sterling: Do you equate any of—

The Chair: Mr Sterling, we've run out of time. I was just waiting for Mr McCracken to finish up his answer.

Mr McCracken: I'll try to make my answers a little quicker.

Mr Sterling: Could I just—do you equate any of it to this government's policies, particularly Bill 40, the labour bill, which was so vociferously objected to by the business community?

Mr McCracken: I don't. I heard the screams and the yells. It has been in for a few months now, and it's not clear that it's had any places where you can say, "Here's what it's caused to happen." It may become a factor in subsequent years, although whether that will be a positive or a negative factor remains to be seen.

Ms Swarbrick: Mr McCracken, I have two questions for you. The first one is that you've referred to the positive impact that housing starts have had on the recovery. I've read in different articles some people even saying that the recovery has been led by housing construction. Mr Drake had referred earlier to the increase in housing starts from 1991 to 1992 being very much in the social assisted housing field, that in the other housing areas there had actually been a drop in the starts from 1991 to 1992. I'm wondering if you'd indicate whether that would then lead one to believe that the Ontario government's housing programs have in fact very much had a positive impact on the recovery.

Mr McCracken: Well, certainly in 1992 it's helped. Keep in mind that we wouldn't typify 1992 as a recovery. Unemployment still rose.

1520

Ms Swarbrick: On the small amount of recovery that has—

Mr McCracken: It kept it from being worse than it might have otherwise been. Certainly, to the extent that those can continue, that will continue to underpin growth. We have a continued improvement in housing starts in Ontario and nationally in 1993. I think we're currently looking at about 190,000 nationally. We're still putting the final touches on all of our most recent forecasts, but certainly social housing is a positive thing from the economy's viewpoint. It's also very positive for the people who occupy it, giving them a place to live or to get off the streets, as the case may be. So you would do social housing in many periods even if there were not a recession.

Ms Swarbrick: Mr Drake from the Toronto Dominion Bank referred to the recession being the result of high interest rates and also exacerbated by restructuring. In answer to Mr Harris's question about why Ontario was hit harder by the recession than other parts of Canada, Mr Drake answered that our competitiveness was lagging because there wasn't as much restructuring in Canada as there was in the US as a result of the recession in the early 1980s.

I'm wondering, number one, whether you would say then that the governments of the 1980s should have been more forward-looking in Canada, to have helped industry to restructure to help prevent us from ending up in a situation with such a hard-hitting recession, and number two, whether the kinds of priorities and policies the Ontario government is now following in terms of the areas of heavy emphasis on job training, for instance, where we're putting 24% more dollars this year into job training than last—this is the most money any Ontario government has ever put into job training—whether that and the kinds of policies we're pursuing for research and development, capital investment, infrastructure etc are the kinds of right-headed policies this province needs to help move us into a stronger recovery.

Mr McCracken: After that question, how can I say more than yes? Let me just clarify a couple of things. This recession clearly was a policy-induced recession by design. Up until a few months ago, you could still get people bragging about it. Certainly, its effects through a higher dollar and higher real interest rates had a particularly adverse effect on Ontario. Ontario gets hit about twice as much from a rise in interest rates or a rise in the exchange rate as any other province, and in some sense you got both of those. That's really why this recession, even though it's milder in national terms, has been just as severe in Ontario as the previous one in terms of job loss or output loss.

The kinds of changes you've elaborated on are certainly the kinds of things one wants to do. At least that's what we want to try. The thing I would point out is that both the federal government and the provincial governments are talking about doing all of these things. I think the key is that we get them done.

The 25% increase in training is off a pretty low base. That's the promised training this year of 25%, up from 1992. I think it's very important that this government makes sure it delivers on that and gets that training done, because it certainly should help. It should help people adapt. Rhetoric won't do it. You've got to deliver on the programs. I'm not suggesting the Ontario government is unique in this. There's lots of talk federally, lots of talk elsewhere, lots of time has been going on talking about restructuring, yet we still seem to be caught up on the simplest things like how to work out arrangements between the federal government, the Canadian Labour Force Development Board and OTAB at the provincial level to get something significant happening. It's the kind of thing where you would like to grab people in a room, hit a few heads together and say, "You don't come out until you've solved this problem so we can get on with delivering services." So I think it's very important that we not only talk about what we're going to do but also talk about what we have done, to make sure that those who tell you they're going to do 25% more training do it.

Ms Swarbrick: Mr McCracken, you've said that up until a few months ago you could still find people who would brag about this having been a policy-induced recession. Who would brag about that kind of thing?

Mr McCracken: Oh, anyone: the Bank of Canada, the Department of Finance. This was a desired tendency to slow down the economy—it was overheating—to cool things down. We were too close to full employment, too close to having inflation get loose. I think even they now are just beginning to appreciate that maybe they have done a bit more than they planned.

Mr Johnson: How much time do I have?

The Chair: You've got about two minutes left.

Mr Johnson: Mr McCracken, the recovery is going to be very fragile. I think you've said that. There are many external factors, global factors, that will impact on any recovery in Canada. Canada is a very small country; large in size but small in population and small in economic dynamics, I think, too. Of course, there are the internal controls that I suggest the federal government has the most control over, for example the Canadian dollar and interest rates and some taxes. When you're trying to do an analysis and bring forward to us this document that you have, do you take into consideration some of the external global factors over which we have no control?

Mr McCracken: Oh, indeed. We would be making assumptions about growth in Europe, Japan, the US, interest rates abroad and so on. Indeed, it's Europe not performing well in 1993 that has caused us to take a slower view than was the case a year ago. A year ago, there was optimism that not only would Europe expand in 1992 much more than it has but that, with the year of 1992 having become a factor, it would be entering a period of relatively rapid growth in 1993, 1994 and 1995. That certainly at the moment is at risk. It is our best reading that almost every European country this year, 1993, will grow below potential, meaning rising unemployment, and that they will be going through the kind of agony that we have in North America last year and the year before. Even Japan has now been added to the casualty list, if you will, of subperforming economies for 1993.

In spite of that, given Canada's strong linkage with North America, we are optimistic, and I would say at the moment we are probably a bit on the optimistic side compared to other forecasters about the US economy. There has been a positive announcement effect with Bill Clinton's election, and we feel that, net, he will take some policy actions in the next few months that will move them up from a consensus forecast in the US of about 2.5% or 3% to probably 3.5% or 4% for 1993.

Mr Kwinter: Mr McCracken, I want to go back to your comments about the unemployment rate. I was particularly interested in your observation that the unemployment rate this year would be 11.1% as opposed to 11.3% last year but that was basically because of the growth in the workforce. In real numbers, though, according to your projections, there will be more people in Ontario out of work this year than there were last year. Is that a fair comment?

Mr McCracken: Regarding the unemployment rate reduction in Ontario, you'll probably get more of your labour force coming back, so you will have probably a similar number of unemployed and maybe more in 1993 than in 1992. That will be because you have sometimes had a hidden amount of unemployment as a result of people leaving the labour force, going back to school or dropping out. Those people will come back and, as a result, give you more rapid labour force growth even though your employment may be improving. In other words, it's possible to have more job creation, as we expect you to have, just a rough number, something like about 100,000 more jobs in 1993, and at the same time have 40,000 more unemployed, because your labour force would have gone up by 130,000.

Mr Kwinter: The point I'm making is that in real numbers there will be more people unemployed this year than last year although the percentage—

Mr McCracken: May or may not be different.

1530

Mr Kwinter: Yes, it may not be different.

The other point is that when you show the comparison between 1982 and 1990 you talk about the low productivity in 1982 and the fallout of the recession creating high productivity in 1992. That leads me to believe that there's going to be less of a takeup of the unemployed because you've got the higher productivity, which means these companies will be able to meet their requirements without hiring people, because they've got higher productivity, whereas in 1982 there were a lot of layoffs but, because of the low productivity, when business started to pick up a lot of people were re-employed. Have you done any studies on that, as to what is going to happen to the workforce?

Mr McCracken: Yes. It doesn't quite work that way. There was a productivity pickup coming out of the recession in 1982, 1983 and 1984. Indeed, the unemployment rate nationally rose in 1983 compared to 1982, precisely because people came to the labour force. There was some employment growth, but it wasn't enough. You were getting good productivity growth. You got good productivity growth in 1983, 1984, 1985 and 1986, as the economy continued to expand. Keep in mind that in some of those years we had growth of 6% plus. We expect that kind of what we call cyclical productivity growth to occur when we're bouncing out of a recession. It certainly hampers the job creation, the employment creation.

This time around we're not getting terribly strong employment creation, because we have a much more muted recovery. The kind of productivity growth that we're getting, to the extent that we're getting much, is less cyclical in nature—we're not getting big spikes in it—more associated with the fact that we have been adding, surprisingly, a substantial amount of machinery and equipment investment in the last several years, in spite of a recession that would normally make you hold back on that investment. We're not productivity pessimists, but because the growth is slow and the gap in output stays fairly large, we're not expecting a big cyclical improvement in the next few years.

What does all that stuff I just said mean? It says that you can have 3% growth, 4% growth even, in the province and you're going to be, unfortunately, disappointed with the kind of employment growth that you get out of that. But, you know, if you want to get more employment growth, the way you do it, get 5%, 6% or 7% growth, that's going to take a much more vigorous consumer and business person to achieve.

Mr Kwinter: That was exactly the point I was trying to determine. In your opinion, notwithstanding the growth in the economy, it's not necessarily going to reflect in an increase in jobs.

Mr McCracken: That's right. I mean, 100,000 sounds great, but not after you've been losing 300,000 or 400,000.

Mr Phillips: I'd just like to get your advice. In the last couple of years in Ontario I think we've lost a couple of hundred thousand jobs. In the next four years, the government's assuming we'll pick up 500,000 new jobs—that's the underlying economic assumption—which is about 10% growth in jobs. As an economist, in what sectors would you see that kind of job growth occurring?

Mr McCracken: I don't have it at my fingertips. We have some forecasts of it by detailed sectors, but most of the job creation in Canada is occurring in the services sector—business services, consumer services, health. There is less so in education, but there is some in education. You don't get much in manufacturing. Indeed, while we might have positive growth in manufacturing, it's unlikely that we're going to be back this decade to the manufacturing employment that we had in 1988. That's nationally and/or in this province. You're going to be looking for it elsewhere.

The reason you get it elsewhere is basically because you've got incomes being generated and people are buying those services. You'll have incomes generated in manufacturing, you'll have some pickup in employment, high-paying jobs, but you don't get big growth in that sector. That would be the picture, if you will, in a snapshot way, of where the jobs might be.

Mr Phillips: In the service sector?

Mr McCracken: Mainly in the service sector, and that doesn't mean McDonald jobs.

Mr Phillips: I understand that, but that's about a 30% increase.

Mr McCracken: It can be finance, it can be—you know, 70% of the economy is in the service sector, so it's not surprising that's where the jobs are.

Mr Phillips: The other question I have is just any advice you have for us in terms of how the global investment community is watching Canada right now in terms of the collective debts and deficits of the various levels of government, and I guess ultimately the public. Should we disregard that or is that something we need to view with concern?

Mr McCracken: I think you can't ignore it, but I wouldn't pay homage to it. I think all this stuff is relative. Certainly, the Europeans now are focusing on their own problems increasingly, and the Japanese, who are alleged to be down on Canada on January 2, look back on their own economy and can see some strong reasons to say, "Maybe we'd better diversify our portfolio as well." I wouldn't get overly worked up.

The key thing—I think we've talked about this before—is that if you can get your interest rates down and your real growth up, these two factors, narrowing that spread or indeed hopefully reversing it so that real interest rates are less than real growth, are going to take care of your debt instability problems and will put you into a much more healthy situation as an individual, a provincial government or a federal government, or indeed our relations internationally.

As we bring rates down and as people see that our growth prospects pick up, I think you'll find that Canada gets back on the list of good lookers from the viewpoint of international investors and indeed of Canadians, who often are those international investors.

The Chair: Mr McCracken, it's a little past 3:30, but that's all right. We wanted to hear that last answer. I would like to thank you for appearing before the committee.

Mr McCracken: My pleasure.

The Chair: I always like your slides—

Mr McCracken: There you go.

The Chair: —and your pamphlet here. It's always very plain and easy to read. I'd like to thank you for appearing again this year.

Mr McCracken: If I come back next year, I'll bring cartoons. How's that?

The Chair: Thank you.

Mr Sterling, it seems that Mr Mancini has given us a definite no. I will excuse you from committee for half an hour if you want to go down and talk to him. It looks like we'll be in this room tomorrow.

Mr Sterling: It's unfortunate for everybody, but that's the way it is.

The Chair: I bend a little bit more as the Chair, as you know, Mr Sterling.

Mr Sterling: Sure.

CANADIAN IMPERIAL BANK OF COMMERCE

The Chair: The next one we have is the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce and Mr Whitehead. Welcome again this year to the standing committee on finance and economics. You have until, I believe, 4:15. I hope it's more good news.

Mr Tim Whitehead: Mr Chair, members, I would like to begin by thanking you for the opportunity to appear before your committee once again this year. As an economist, I'm not used to being invited back to speak, so I'm very appreciative of the invitation.

I note that the letter of invitation said that your committee was interested in hearing my views and analysis on the current state of the economy and my forecast of economic performance over the next year or so. I have chosen not to take those terms of reference as limiting. Instead, while the first part of my comments will deal with the economy and the outlook, the second will contain such advice as I am able to give in regard to the preparation of the budget.

The economic outlook: When I met with your committee last year, my forecast for the Ontario economy was that it would grow very slowly in 1992, that the unemployment rate would remain high and that both interest rates and the dollar would decline somewhat. On all four counts, I was guilty of understatement, particularly so in the case of the dollar, but the general trend of the weak recovery has largely transpired.

The fact that this weak, perhaps even statistical recovery has not resulted in significant job creation is of course the critical concern. If we assume, as general rules, (1) that real growth has to be at least 1% to compensate for labour-saving productivity improvements, and so lead to net job creation, (2) that employment growth has to be at least 1% to offset growth in the labour force, and so lead to a decline in the employment rate, and (3) that firms are particularly reticent to hire workers in this uncertain economy, then it is a simple arithmetical matter to see that real growth must be a good deal more than 2% just to keep the unemployment rate from rising. Most estimates are that real growth in Ontario was about 1.5% in 1992. Correspondingly, we saw the province's unemployment rate rise considerably last year.

1540

Will the situation be any better this year? I don't presume to speak for the other presenters today, but most forecasts I have heard suggest that Ontario will grow by between 3% and 4% this year. The CIBC forecast calls for about 3.1%, marginally better than the national average. This, according to the simplistic method I've just outlined, would lead to a very small decline in the province's unemployment rate. Our forecast has the jobless rate falling from 10.9% in 1992 to 10.6% this year.

The strongest growth prospects are in the export sector, where the nascent recovery in the United States and the relatively low Canadian dollar bode well for Ontario's economy. I am less sanguine about the outlook for non-residential investment. My perception is that businesses, as pressed as they are to invest to meet competitive pressures, are still wary of the economic and policy climates. I don't have a specific growth number in mind for non-residential investment, but I am sceptical that investment in machinery and equipment will grow in real terms by the 7.5% envisaged in the Treasury and Economics outlook.

The big question mark, both in importance and uncertainty, is the consumer sector. Continuing high unemployment and the threat of downsizing will probably constrain consumer confidence for some time to come. Even so, after four years of relative restraint and with interest rates down sharply, the Ontario consumer should be returning to the market. Which will dominate in 1993, continuing economic uncertainty and a lack of consumer confidence or a gradual end to belt-tightening? My sense is that consumer spending will grow somewhat faster than the provincial economy, with spending up by about 3.5% in real terms.

Overall, we at the CIBC are looking for growth of 3.1% in 1993, as I said, a modest increase in employment and a very small drop in the unemployment rate. Another important factor for the province's revenues is that inflation should remain very subdued. In Ontario, the rate is likely to be little more than 2% in 1993. I've included a table outlining my forecasts at the end of my handout.

I've talked in terms of the economists' constructs of the expenditure categories. Let me turn to discussing the outlook in more concrete terms.

On an industry basis, we expect relatively strong growth in transportation equipment, plastics, logging and forestry, and electrical and electronic products.

In the case of the transportation equipment sector, which includes automobiles, and forestry, this growth represents just some recapturing of ground lost during the recession.

Industries which are expected to lag behind the overall economy include primary metals, machinery and equipment, construction and metal mining.

On a regional basis, the forecast suggests a very weak recovery in the northern parts of the province and a relatively stronger recovery in the greater Toronto area. The rest of Ontario should see growth approximating the provincial average.

Regarding the upcoming provincial budget, this projection of continued sluggish recovery and sparse job creation is not a good environment for budget making. An old rule of thumb is that in the absence of tax changes, revenues grow at 90% of the nominal rate of growth in the economy, and so the sluggish growth points to weak revenue growth. I'll have some more detailed comments about revenue projections in a few moments.

The slow pace of job creation means that the province's tremendous burden of welfare costs is not likely to ease in 1993. Low inflation will help to contain the growth in other costs, and the relatively stable interest rates will give the somewhat cold comfort that debt-servicing costs will rise at a rate approximately equal to the growth in the province's outstanding debt. Overall, the economy's performance will not make it easy to achieve a significant reduction in the province's deficit in 1993-94.

I want to devote some time to the revenue projections because I have a number of very serious concerns on this score.

In his 1992 budget, the Treasurer included a medium-term projection of revenues and expenditures. Revenues were to grow from $44.9 billion in fiscal 1992-93 to $48 billion in 1993-94, based upon, among other factors, the assumption of the Ontario economy growing by 3.2% and 6.1% in nominal terms, that is, with inflation included, in 1992 and 1993, respectively.

In his most recent fiscal update to the Legislature, the Treasurer indicated that, to quote him precisely, "in the absence of further policy changes, we now estimate our total revenues next year will be $4.2 billion less than planned in last year's budget." I believe he's right. But let's look at the revenue projections contained in last year's budget. I've included a graph at the end of my handout.

From the revenue projection for 1992-93—that's $44.9 billion—subtract the items which were essentially one-time sources of revenues: the fiscal stabilization grant from the government of Canada and the sale of assets, $2.2 billion together. The resulting $42.7 billion represents revenue from ongoing sources.

If we assume that this revenue grows at 90% of the rate of nominal growth in the economy, the 6.1% that was included in last year's budget, then revenues in the absence of further policy changes would grow to $45 billion in 1993-94. Add about $500 million to take account of the full impact of the taxes introduced in the 1992 budget and some bounceback in corporate income taxes. The resulting projection of revenue for the province of Ontario in 1993-94 is $45.5 billion.

The discrepancy between this projection and the $48-billion figure included in last year's budget is $2.5 billion. Without revenue enhancements of some sort, the province will fall short of that amount. The downgrading of growth projections—they mainly have been on the inflation side—since the 1992 budget has probably added to that shortfall.

I want to return to another aspect of the revenue projections which I have mentioned briefly in passing, the inclusion of one-time revenues in the operating account of the budget. In its first budget, the government made a very sensible move to split the account into two parts, operating and capital, to reflect the fact that some expenditures should be viewed as investments, should be amortized over a number of years and should be recognized as one-time expenditures. The same logic would suggest that one-time revenues such as those arising from the sale of assets should not be included in the operating account.

Having analysed a lot of provincial budgets over the last few years, I put a lot of emphasis on a full representation of a province's financial situation, weaknesses as well as strengths. This moves me to make the suggestion, and I realize that it's an ambitious one, that the committee consider recommending a fundamental change in the province's accounting methods. Instead of cash-based accounting, the province should consider moving to accrual-based accounting. This would mean that expenditures and revenues would be recorded when they are incurred as opposed to when the cash actually changes hands.

Under the accrual method, the federal fiscal stabilization grant would be recorded as revenue in the year for which it was, in effect, earned, 1990-91 and 1991-92. Instead of selling land to a crown corporation, in order to recognize its appreciated value, reassessments would be conducted periodically so that the province's balance sheet was a reasonable reflection of the situation. Commitments for expenditures, be they grants to municipalities or other transfer partners or contributions to pension funds, would be recorded in the year they were incurred.

This would be a major change but it would do much to reassure citizenry and bond-holders alike that the finances of the province of Ontario were open to view, were in effect transparent. New Zealand has already chosen to adopt this more transparent form of accounting as a step to more open government.

I want to conclude by returning to an idea I suggested in my presentation last year; that is, that the government should consider establishing the expenditure side equivalent of a Fair Tax Commission, a group of outside individuals to examine the ways in which public funds are spent in Ontario and to recommend ways to save money as well as identify the associated costs, if any, to the quality of publicly provided services in the province. I would even structure a group after the pattern of the Fair Tax Commission; that is, I would have working groups focus on specific categories of expenditure for a fixed period of time. For example, a working group might examine social assistance and reassure taxpayers that fraud is minimal or that all reasonable efforts are under way to eliminate fraud if such is the case.

I know that members of this committee share the concern to save money where possible. I think this effective expenditure commission, as I call it, would serve a useful purpose in this regard. I also believe that an effective expenditure commission could achieve the equally important goal of assuring the taxpayers of Ontario that their tax dollars are well spent.

That assurance is vitally important. Everyone in Ontario, it seems, questions the value they get for their tax dollars. Part of this stems of course from the fact that taxes are high and continue to rise. It also comes from the fact that people frequently do not perceive much benefit from the taxes they pay.

We pay a lot for education in Ontario, but parents perceive that their children are not keeping pace with children in other countries. We pay a lot for health care, and I think certainly by comparison to other countries, we get good value for it, but there are perceptions both inside and outside the health care sector that much of the money is wasted. Social assistance and income support absorbs about 20% of the province's operating budget. The vast majority of Ontarians strongly believe in helping the less fortunate, but there is also a widespread suspicion that some of that budget is wasted and that there are people abusing the system. Finally, as debt-servicing costs continue to absorb more and more of the province's revenues, it will be increasingly difficult to convince taxpayers that the associated debt was accumulated for good purposes.

On this score, I need hardly tell you that people generally are no longer satisfied to be told by politicians that tax dollars are being managed prudently. There's a credibility gap for whatever reason. Economists share it.

1550

This is why I believe that a thorough, independent, believable review of the ways the government spends tax dollars is essential. I worry that without such an effective expenditure commission, there will be a continuing and gradual deterioration in how the average citizen perceives the use of her or his tax dollars. That could contribute to more businesses leaving the province, more individuals taking their marketable skills elsewhere and more resources devoted to tax avoidance and tax evasion.

An effective expenditure commission will not of itself solve this problem of course, but at the moment I cannot think of a better way to start.

Chair and members, by way of conclusion, let me summarize my key points:

The Ontario economy should grow by a little more than 3% in 1993, but the pace of job creation will be disappointingly slow and the unemployment rate will average in the mid-10% range.

Based on the economic projections contained in the 1992 budget and the latest updated outlook from Treasury and Economics, the province cannot expect revenues of $49 billion in fiscal 1993-94 without revenue enhancements of some sort.

To provide a fairer, more complete, more transparent statement of the province's financial situation, the committee should recommend that the current system of cash-based accounting be replaced by one of accrual-based accounting.

This committee should recommend the establishment of an effective expenditure commission composed of outside and independent persons to consider the effectiveness of government spending.

Again, I thank the committee for the opportunity to appear before it. I'd be happy to answer any questions you may have.

The Acting Chair: Thank you very much, Mr Whitehead. The normal rotation would go to the government side.

Mr Ward: I think it's the general consensus that the recession or depression, however you want to define the tough economic times we've experienced over the last couple of years, has been more than a simple business cycle and that we've undergone tremendous structural change to our provincial economy.

We heard from an economist before you as well as the Toronto Dominion Bank. They're both relatively optimistic in projecting economic activity in the year 1993 as well as in future years. I believe you share that same sense of optimism to a degree. Do you feel, from a provincial standpoint, there is limited action that can be taken on the economic front and that the province should really be focusing on long-term policy implementations dealing with these structural changes rather than the business cycle?

Mr Whitehead: I'd agree with almost all your points. I think this has certainly not been just your typical downturn as part of the business cycle. Certainly it has been superimposed with a lot of restructuring. It has also had a demographic component, which perhaps other speakers have spoken to, and the fact that people are out of their peak spending years. There's that baby boom factor.

I'd quibble with one point about optimism. The 3% growth I'm talking about for next year doesn't really constitute a lot of optimism in my mind. It's still pretty meagre growth given what we've gone through.

As for the important part of your question, as I understand it, can the province do very much about the very short term economic situation, I would argue that almost no government in Canada can do anything about the very short term. In fact a lot of our problems have arisen because subsequent governments going way back have made ongoing efforts to try to ameliorate the very short term downturns. Rather all governments should put more focus on trying to correct things for the longer term.

That really addresses more the restructuring issue. Whether governments can play a very big role in aiding that restructuring is another question. It's very difficult for governments, as for anybody, to pick winners and losers. To the extent that they can help with infrastructure, job training and that sort of thing, perhaps there's a role there.

Mr Ward: From that I'm gathering you're suggesting that governments should be attempting to put in place or assist in the fundamentals so that the private sector can have adequate room to grow and prosper rather than concentrating on the short-term, fiscal outlook of tremendous job creation through short-term stimulus.

Mr Whitehead: I would certainly recommend against short-term stimulus to try and create jobs. As for what the government can do to help with the longer-term environment for the private sector to create jobs, I would balance the desire for infrastructure or job training against the negative consequences, some of that, and that is a higher deficit and consequent tax increases down the road.

Ms Swarbrick: I share your concerns very much about the continuing apparent deterioration and I believe there is a continuing deterioration in people's perception as to how well their tax dollars are spent. That's something that I know has troubled me considerably. I'm going to give some serious thought to your proposal around the effect of an expenditure commission, because I think something needs to be done.

One of the things I'm wondering about, though, is that you're talking about the concern about welfare abuse and that being a means to help redress people's concerns around that. Given that, as you also refer to and many others do, the great increase in unemployment caused by the restructuring of the recession and the other factors that have led us to such a significant recession are really the causes behind it—and I assume you would agree with me, and that will be a question to you, I guess, too—and given the tremendous effects of the recession and that the unemployment it has caused is clearly the biggest factor in the increase in the number of people on the welfare rolls, I'm wondering if you wouldn't agree that in fact then the biggest way to reduce the welfare costs would be to create jobs.

If we look at what Mr McCracken was saying, that the recession in fact was a policy-induced recession, that you can look at people setting out to say they've got these goals of trying to in fact depress the economy that led to it, I don't understand why we couldn't establish goals that clearly were geared to being able to stimulate the economy in a way that would create that employment. So in spite of what you've just answered to Mr Ward, I'm wondering if you could paint the picture as an economist of what kinds of policies you think would help to meet that kind of a goal of employment creation as the best way to get people off the welfare rolls and save all of our tax dollars.

Mr Whitehead: Okay, there are a number of questions in there. Regarding the first part, the dramatic increase in the welfare costs of the province, I can't find anybody who would argue that it has not been a consequence of the deep recession that we've just had. It's not fraud, no matter what Diane Francis may write; it's clearly a fact that unemployment insurance has run out and people are back on welfare.

The bigger question, though, is: Can the government do an awful lot to get those people off welfare in the short term, or will it cost it even more to create those jobs than the ongoing maintenance cost of welfare? I am somewhat doubtful that the government can really spend money in such a way that it gets people off welfare and saves money that way by stimulating the economy.

Let me phrase this precisely. I believe that the cost to the government sector, and that would include the federal government, is greater to create a job than is actually saved in terms of costs to the government sector, because the best that could be hoped for is that you would get these people off welfare and get them back working, which I'll grant you is a desirable social goal in itself. But in terms of the pure numbers, all you do is shift the burden to the federal government and the unemployment insurance and then get to buy yourself a respite before you have to pay for the welfare costs again. What you need are sustainable jobs and ongoing jobs, and I'm not sure that the province can do that in the short term.

Ms Swarbrick: What about the long term?

Mr Whitehead: The only sustainable jobs you're going to get in the long term are from the private sector, and to me that comes back to the answers I was giving to Mr Ward. Primarily, you've got to have a proper business environment to create the jobs. I don't mean low taxes by that—I don't think superlow taxes are the answer—but a stable, believable future of taxes that are not going to continue to go through the roof, and in fact should level off, and a reasonable infrastructure.

1600

Ms Swarbrick: So would you say putting more money into creating jobs in the short term by building the infrastructure for the long term, such as our government is trying to do, is in fact one of the good policies that needs to be pursued? Would you say more needs to be put in there?

Mr Whitehead: No. Actually I'd be concerned about doing that, because I think when you run up the deficit, what happens to consumers is they become very scared. The deficit, the provincial deficit in particular, has become a bit of a barometer of this recession. The fact that we've had a couple of 11-digit deficits, I think, has done as much as almost anything else to scare consumers into thinking that the economy really is going to hell in a handcart. To run up that deficit even more, even if it's going to have long-term benefits, may in fact exacerbate the situation and cause people to retrench even more.

Ms Swarbrick: But you sound like you're doing what I think a lot of economists do. Basically, you put out a nice generality of, "Create a stable environment and not let taxes go through the roof," but what else? I mean, surely people like yourself have some kind of innovative ideas in terms of what are the things to get us there in the long run, and you can start being specific about them instead of just being negative about some of the things governments like ours are trying.

Mr Whitehead: I'm not trying to be negative. I don't want to leave that impression.

Ms Swarbrick: I appreciate that, but be positive and specific.

Mr Whitehead: Okay. I understand the desire to spend money in terms of infrastructure, but there are difficult times that we're facing at the moment. If you try and spend money on that infrastructure, you run the risk of pushing up the deficit and so scaring people even more. I would say far more important is to make a lot of the tough decisions on the expenditure side—and the government has made a number of tough decisions, but you're going to have to make more, it seems to me, because that's the only way you're going to be able to reassure people that their taxes are not going to continue to go through the roof.

Ms Swarbrick: Is that the only solution?

Mr Whitehead: It's the one that comes to me immediately. I could go into little detailed suggestions. The one that occurred to me a few days back was maybe a tax on hydrocarbons matched by incentives to spend on energy savings: a revenue-neutral tax. It might encourage people to go out and actually spend money to refit their homes, or whatever. That's a proactive sort of thing. I haven't tried to do any analysis on that. Perhaps somebody in Energy's doing that.

The Chair: I'm going to have to go on to Mr Phillips.

Mr Phillips: I appreciate the work you've done on this. I think it's insightful. I'll just tell you, my own view on your numbers is that they will solve it. The fiscal stabilization money is not coming in this year; it will be rolled into next year. So that's how $1.2 billion will flow in.

Mr Whitehead: It was rolled in from last year too.

Mr Phillips: Yes, I know. It keeps rolling and then the day the budget comes out the deficit is higher than it was expected. I think they may keep selling assets next year as well. They've got unlimited assets. It's a paper transfer to themselves. So that's how, in my judgement, they will get more revenue next year. The deficit will be announced, the day of the budget, differently.

I agree with you personally on the accrual versus cash basis. If this were a company, there'd be no accountant in Canada who could sign the books. I do think the books don't reflect the numbers for the public. They're not doing anything illegal, they're not doing anything that other governments haven't done, but it's wrong.

Another thing that will happen this year is that several capital corporations will be set up. In my opinion, the prime motivation is to hide the real deficit, so the deficit will be reported at $6 billion instead of $10 billion. You say here, though, that you think that's a good idea, or at least you like separating capital from operating, which is one thing, but setting up the capital corporations—I guess my question is: Have you had a chance to look at the concept of the capital corporations and do you have a comment on those?

Mr Whitehead: I would answer that, in fact, again by reference to my accrual accounting, you could set up a capital corporation to—let's take a concrete example, if you will, of investing in roads and collecting the tolls and whatever. The value of those roads and the value of the debt outstanding would be netted against the budget, so it would have to be recorded in each budget. If in fact the value of your roads went down and you still had all that debt, even in those crown corporations, that would be reflected in your deficit for the year and the government would have to record that the value of the debt outstanding had been reduced. So it would be captured under an accrual accounting basis.

Mr Conway: I'm just a substitute to this committee, but I must say I found your presentation very good, very helpful, very focused. Just one complaint, to be perfectly honest: I get angry, quite frankly, and I become furious with financial institutions that come to me these days and talk about the need to restrain expenditures—which I agree with, by the way—and then the only example we can all find is the social assistance account.

Mr Whitehead: No, I'm sorry—

Mr Conway: But it's the only one cited. I know you understand that the net has to be wider. I've been muttering here all afternoon at some of these bank presentations, because I've just watched the conclusion of the Charles Keating trial in the United States and I've just listened to the Blenkarn hearings in Ottawa about what I'm doing as a federal taxpayer to underwrite the outrageous misconduct, apparently, in some of these financial institutions, provincially and federally, licensed and non-regulated. I probably don't want to know how many hundreds of millions of bucks the unemployed in my constituency are going to have to pay to clean up the mess that has been created by incompetent governments and financial institutions, some of them even class A chartered banks, whose behaviour over the last five years has been greedy, immoral and, more important, is going to cost the federal taxpayers of this country a lot of money, I suspect.

I'm sorry for kind of going on about that, because I think your presentation is very good.

Mr Ward: Don't be sorry. What do you think about that?

Mr Conway: Maybe you want to comment, because I really like your point about an expenditure control. I sat in a government for five and a half years and I think your point is very powerful. In our politics, which in the last generation has become a potlatch of special interests, when well-financed, powerful people barking shamelessly with very weak cases continue to get funding from local, provincial and federal governments, boy, do I want to see your effective expenditure commission.

One of the questions I have for you on that, given the reality of politics, particularly as practised by an upper-middle-class élite, is how do we make this commission actually have the effective bite you and I desperately want it to have?

Mr Whitehead: Can I preface my remark by saying we aren't class A banks; we're schedule A banks. There may be a big difference.

Mr Conway: Apparently there is.

Mr Whitehead: I would also, out of duty, argue that we have not been immoral, scandalous or greedy. We have, in some cases, been foolish.

Mr Conway: When I think about the 2,300 people who are going to get their pink slips from—is it your bank?

Mr Whitehead: It's actually 2,500. It is, yes.

Mr Conway: The national news tells me that some of that has to do with your involvement with some of the really high-octane commercial real estate speculation of the 1980s, which we're now told was transparently dangerous from the very beginning. But that's probably unfair.

Mr Whitehead: I fundamentally disagree with that as well, even if I might be one of the 2,500. Who knows? But I think in point of fact that's not the case.

I would also want to emphasize that when I raised the social assistance portion of the budget, I am most concerned about the perception that it's unfair or a waste of money or that there's widespread fraud. I mentioned, I think in answer to Ms Swarbrick's comments, the Diane Francis type of columns. I am concerned that there's a big perception out there that welfare recipients are not just down on their luck, they're actually ripping off the system. I don't want that to happen. I don't want to get a mean society where it's divided between the haves and the have-nots and there's a war over the budget. I would be much more concerned to show that there's not widespread fraud, to reassure people that there isn't widespread fraud.

I'd be more concerned about the other areas of expenditure. Health care is the one that comes to my mind, and I keep hearing horror stories about health care expenditures.

How to give such an effective expenditure commission the clout is to give it a tight time frame, give it free run and give it publicity, so when its report comes out, it's short, it's succinct and it's readable for the average person. It's not hidden away, it's not filed somewhere, it's not vetted first by some ministry, but it's got to be out in the public. That way, it cannot be swept under the rug.

1610

Mr Conway: I agree with you. I think it's a very good recommendation. I become angry on the subject of social welfare because I've been in politics now for 18 years and most people I know believe there is widespread abuse on that account. I happen to believe that while there is some abuse, it's not nearly of the order of magnitude as imagined; quite frankly, it's probably, as a percentage, not nearly as high as some of the abuse and some of the corporate welfare that has been well documented by a number of people over the years.

As a practical matter and as a politician, if I'm going out, particularly in these environments, I've got a fairly high pain tolerance and it's becoming higher all the time. I think the weight of your presentation, the direction of your presentation, is very correct. When I look at what any government in this province is going to have to do over the next few years—I don't know why I would stay in the business of politics, but I intend to, because I guess I'm just that perverse.

Well, we laugh, and that's the easy response.

I come back again to the effective expenditure commission. It's 10 years ago that one of this province's leading business authorities, and a very fine fellow, Duncan Gordon, came to a health care panel where I was present, and he outlined a very compelling and a very credible effective expenditure commission for the health care sector. But he concluded his presentation by saying: "This will apply to 252 of the"—then—"253 publicly funded hospitals in the province. It does not apply to the hospital of which I'm chair of the board." He went on to explain why, and it was a very compelling argument. You know, "Everybody else is abusing the system, everybody else is ripping off, but not me."

When I look at your presentation, one of the questions I have, I think very telling, is your calculation about the expenditure shortfall. I think you're right, as my friend from Scarborough has also observed. You're using that wonderfully felicitous Reagan phrase for tax increases: "revenue enhancements." Let's call it what it is: tax increases. Reading your presentation, it makes me believe we would probably have to look at a tax increase in the order of magnitude of $1.5 billion in fiscal 1993-94, together with significant expenditure controls, to achieve the $49-billion revenue figure. Correct?

Mr Whitehead: Not necessarily, but the numbers will bear that interpretation.

Mr Conway: So it's not unrealistic to imagine, with that kind of shortfall, that a tax increase of several hundreds of millions or perhaps $1.2 billion, $1.5 billion, might have to be considered as one of the options to make up that shortfall, if your analysis is correct.

Mr Whitehead: You could avoid a tax increase if you go with an asset sale.

Mr Conway: So you could do it all on the asset sale?

Mr Whitehead: You could. There's Ontario Hydro still sitting around.

The Chair: Mr Conway, I've got to cut you off. Mr Sterling.

Mr Sterling: I'll try to keep it brief so we can keep moving along.

I too am interested in your discrepancy with regard to the $2.5-billion shortfall. I guess you're reading in terms of the Treasurer's indication that in his 1992 budget he was shooting towards a deficit of $8.1 billion for 1993-94; that was his prediction last year. What you're saying is that that prediction of $8.1 billion is off, that the deficit is either $10.6 billion or, in addition to any other shortfalls he might have discovered over the past, he's got to come up with $2.5 billion in new taxes.

Mr Whitehead: He does have a couple of things going for him, which may surprise everyone. The government has instituted a number of expenditure restraints, and that will save it some money in 1993-94 over and above what its projection was of expenditures. They will have the $1.2 billion, the fiscal stabilization grant, which will undoubtedly get folded over into 1993-94. And let's be fair to the government in the sense that how hard could it press the claim for that fiscal stabilization if it didn't include it in the budget? So they do have to include it in the next year if they have any hope of receiving it. If you add those two together, you're getting somewhere in the order of $1.5 billion to $2 billion, so on those two scores alone it's going a long way to getting back to that $8.1-billion figure.

Mr Sterling: I'm intrigued by your expenditure control commission. I've recently read a few of the Fair Tax Commission reports, and it seems to me that when the Treasurer has asked the group to deal with property tax, for instance, it has said, "Property tax is unfair, it's inequitable, it leads to all kinds of problems and you should tax some other way," but they don't tell the Treasurer how to get that $5.7 billion or $6 billion which would be required in order to replace property tax. Then I go to the report dealing with taxation of the poor, and it says, "People below the poverty line as determined by Statistics Canada should not be part of the income tax system," but they don't tell the Treasurer where he makes up that shortfall with regard to what is there.

My concern in terms of setting up any kind of expenditure commission is that, number one, you can't have in the room the people who are in a conflict-of-interest position; that is, if you get people who are knowledgeable of the system, usually they are defensive of the expenditures. We're going to see later this week, for instance, the university people come in and the teachers come in, all wanting more money. Have you laid your mind as to how you would formulate this expenditure commission so that it would give the public and the government the straight goods?

Mr Whitehead: In discussions I've had about it with my colleagues, one of the phrases I've used is a "flashlight," that a lot of government activities, as far as the taxpayer is concerned, are a big black box: Money goes in and somehow it comes out and somebody's benefiting, but it's hard for the taxpayer to know.

In the case of the Fair Tax Commission, what it's really doing is trying to reconcile competing interests, as you've pointed out. In a number of groups they've simply been deadlocked or only been able to come up with the comment that, "You should find the money somewhere else because this isn't a good tax." But in other areas they've done reasonably well. The retail sales tax group was one that did not seem to promise much opportunity for agreement, but it actually did come up with a consensus on a broad number of issues.

In the case of this effective expenditure commission, what I think really needs to be done is a flashlight. We're not talking about a broom to sweep away things right now; let's just show a flashlight so that the average person on the street can feel that people other than politicians and civil servants have looked at this thing and come up with as much in the way of savings as they can or identified the areas of savings as much as they can. There's just the sense that if the only people who get to see it are civil servants and politicians, then I think the average person on the street will not be satisfied that his tax dollars are well spent.

Mr Conway: Can you imagine a flashlight on the Dome stadium in the early years?

Mr Whitehead: "Flashlight" is an evocative phrase, I'll grant you.

Mr Conway: But using that as an example, I just wonder what that flashlight would have found and what we would have done about it. I know what we didn't do.

The Chair: Mr Carr, you've got time for one short question.

Mr Carr: I was looking at the amount we spent on social assistance 10 years ago, in 1982. It was $2.1 billion. This year it will hit $9.4 billion. One of the concerns I've got isn't that people who are on social assistance are abusing the system, but wouldn't you say one of the concerns is that what you can make on social assistance is now such that at the low end of the scale—I'm thinking now in terms of jobs, whether it's cab drivers or something where you don't make that much—literally it's better for you to go on social assistance than it is to take a job? I'm thinking of Bill Clinton, who hasn't been known as a right-wing individual, who is now in the States, if he can get it through his Democratic Congress, saying he's going to link the jobs and welfare together. How would you suggest we do that, in order to get people on social assistance who can work back into the workforce?

Mr Whitehead: I don't have a good answer for that, I'm afraid. I've tried to work my way through Transformations a couple of times but haven't got all the way through. It did strike me at that time that they were really trying to grapple with the question. I'm not sure that right at the moment there really is a problem in terms of the social assistance being so high that it's discouraging people from taking jobs. There aren't many jobs out there to be taken.

Mr Carr: You mean at the low end of the scale?

Mr Whitehead: At the low end of the scale, yes. But I think that if it is a problem, it will arise in 1994, 1995 and 1996. I suspect the bigger problem you have is the overall expenditure level of the government and the deficit. That, with its unsettling aspect as far as business investment is concerned, probably prevents a lot of this job creation.

The Chair: I've got to cut you off now. I'd like to thank you for appearing before this committee. I see you sparked a little bit of interest on the left side over here.

1620

DRI/McGraw-Hill

The Chair: The next group is from DRI/McGraw-Hill, Mr George Vasic and Robert Fairholm. Welcome to the committee. We have 45 minutes. Out of the 45 minutes, if you can leave some time at the end, you'll have some interesting questions thrown at you. You may begin.

Mr George Vasic: Thank you. Let us introduce ourselves again. I'm George Vasic; this is Robert Fairholm. We represent DRI/McGraw-Hill, an economic consulting firm.

I know that you're hearing, as in past practice, several outlooks from several different people. What we are planning is trying to cut the overhead discussion—ie, those things you presumably are already familiar with—and get to the meat of it. What I plan to do is spend a few minutes on the overall Canadian economic outlook. After that, Robert Fairholm will talk about the Ontario side of things in more detail. There should be ample time left over for questions.

Essentially, where we see the world right now is that we are in fact in the initial stages of economic recovery. There appeared to be some stall in October, after the referendum, but the data we have available for November and December for things like employment, car sales, housing starts and the resale housing market showed that things picked up through the quarter and that in fact the brief revival we saw in the summer of 1992 was resumed as we closed the year. Also, the anecdotal evidence from retailers was that Christmas was not too bad, though I'm concerned that their expectations might have been very low after the last couple of Christmases.

You have in front of you a handout which details a lot of our numbers, but I suspect our forecast will be coming fairly close to the consensus number you've been hearing so far, in that for Canada as a whole we're looking for about 3% growth in 1993 and 4% in 1994.

The thing you have to remember about this recovery is that as we go into it, while the recession itself may not have been extremely steep, it has been quite a protracted process and the cumulative effect of what is really nearly three years of recession, followed by stagnation, has opened up the output gap, in our view, by about 9.5%. That's a very large gap that will take a long time to close.

The other part of all this is that we are at this time involved in not only a cyclical episode but a structural one as well. I think you have to talk about the two of them separately. Let me talk about the structural one for a few moments first, because I think for the long term that's the more important one.

I think, contrary to some of the comments you may have heard earlier, the root of our present woes, in that we have a very slow rebound out of this recession, comes from the mid-1980s when productivity growth in Canada simply stopped. We believe the reasons for that are tied to the low Canadian dollar, which sent a very strong wave of corporate profits through the system by 1988 and perhaps gave management incorrect information as to how lean and mean Canadian business really was.

In the second half of the 1980s productivity in Canada grew cumulatively by 15 percentage points slower than it did in the United States. As you know, productivity is the key for our long-term welfare and standard of living. At that time, of course, we had policy measures which, in the short term, exacerbated that. We had higher interest rates as we pursued lower inflation. That appreciated the exchange rate. Furthermore, wages did not resemble the productivity performance we were having.

As a result, when we began the recession we had to address this cumulative cost problem within the context of a cyclical downturn, which is again very unusual. There's nothing to say that because a recession has started, we have a cyclical problem to address. It wasn't the case going into the last recession, but it certainly is the case through the last three years and it will be exerting itself over the next several years.

That 15% gap is the amount by which US productivity grew faster than our own. So even though we've started to see some productivity gains, the US is not standing still either, and even if we beat its productivity numbers by 3% a year, which we won't, it would take five years to close that gap. For example, last year, a year in which Canadian output grew 1%, our employment levels fell 1% and we had a productivity gain of 2%. That's very good for an economy that's virtually stagnant, but it shows you how far we have yet to go. This will be ongoing, and what this means, essentially, is that we will need more economic growth than we have in the past to make sure we get some job growth and to try to make some progress on the unemployment rate.

On the cyclical front, which is the other element, basically recessions are the net result of an imbalance between expenditures and incomes. Here in Ontario we were poised for a very sharp cyclical correction in any event, consumers and business alike, and, abetted by a very strong profile of government spending, all made the boom stronger than it needed to be and as a result we're heading for a much larger bust.

The disconcerting part of our present circumstance is that our progress in rectifying those imbalances to date has been relatively slow. Consumer debt loads and debt service obligations remain very close to their peaks and as a result haven't yet formed a foundation from which sustained and large-scale spending can occur. In addition, savings rates by consumers were very low entering this recession and have remained low throughout, and is not an avenue which consumers can use to make spending growth exceed their income growth.

On the corporate side, corporate profits, as you well know, have been decimated. Even though there is some rebound that we can now expect, in most cases, as a result of firms losing vast amounts of money now losing less as opposed to firms generating lots of new income growth, the fact is that profits remain extremely weak and corporate balance sheets are compromised.

One comment you hear a lot is that confidence is a problem. In our view, that is not the case. We believe confidence is not a psychological phenomenon but rather an economic phenomenon. If you look at consumer confidence, for example, it reacts very predictably to employment growth, inflation, interest rates and so on. We find the consumers are feeling about right given the economic circumstances. They are not so pessimistic that they're feeling worse than they ought to, given the economy, and therefore can't be viewed to be holding the economy back.

On the business side, we find that business is in fact quite optimistic, perhaps more optimistic than it ought to be. Our fear for 1993 and 1994 is that if reality falls short of that expectation, business spending might have to be cut back further. So the risks to our outlook remain on the downside of the growth rates that we've been talking about.

On the international front, something that is also not typical of business cycles is occurring, meaning that the international economies are not in the same time warp as we are in North America. In fact, the North American recessions began first and we are at a more advanced stage. Right now you've heard widespread reports about the European and Japanese economies being at various stages of decline and/or stagnation, and that will make an export-led recovery that much harder to get.

With everything in some sense evening out around the globe, we are not all moving in concert and thus anything more than a slow comeback from this recession is not possible. That means the US economy becomes that much more important. Through the last year or so you've heard quite a bit in headlines about the progress of Canadian exports, particularly to the US, and how that has been really the only engine of growth. Those reports are true. For example, the US economy in 1992 will have grown 2%. Our exports there are probably up 10%. That's a very good performance.

1630

However, what isn't said is that a lot of our exports are captive and occur between multinational firms, and the evidence seems to be pointing to the fact that exports and imports are much more tightly linked than they used to be. So while we're getting a big bang for our exports south of the border, we are importing a lot of goods, doing some work and sending them back, and what you're seeing is that our import numbers are also surprisingly strong.

This year Canadian imports in real terms will be up about 6%, with an economy that's grown by 1%, so the net contribution of exports is not nearly as substantial as you would think, given the export numbers you're hearing.

The Canadian dollar and interest rates: Just to summarize our view there, we see the Canadian dollar as still vulnerable to downside risk. We see it dropping through the spring for any number of reasons. These could include the federal budget and the subsequent round of provincial budgets, if not the upcoming election that is scheduled for somewhere in 1993 at the federal level.

Furthermore, the Bank of Canada is trying to get rates down, which means if there is strength in the Canadian dollar, we believe the bank will use that opportunity to lower rates and get a little more strength going in the recovery since its inflation targets are well under control and since of course there is only one party that really supports its zeal for zero inflation. That happens to be the incumbent government in Ottawa.

There will be increasing concerns about debt quality. This will keep our long-term interest rates perhaps higher than they ought to be. Concerns about the debt quality are of course rooted in the fact of the volumes of debt that we are issuing. On this note—I know it has been said before, but it bears repeating—the provincial finances—and Mr Fairholm will be talking about that a little later on—do resemble the federal situation in the mid-1970s in the sense that though interest payments as a share of revenues were 11 cents or 12 cents on the dollar at that time, the deficit got very large and started to snowball the debt growth.

The problem Ontario faces right now is that the debt growth is 20%, and if we do not bring the deficit down quickly, that debt growth will remain at 20%. That will have the usual impacts on higher interest payments, thus squeezing out the kinds of spending that we all would like to be able to make in the future.

The lesson at the federal level—and remember this started in the mid-1970s, from what was the best fiscal position in 60 years—is that you have to do whatever you can to nip it in the bud. On this note, we would suggest that one should go so far as to undertake tax increases to put the deficit on a firm downward trajectory so as to slow the debt growth, slow the growth in interest payments. At the same time, the major recommendation, of course, on the spending side would be that spending growth be limited.

The previous speakers talk about an effective expenditure program. I think it is something we would echo and is something to which virtually every person on the street would say yes. The problem is not how much we spend; the problem is more how effectively we spend. We need to do more to look into how we're spending the money, as opposed to how we're getting it.

However, that will take time, and large savings from that certainly will not occur in the next fiscal year. In the meanwhile, we suggest that tax increases should not be dismissed out of hand, though they will clearly exert a negative impact on the economic recovery.

If we are in recovery, and I know this is a question to many people, it will serve to slow that recovery, but I think given the choices and given how quickly this can snowball, it is a lot easier to make that choice now, even in this particular economic circumstance, than it will be several years down the road. I know some of you may not be here at that particular time, but I think the entire picture will look a lot better if action is taken sooner rather than later on that front.

In terms of translating that into the Ontario outlook, let me turn it over to Robert.

Mr Robert Fairholm: Let me just re-emphasize some of the points George made, because many of the features of the Canadian outlook are re-emphasized for Ontario.

In particular, it's important to note that there has been very slow output growth over the last year and a half. In terms of employment, indeed, we've had declining employment, especially on a year-ago basis, over the last several years. There are a number of factors George mentioned for Canada which explain this. The important thing to note for Ontario is that the situation is even more exacerbated here. We have a very slow output recovery going, but it has not translated into employment growth.

One of the reasons for this is due to the huge increase in our unit labour cost from 1986 through to 1991. If we compare Ontario's unit labour cost versus our trading partners, in particular Michigan's, we can see that there was close to a 40% increase in our unit labour cost over that time period. Importantly, only about half of this increase was due to the increase in value of the Canadian dollar. The rest of it was an increase in Ontario's unit labour cost relative to Michigan's unit labour cost in home currencies. Unit labour cost, for those of you who are unacquainted with that economic term, is wages per employee divided by productivity per employee or output per employee.

The situation George mentioned for Canada is even worse for Ontario over that time period. This has several implications for Ontario. For one thing, when you have an increase in unit labour cost relative to your trading partners, you tend to lose a share of total trade, so we have a direct impact upon output. Also, one of the things that companies do to combat this problem of the rapid rise in labour costs is to cut back on employment, and that's one of the reasons why we've had such poor employment prospects over the last year or so.

I should also emphasize that even if we took 1991's Ontario unit labour cost and put the Canadian dollar at 78 cents, which is roughly where the Canadian dollar is today, we would still have had this poor situation and the unit labour cost in Ontario would have been out of kilter, by about 35%, relative to Michigan.

Something fundamental has occurred in Ontario which will affect the economy over the next several years. We're going to have a rebound in output, but we're not going to have much of a rebound in employment. This will be particularly true for the goods sector, and especially for the manufacturing sector, of the economy.

I should emphasize that not everything is doom and gloom for the Ontario economy. There is recovery occurring, especially in some of our important trading partners south of the border. Ontario trades to a considerable degree with Michigan and New York state, as well as Ohio and Indiana, and we're seeing signs of improvement there which will help the Ontario situation. Also, of course, there is the decline in the Canadian dollar from the 1991 peak to around 78 cents now. As George mentioned, further decline is expected during this year. This will also help Ontario's competitive position.

Importantly, we see the auto sector as one of Ontario's big winners over the next couple of years, in particular this year. This success will be largely contributed by Chrysler. Chrysler's LH line has, by all reports, done quite well and the prospects are that it will be gearing up quite quickly, up to about 300,000 units by 1994. This will be a major source of growth for the auto sector. Over the 1991-95 period, Chrysler will account for about 63% of Ontario's increase in the number of units of motor vehicles produced. For this particular year, they will contribute roughly all the increase. That's because for GM the shutdown of the Scarborough plant will offset increases in car production in Oshawa, and for Ford we see roughly the same number of units produced this year as were produced last year.

1640

Also for the auto sector, we see that there's a major investment by Ford, $2 billion, to switch over its Oakville plant to mini-van production from the Tempo and Topaz that it is producing currently. The mini-vans have been one of Canada's success stories. We produce a large proportion of North America's mini-van production. This would be underscored by Ford's producing of mini-vans here in Ontario.

The Oshawa 2 car plants are still at risk, but in your term, everything seems fine there. There's a possibility by mid-decade that one or two of these plants could be shut down. GM certainly has still at least two plants that are extra capacity and it's not clear at this point how the chips will fall. If it's strictly on cost per vehicle, my understanding is that we have a comparative advantage, but unfortunately it's not necessarily all determined by economics. We have certain advantages in that we produce a higher quality vehicle and the costs are lower, especially at 78 cents a dollar, but there are political considerations also, whether the United States has allotted the GM shutdowns to date, and it's not clear how politics will start entering into this.

As far as the auto sector goes, we see that as a good engine of growth for Ontario in 1993 and over the next several years. If anything, when we put together our numbers in the fall for the Ontario transportation equipment sector, which you have a copy of, we were unduly pessimistic. We have fairly strong growth, but indications are that with the success of the LH line that growth could indeed be even stronger than what we originally forecast.

Another area where we see rebound in the economy is on residential investment. We see a rebound in housing starts, which will of course lead towards further increase in the residential investment, which will help several industries in Ontario, such as wood and non-metallic mineral products industries.

Unfortunately, the non-residential investment is in a serious downward spiral and that will continue throughout 1993. There is an excess of office buildings in Toronto, a very high vacancy rate, so we cannot anticipate much of a rebound in the non-res sector for several years.

Importantly, another success story for Ontario is electrical products industries. There have been substantial gains throughout 1992 and we see that continuing in 1993. That industry unfortunately is buried in our tables in our "other manufacturing industries" component, but for that industry as a whole it's doing very well and will continue to do well. This is part of the trend within Canada and indeed North America towards increased use of machinery, and we see certainly business investment continuing to be quite strong.

Some of the other strengths in 1993 we see in the service sector. We see a pickup in the trade industry, which is essentially the retail and wholesale trade group, and that should help stabilize that sector. In addition, we see that the communications industry will proceed to grow quite quickly. Certainly, the competition for long-distance phone services will spur that industry over the coming year and over the next several years. In addition, the transportation industry will be powered by the rebound in the goods-producing sector.

In general, there are a few good spots of growth in the economy. There are still some laggards; 1993 will be a year where we start to see some sustained growth in some very important sectors, but there will still be some drag in the economy from the lagging sectors.

In terms of the deficit, when I went through the numbers in last April's budget I came up with a number of close to $12.5 billion, and then we started all the various accounting fiddles and asset sales and the hope for fiscal stabilization funds, which account for the differential.

In some sense, the actual deficit number is somewhat moot, because we can have another raft of accounting fiddles which could distort our view of what the numbers are, or certainly what the official numbers are. So it's important, from my perspective, to start off with about a $12.5-billion deficit for the current fiscal year and to understand that it is not unusual for the deficit to actually worsen during the first year of recovery.

Since we've had very little recovery so far, we can almost think of 1993 as being the first real strong year of recovery. I would anticipate that we are going to see some further deterioration in the budget deficit for the coming fiscal year until the situation stabilizes and the deficit starts to come down, assuming no major change in policies.

In terms of changes in policies, I would certainly recommend that there be a combination of both revenue increases and expenditure restraint. If you look at the numbers, the Ontario expenditures have been rolling along at a very rapid pace over the last two years, well in excess of inflation. It's an obvious target to try to restrain the expenditure growth, but I don't see how we can do it just on spending restraint alone. We'd have to have revenue increases also.

In terms of revenue increases, certainly one of my favourites would be on the consumption tax side. On this side, if we—I know it's probably a dirty word for some of us—harmonize with the federal GST, that would be an obvious step to be made. I don't think that's enough. There's going to be no doubt of a requirement or need to increase the tax rate, as well as broaden the base, to try to bring in the revenue that will be required.

Also, I think another area where we can alter the revenue picture is by applying more user-pay provisions to various services, including higher tuition fees for education, parks, roads, for example, some way to match up the expenditures with further revenue.

Before I finish with revenues, I would, if possible, try to avoid another income tax hike, because once you hit a 50% marginal tax rate, there's a disincentive to work and an increased incentive to avoid taxes. It is not beneficial to keep cranking up the marginal tax rate. It is helpful to try to restrain it at 50%, and already we've exceeded that level. So I would try to avoid further income tax increases on the personal side. Certainly, the consumption tax is one area. You could think of combining that with a low-income supplement so that those who are less well-off are not too negatively affected.

On the expenditure side, if there is a move to increase capital expenditures, it has a number of benefits in the near term—it has a fairly high multiplier effect on the economy—and in the long term it tends to help growth productivity, so there are a number of benefits to capital expenditures. If you're going to introduce it, and, say, increase infrastructure investment, there should be some very transparent way to signal to the financial markets that these expenditures are going to be paid for, preferably by the user.

If you simply start trying to pump-prime the Ontario economy through higher infrastructure and investment, there's going to be a negative hit on your debt rating and you're going to have to pay a higher penalty through higher interest rates. So if you are going to proceed with capital expenditure, it should be very transparent that there are going to be additional revenues coming in to pay for these expenditures.

1650

In terms of some of the other areas, where you could alter your spending mix would be with respect to public housing. One of the reasons for the need for public housing is because of the policy that has been in place since 1973, I believe it was, for rent control. All the studies I have ever read indicate that rent controls tend to cause major distortions in the rental market and reduce the number of rental units over the long haul. To try to offset that and eliminate the need for publicly financed housing, it would be preferable to have removal of rent controls with some type of supplemental rent subsidy or supplemental rent assistance for those who are hurt by this change in policy.

In terms of health care, the latest numbers that I saw coming from the provincial government indicate that its budget estimates are pretty much on track, which I find something close to remarkable, since there was a minuscule increase in health care expenditures forecast in the last budget, and as per the midyear update, from what I recall, I think you were a couple of dollars below estimate. It's truly remarkable, the improvement that has occurred in health care expenditure, but we need a lot more of it.

There are always a number of horror stories that come out of the health care industry about excessive spending, about people who are going essentially on vacations paid by the Ontario taxpayer to tropical destinations for their various ailments. So I would suggest that although the improvements that have occurred in health care in such a short period of time are laudable, this has to be sustained. Health care is such a huge portion of expenditures that this sort of control has to be maintained to have any hope of turning around the deficit in the future.

In terms of education spending, it has been indicated that Canada is one of the worst countries in the world in terms of value per dollar. An Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development study indicated that we spend an awful lot on education but we don't seem to get an awful lot for it. Although I'm not aware of Ontario per se, I would be very surprised if it was anything different here. It's not a question of spending necessarily too much on education; it just appears that the whole way we're spending is wrong, given the results we're having.

Obviously, some restructuring in education spending should be pursued. Some areas where I could see some changes might be, as I indicated earlier, not being an expert in education itself, to increase tuition fees but also increase access to loans and make larger amounts available.

Also, it would be useful to do either one of two things: Unbundle school board spending from municipal spending so that the taxpayer can see what the school boards are spending relative to municipal governments. My understanding of the situation is that school boards continue to crank up spending and municipal governments in general are fairly restrained in their spending, and that is one of the major reasons why the property taxes keep escalating. It is not so much municipal government but school board spending. To demonstrate or provide this information to the taxpayer, where the increased spending is coming from or where taxes are coming from, would certainly be helpful. Secondly, or in addition to that, we should try to restrain the school board spending. Huge increases in expenditures at this point in time seem to be somewhat unwarranted.

The Chair: Bob, if you don't mind giving some time, I see some of the members would like to ask a question here.

Mr Fairholm: Okay. I'm sorry.

The Chair: If you could give some time, it looks like just about three minutes and Mr Conway is sitting on his—

Mr Conway: No.

The Chair: Okay. Have you got a speech or just a question?

Mr Johnson: He always has a speech.

Mr Conway: Only an observation. What's said about the education account is quite stimulating. I just wondered if you really wanted to get creative and talk about the industrial-commercial assessment, that local wealth that allows certain patterns of local expenditure to be positively astronomical in some areas and not in others; whether you wanted perhaps not only to look at tuition but also at the way in which we pay our professors and our teachers relative to the Belgians or the Singaporeans and others. But those are matters for another day.

The Chair: Mr Kwinter, you've got a question?

Mr Kwinter: Mr Vasic, I just wanted to ask a question. In your projections you show the unemployment rate for Ontario in 1993 at 11.8%, in 1992 at 11.2%. Most of the other economists who have appeared before us have shown that the unemployment rate is going to go down. I'm just wondering why the discrepancy. You feel that it's going to go up fairly substantially.

Mr Vasic: Let me start off with an overall point. The reason for this is that there has been an unprecedented exodus of people from the labour force in this recession, for a variety of reasons. Normally what happens is, when you go into a business cycle, employment falls but the unemployment rate doesn't actually rise by as much as you would think because a lot of people drop out of the labour force. In this cycle, the amount of people who have dropped out is much greater than it has been in the past.

If you go back to 1981-82, that might have added about 0.8 percentage points to the unemployment rate. In this cycle it's adding more than 2% to the unemployment rate. If you did it with the same what we call the participation rate as occurred at the peak of the cycle and neutralize that, we'd have an unemployment rate that was well into the 13s.

As job prospects, slender as they may be, start to appear, some of these people get attracted back. Most of them will get back into the labour force. In fact we expect long-term the rate will be at some point higher than it was going into this cycle. So you've got 2.2% by our calculations, nationally, to absorb.

You've got to remember you've got population growth and labour force growth of 1.5%. If you've got another 2% to digest, you've got to look at 4%, 5%, 6% rates of growth before you start getting the unemployment rate down in a more meaningful way, and this is separate from the fact that for a given rate of growth, since we have to have higher productivity gains, we're going to be getting less employment increases than we would have out of an earlier cycle.

Now for the Ontario, Robert, if you want to add to that.

Mr Fairholm: One of the features of our forecast for Ontario is that we anticipate that there will continue to be fairly strong net immigration to the Ontario economy, which will boost the source population, the adult population. Combined with that, we have fairly slow employment growth because of our labour costs being so out of line, as per what I was talking about earlier, and because we'll have to take several years to bring that situation more in line.

Mr Kwinter: Just one last thing on unit labour cost: Do you factor in the cost of our universal health care versus the United States, say, in Michigan, where they don't have that? Is that calculated in as a factor?

Mr Fairholm: For total unit labour costs for the economy as a whole, yes. That includes, for the United States, all employer payments for various things, such as health care.

Mr Sterling: All the economists are predicting that there is going to be some kind of recovery this year. Quite frankly, they did it all last year as well and they were all overly optimistic, some more than others. Do you think the Treasurer should or should not raise taxes of any kind if in fact a recovery and some consumer confidence is about to emerge? Should the Treasurer raise taxes?

Mr Vasic: We think we should. As I said earlier, if there's anything we've learned historically, it is that you've got to nip this in the bud. It's already a major problem. But if the debt growth is allowed to snowball, it is going to be harder and harder to do.

1700

Yes, it is clear that the forecasts a year ago were too optimistic about 1992 as it turned out to be the case. Still, we have to put forward what we believe is our best estimate for the future, and this is what it is. Certainly this may not be the year to put in the major thrust of it, but the problem with that line of argument is that if you look at it through the 1980s, which was a period in Ontario of nearly unprecedented boom, and even nationally a very strong period of growth, throughout it there never appeared, in that seven- or eight-year expansion, a right time to do the job that was necessary. At some point you've got to start.

It may be difficult now but it will be worse later, and so we suggest that some measures of tax increases should start to come in this year, but obviously with greater force the following year. We can't do it alone on expenditures, especially in the short run. There are some big fixes needed on things like education and health care in terms of getting more value for the dollar in the kinds of spending that we do. But those big fixes are not going to be forthcoming in the next year or two, and we can't let this thing snowball out of control while we wait for these large thoughts. Perhaps the best thing that can come out of it is that the financial pressure forces us to evaluate those options because otherwise we wouldn't have.

The Chair: Okay. Oh, did you reply for the Ontario? Go ahead. I'm sorry I cut you off. I'm watching the clock all the time here.

Mr Fairholm: I would just reiterate what George said. We have to do something at this point because otherwise it will spiral out of control, and expenditures alone are not enough.

The Chair: Okay.

Hon Mrs Coppen: I have two quick questions. I, my colleague Mrs Harrington and our Chair, Mr Hansen, all come from the Niagara area, which has been devastated by the news of closures in our automotive plants, especially St Catharines GM. During these hard economic times, would you suggest that the government intervene? There's been talk in the community of the government even buying a plant, a foundry, for $40 million to $60 million. How do you see that helping or hurting our economy?

Mr Fairholm: Part of the problem with the auto sector at the moment is essentially in GM's lap. It has massive excess capacity and it has to cut back. There are going to be communities that are going to be very much hurt by this, but to go in and buy an auto parts plant would be very difficult, given their situation, to then sell it to them, because they have too much capacity anyway. They're trying to trim back. Then you have to question, who could you sell it to? You would essentially be displacing some other Canadian plant when you did that.

Canadian auto parts producers have been a relatively good success story. To try to go into that situation and try to essentially push over somebody else would not be a good long-term solution.

Hon Mrs Coppen: Another quick question: When you were talking about—

The Chair: I'm sorry. I've got to cut it off because it's 5 o'clock and we have another appointment here. I'd like to thank you for coming before the committee. I find it very useful the way you've laid out all your sheets here—agriculture, fish, trapping and forestry—which gives us an insight into all sectors of the economy. Thank you for coming before this committee.

CONFERENCE BOARD OF CANADA

The Chair: The next group is the Conference Board of Canada, Dr James Frank and Brian Hollohan. Welcome to the committee. You might be last, but we saved the best for last.

Dr James Frank: We have provided a fair bit of material here for you. I'd like to, if I could, move through some opening comments. There are some speaking notes in your handout that I'm going to just skim through to try to catch the highlights. We will be updating our provincial forecast—in fact, we're working on it right now, and we will ensure that the committee receives copies of that—and that will give you a very current outlook on Ontario. I suspect we'll have that ready for you within the next—

The Chair: Just to give you an idea, we're sitting the weeks of February 22 and March 8, so it's a while before we will be writing our report.

Dr Frank: We'll be sure to have that to you before then.

As in other years, we're really very pleased to have the chance to come and talk to this committee; the Conference Board has been doing this for a number of years. We're a leading forecaster in Canada, and I want to tell you just briefly about the organization because it's going to colour what we're going to say to you today.

We are a private, not-for-profit corporation. We're located in Ottawa. We do our research and our forecasts and so on for all of our members, and we have members in all sectors and all provinces of the country: government, business, labour and so on. Our mission is to be the leading private sector applied economic research organization. We're not a theoretical organization; we're interested in providing material to help people make decisions more effectively.

One of the things in our mission statement that I indicated to you in other years is that we try to be objective, independent and non-policy-prescriptive. I admit to you that that's a challenge at times, and as I listen to presentations before various committees, not only here but also in Ottawa, I am always struck by that. We're not here today to lobby on behalf of any particular point of view. We're going to try simply to tell you what we think is going to happen over the next year and hope that it's useful to you as you go through the next few weeks.

In the material I've given you is a copy of an article that appeared in the Canadian Business Review about a week or so ago and also the executive summary of the Canadian forecast, which will be released shortly—the government of Ontario has already received it—as well as copies of the remarks I'm going to make today on our consumer attitude survey executive summary.

We're more optimistic now than we have been for the last while about the outlook, and we expect that growth in 1993 is going to be somewhere around 3% to 3.5%, inflation at 2.5%, but the unemployment rate, as your previous speakers indicated, sticks upwards of 11% throughout the year. So it's not going to be a rapid recovery in terms of employment. The strength on the domestic scene does come from the consumer coming back into the market over the next six months or so as interest rates decline. That's why the headline on that Frank Talk article says that unless we get interest rates to continue to fall, this recovery is at some risk.

At the board, we have been doing a lot of work over the last few years on the value of the Canadian dollar. This is a central issue in this outlook, and I want to comment briefly on that. We've been telling the members of the Conference Board that they ought to try to be positioning themselves to remain competitive and be able to survive at an 85-cent dollar, that that is the most intelligent strategic positioning to put themselves in. We think that remains good advice despite what has happened to the currency over the past six or eight months.

There are a lot of factors that affect the currency, and I've listed some of them in those comments. But one of the risks we face over the next, let's say, six to nine months is political uncertainty and instability. We know at the very least that international investors worry about the value of their assets; in other words, the value of their bonds, when they buy Canadian or Ontario bonds. We've seen what can happen when political instability hits us in a big way, as evidenced through the period of the constitutional debates.

1710

We believe that wide spreads are going to have to prevail between Canadian and US rates in order to allow us to borrow the amounts of money we need to finance our existing government debt, which totals about $600 billion, federally and provincially, and that's not counting crown corporations. The fact is that our overall provincial and federal deficits in fiscal 1991-92 totalled $56 billion; they will total another $55 billion this year. What that means is that we will have added approximately $110 billion to our national debt in the past two years. Now, 20% of that debt is held offshore for federal debt and 40% for provincial debt. It's obvious that we're going to have to borrow a lot. Roughly $56 billion is held offshore for the provinces and about $90 billion for the federal. So you can see why the value of the currency is so important to foreigners: When they experience a devaluation, they lose asset values.

As we look ahead over the next while, we think the Canadian dollar is undervalued at its current value; we think it's worth something in the order of 83 cents as you move towards 1995. We are conscious of the difficulties in trying to estimate purchasing power parity, but there are reasons that the Canadian dollar should outperform the US dollar over the next few years. We can talk about those if you're interested.

When we look at 1993, trade is, if you like, the primary driving force, along with domestic housing and residential construction. We're expecting the US economy to grow about 3% this year. I just came back from San Francisco yesterday, where we spent a lot of time talking about the US outlook, and the general sense is that things are turning reasonably well in the United States, so that outlook, I think, is fairly sound.

Canadian exports we figure will grow somewhere between 5% and 6% this year. Housing starts in the US are turning around nicely. And of course auto and parts exports did reasonably well last year, and we expect we'll get positive growth this year and then again in 1994. Ontario will benefit from that, as will Quebec, of course, because Quebec is producing a new Firebird and Camaro line and Ontario is producing the new Chrysler LH products.

My colleague Brian is going to talk a little bit about the Ontario scene, so I don't want to spend too much time on that.

Natural gas, chemicals, electricity and other manufactured goods are the areas of strength on the export side. A lot of that comes from this devaluation we've had, so it is important to see that without the kind of reduction in our currency value that we've had over the past year, we certainly wouldn't be talking about 5% or 6% growth in exports.

The problem with all this is that unemployment stays high. Employment declined last year by about eight tenths of a point, say 1%, and it's a very serious situation. We have continually been frustrated by what's happened on the employment front, and the good news that occurred just last week on overall employment growth in December at least is a bit encouraging.

Manufacturing is a problem. I think you're all familiar with that. Employment dropped by 4% last year. We have been asked repeatedly by groups such as yourselves what the mix is between structural and cyclical. We can't answer that adequately. We don't know. Our suspicion is that there is a much more structural component this time than there was in 1981-82. Suffice it to say that it's going to take us until the end of the decade to get back to where we were in terms of overall employment in manufacturing in this country, so we have a serious shortfall that has to be made up there.

When we say the fate of the outlook lies in the hands of the consumer, we mean that pretty literally, because with weak employment growth and even the kind of growth we're forecasting for the coming year, the consumer continues to struggle. The debt question, disposable income that's devoted to interest-servicing costs, has been falling nicely. It's going to take probably another six months minimum until we get back down to levels that are in the 7% to 8% range, where people seem a bit more willing to take on additional debt. It's going to be a slow process, but it's moving along as you would expect.

We're only forecasting 2.3% growth in 1993. That's twice what it was last year, so if you want to look at it that way, it's a positive thing.

One of the surprises that may emerge here has to do with this issue of cross-border shopping. You may know this is not properly reflected in consumer spending in Canada when people shop across the border. I know from talking to retailers in Canada that there has been a sharp decline in cross-border shopping. This will effectively mean that people who were spending their money in the United States will be spending it in Canada, and that in itself could turn out to be a bit of a surprise for us. We, as forecasters, don't quite know how to handle that because there are no sources of good data on it, but it's one up side that I think is realistic.

The problem on the interest rates front is tricky. We had everything working very nicely until September and then, as I indicate in one of those articles, the interest rates moved up sharply. We had constitutional problems, we had Maastricht problems in Europe, and the rise in interest rates that occurred in a matter of about two months offset all the gain we'd had previous to that.

In our forecast now, we are explicitly assuming it will take us until the summertime to get back down towards the rates we had in September of last year. In other words, it takes a long time. We're expecting now that there'll be another half-point decline in treasury bill rates in the first quarter of this year and another half-point in the second quarter. If you're sceptical about that, you've a right to be, because a lot of things can happen to slow that up or set it back. We certainly didn't anticipate what happened in September and October, and we're always chastened by those kinds of events. But that's the sort of interest rate outlook we have. It's only in the summer months that we flatten out and we see a very gradual movement upwards as we get towards 1994.

Something funny happened last year, and it had to do with real wage gains. In the recession, as serious as it was, and with the kind of growth that was occurring, we didn't expect to see much on the wage side in real terms, but it actually happened. The reason it happened—in retrospect, we can see this a bit more clearly—is that wage increases did not decline as quickly as inflation, so there were unanticipated gains in real wages and that helped to generate 1% growth last year. That's not a lot to write home about, but it was a factor.

We're not going to get that this year, we think. The surveys we're doing at the Conference Board and that we did this fall among all our members, on the pay outlook, suggest that the adjustments are going to be in the 2% to 2.5% range this year. That suggests to us that there won't be any windfall gain, if you like, that will surprise people in terms of purchasing power. We're only forecasting a very modest growth this year.

Governments of course are taking a position that's quite aggressive. At the federal level, they've proposed no increase at all this year. This will be the second year in a row. We will see what the provincial governments do as they get into that position themselves.

There are two areas of confidence that are important. I have some good news here for you, in a sense. I just got the numbers this afternoon on the phone after I left, so you can add to the notes I've got there, if you're interested.

In terms of consumer confidence, we had a setback in the fourth quarter. The index dropped about 10 points. We're not shouting much of an alarm on that front at this point; we think that's just an aberration. It had to do with interest rate problems we had during the period just prior to the survey being taken. We're hoping it will be reversed in the first quarter this year. The way things are turning out right now, I think that will occur. Nevertheless, we did have a setback there.

The interesting thing about Ontario is that it too had a drop: The index dropped from 80 down to 70. Ontario's got a fairly low index of consumer confidence, at least historically and also at the present time. Quebec is much more optimistic.

In terms of business confidence, the number that's going to get released over the next week or two is much improved over the third quarter. We had a setback there again and it dropped nine points. It's bounced back up now to 137, so we've recovered what we had before. The volatility that occurred in the fall around the Constitution, currency weakness, interest rate rises and all that scared people, scared business people. At least on the business side, it's starting to turn around a little bit. I'm feeling a lot better than I was a while ago in terms of business outlook for the next year.

Just to give you an idea, in the fourth quarter of 1989 the index was 123, then it dropped to 78 in the fourth quarter of 1990; from 123 to 78. Then in 1991 we rose to 98, so it came up 20 points, and now we're 137. We've had three years of movement upwards in the fourth quarter, and I think that is encouraging in terms of what to expect.

On the business front, in terms of investment, we have really quite weak business investment. The only area where we have strength is in residential construction and housing. Keep in mind that corporate profits have really been beaten up over this recession. We had a drop of $35 billion, peak to trough, and it's going to be a number of years before we get back to where we were before the recession started. All of this is going to work against a pickup in investment.

1720

One area that is strong, of course, is housing. You can see the numbers we're talking about there: something in the order of 200,000 starts in the country this year. With residential construction growing by 7%, that is one of the other bright spots.

Plant and equipment spending remains weak. You've heard this already this afternoon. It declined last year 11% and we forecast a decline in 1993 of 4%, so we're just going south yet with that. There's nothing really in the cards there. There are no major projects coming along. We are still assuming Hibernia will take place, but there are no big-ticket items that we can see in the near term that are going to lead to any turnaround in spending there.

The area where we have had business investment growing fairly well is in machinery and equipment spending. This has been moving ahead very nicely and of course is associated with trying to enhance competitiveness. We see that carrying on in the coming year.

Before turning over to Brian, I want to just conclude with a couple of comments on both the fiscal policy and monetary situation. When you look at government revenue over the next year, things are going to be a lot better than they have been for the past two years in terms of revenue growth. We're forecasting about 5% growth in personal income this year, and that's about twice what you had last year, so the base for personal tax revenues is going to increase. In other words, even if you hold the tax rates constant, you will collect more personal income tax revenues.

Total direct tax collections from provincial governments, including personal tax collections, will go up, we think, around 7% this year. That compares to a decline of 3% last year. So you can see how things have switched as you get growth in income and so on.

Improvement in corporate profits should lead to something in the low double digits in terms of corporate tax increases in the coming year; not tax rate changes, just revenue growing. Tax being applied at the same rate will generate more revenue for you.

I think overall then all governments across the country, not only the federal but all the provinces, will experience some relief on the deficit side over the coming fiscal year. That said, though, keep in mind that we still added $110 billion to the national debt in the past two years. There's still an issue there and I think it's going to be the toughest issue you face over the coming few months in terms of trying to resolve how to deal with it.

In terms of interest rates, as I said earlier, we're expecting another 0.5% cut this first quarter and then another 0.5% in the second quarter. Our forecast is pretty much on track.

We still see the Bank of Canada focusing on inflation and this is a very troublesome question because there are concerns, at least from our point of view, that inflation will tend to pick up because of the devaluation. I talked with you about this last year at this briefing. We're forecasting 2.6% on the CPI now. There's a lot of controversy around whether that will in fact occur.

What we are seeing in the markets, though, in the retail business is that the companies' profit margins are so severely squeezed that any opportunity to move prices and they're going to be taking it up. So as we move into the coming year, we see some tendency to move upward in terms of inflation.

With those comments, Brian, could you just touch on a few items specific to Ontario for five minutes or so and then we'll try to address any questions they have?

Dr Brian Hollohan: We estimate that the Ontario economy began its recovery last year, with growth of about 1.5% after two years in which declines amounted to about 5% in terms of real gross domestic product. Further, we forecast that there will be a slight acceleration in this growth for 1993, towards 3% next year, reaching about 4%. I think this is in line with some of the other projections you've been hearing.

This profile of about 1.5% last year and 3% this year is a lot different than the profile for the two years following the last recession. In the 1980s, the growth revenue, being 1.5% and 3% for Ontario, was 4% and 9%. So the growth we're projecting following this recession is much slower than last time.

A lot of the problems the Ontario economy is dealing with reflect some of its very strengths, some of the strengths that make it one of the largest, most diversified economies in the country. That is its industrial base and its market position, its location. The economy is facing competitive pressures in both of these areas.

We think, however, that there are improvements coming about and being put in place that will be responsible for the recovery we're going to see over the next year. A lot of the losses have been centred in the manufacturing sector and they're due, as you know, to high interest rates, an overvalued currency, weak market demand and, finally, this process of plant rationalization.

A lot of the rationalization and so on that's going on results from forces that are happening outside the direct economic sphere of the Ontario economy, in particular the integration of the world economy, the reduction of trade barriers and technological changes that are facilitating global trade in both goods and financial instruments.

It's important to note too that the rise in interest rates that's hurt the economy is also part of a global initiative. Most of the industrialized countries in the world have been trying to stem the speculation that's been sweeping through the construction industry, both residential and non-residential. At the same time, these countries are worried about accelerating inflation.

All of these global transformations that are occurring have forced the Ontario economy to adjust. These adjustments have been sudden and severe because they're occurring at a time when the economy is going through a process of normal cyclical streamlining.

Ontario business has been forced to downsize, sell off and close out non-core business operations. They've been upgrading their capital installations for machinery and equipment, and all this has been going on while market sales have been weakening and commodity prices have been softening as well. In these circumstances, the adjustment process has taken a severe toll on business profits and confidence but, more importantly, it has created severe dislocation in the labour market and hurt job prospects and consumer confidence.

It must be said, though, that the process of adjustment has set the stage for future improvements for the Ontario economy. We find that the Ontario economy has improved its comparative advantage by increasing productivity and lowering its unit labour costs. In addition, the economy stands to benefit from lower exchange rates, lower interest rates and the turnaround in the US economy. We believe that the third-quarter data and the fourth-quarter data as well support the view that the US economy is turning around and we expect it to grow about 3% this year and another 3% again in 1994. This is quite an improvement over the 1.8% growth last year.

Ontario exports, of course, are going to benefit from this turnaround. We expect auto production this year to increase about 6% or so, from about 1.2 million cars last year to about 1.3 million this year, still well below the recent peak of 1.5 million units. This production upturn will be reflected in our export numbers, and we expect growth in auto and part exports for 1993 and 1994 to average about 7% annually. Overall, we think exports from Ontario will grow about 4% this year in a US economy growing at only about 3%, so there is some implication there of an improved market share, largely coming about because of the weaker dollar. Jim has mentioned we feel that the Canadian dollar is slightly undervalued at the moment.

The lower interest rates, more stable prices and turnaround in net interprovincial migration can be expected to help the housing market. Total starts this year we think will grow about 11% to 78,000 units, up from approximately 50,000 units last year. This will translate into some pretty good growth in real residential construction spending, something in the order of 6.5% this year.

On the non-residential side, though, problems remain. You've just heard a little bit about that from the previous presentations here. There's poor cash flow, high debt levels, weak and uncertain market demand and excess capacity, excess commercial office space. These have resulted in 20% declines in non-residential investment in the province over the last two years. There's nothing new going to happen here this year. We expect growth of—actually the level should fall about 1% again this year before picking up somewhat next year.

1730

By contrast, though, the drive to improve our competitive edge has resulted in an increase in spending on machinery and equipment in the province. Over the last two years, a time of weak profit growth, real investment in machinery and equipment grew between 1.5% and 2% a year. We think this pace will be maintained this year and probably pick up a bit next year.

The increased industrial activity generated by Ontario's export performance should translate into better labour market performance as well. We've already seen evidence of this. Over the last eight months, the Ontario economy has created, on net, about 5,000 jobs a month as opposed to the 10,000 jobs lost on average per month over the previous eight months. As employment continues to improve and confidence picks up, consumer spending should be boosted, but this will be a very slow process. We forecast household spending to increase this year by about only 2% before rising next year something in the order of 3.5%.

Taken as a whole then, the Conference Board expects the Ontario economy to grow approximately 3% this year and 4% next year. As I said at the beginning, while this growth is much more muted than the recovery that followed the 1980s recession, it doesn't threaten to undermine the gains we've made in terms of price stability. We expect inflation to stay in the neighbourhood of 2.5% this year and again next year.

Unfortunately, though, the sluggish pace of the growth doesn't allow the economy to return to its potential level of growth either. This gets reflected in an unemployment rate that will stay entrenched in the 10% to 10.5% range this year and next. In other words, the competitive gains the economy has achieved through this really terrible recession will pay dividends, but only slowly. It's hoped that these gains, however, will be more sustainable over the medium term.

That closes our remarks. If there are any questions, we'd be happy to answer them.

Mr Carr: I'll just do one quick one. I was interested in your question regarding the personal income tax. You said the revenue from that was going to go up by about 5%. The only trouble I've got in looking at it is that it will get us about $700 million and in one quarter of this year the government has had to cut out that amount of expenditure, almost that amount, because of dropped revenue.

But I want to talk specifically about another source of revenue, which is the retail sales tax. I think the Treasurer thinks that if he increases it by one percentage point, he'll get about $1 billion. Historically, that's what you get; $7.8 billion is what we had budgeted from retail sales tax. The assumption has always been that with an increase of 1% you get $1 billion.

Knowing the fragile state of this economy, if the Treasurer was to increase it by, say, one percentage point, would he get that $1 billion or would consumers say, "Aha, as a result of this, I'm not going to spend," and would he actually get less? What would your projections be specifically on the retail sales tax?

Dr Frank: I don't whether they would get a full $1 billion. I suspect that they would come pretty close to it, because there are not many things that a person can set back any longer. One of the catches we've had here in the country is that the two areas you normally expect to see picking up quickly, with interest rates as low as they are, are housing and auto sales. Affordability, I don't think, in Ontario, downtown Toronto, has ever been higher, and yet it's not moving. It just suggests to me that the levels of spending are so depressed it's pretty hard to cut them back any further. I suspect that you'd get that amount of money.

I think the key thing here is that regardless of whether you increase taxes or cut spending, it has in an economic sense essentially the same macro impact on the economy. You're going to depress the recovery, unless of course you're just translating it and moving it from one group to another, in which case you've got distributional issues to address.

What we have been finding in terms of the question, to go to your point, about confidence is that it seems very unstable. This bouncing around that I talked about, up and down, is something you can anticipate coming when there are setbacks on employment growth, for example, or interest rates moving in the wrong direction or budgets that come in with tax increases. People are feeling pretty vulnerable now. That's the concern you would want to lay on the table as to whether you can pull that off without having people just retrench further. It's a judgement call.

Mr Sterling: I've seen some polls by Angus Reid which suggested that the confidence of the consumer in Ontario was much lower than it was in, say, Quebec or British Columbia. It's somewhat surprising in Quebec, given what we've gone through in terms of the whole constitutional thing.

Given that, and the uncertainty with regard to a whole number and a host of issues and economic indicators—the dollar, the interest rates etc—our Treasurer still has to come up with a budget. It appears in real terms, as far as I'm concerned, that the deficit is probably going to hit at around $13 billion, depending on how you calculate it or whatever. He says in his 1992 budget that he's at $8.1 billion. That's what he was driving for in terms of the deficit.

How important do you view all the different factors? Consumer confidence is weak in Ontario versus some of the other parts of Canada. Therefore, an increase in taxation is further going to dampen consumer confidence. They're just not going to have the dollars to spend. If the sales tax goes up by one point, that's going to dampen some. Given all those kinds of factors, what would your advice to the Treasurer be? A little of all? Hold the line on the deficit as the first priority? Seeking a reduction or showing a reduction in the deficit? Holding the line on taxation? Given all of what you have in terms of your knowledge, what do you think is the most important message to get out?

Dr Frank: Not to be flippant, that's why you people get paid the big bucks, to make these difficult decisions, because you put your finger on all the issues that are on the table.

What we have observed historically is that at this point in business cycles, when your unemployment rates are so high and people are feeling so pressed—I think, at least if our outlook is correct, and even with 3% to 4% growth in the province, that it's not going to be strong enough to do a whole lot of damage to unemployment rates over the next six to nine months. People are still going to feel under a lot of stress and strain.

When you look at the record in Ontario with confidence, in the fourth quarter of 1990 the index was 76, in the fourth quarter of 1991 it was 66, and we've only gotten back to 70. There's no sort of buoyant turnaround in feelings. If you lay on top of that a sales tax increase or other tax increases, I think you have to ask yourself whether you run the risk of causing people to pull back more, or whether they will have any choice but to pull back more. So the direction is, at least I would suspect, fairly clear.

On the currency side, I don't think there's much evidence among the general public that a depreciation along the lines of what we've had is something that adversely affects confidence, because I don't think most people see that as an issue. What drives confidence, in our experience, is interest rate movements, up or down, employment gains or losses, and of course issues of taxation because that's just another form of income change; if you get hit with an income tax increase, then obviously it's a reduction in your income.

I think confidence is shaky. It's obviously shaky in this province. We're just not getting the turnaround you would expect. British Columbia, for example, is 95; Quebec 104.

1740

Mr Johnson: Thanks very much for your presentation. You mentioned that the cumulative debt, that is, the collective debt of the federal government and all the provincial governments, is about $600 billion.

Dr Frank: Yes.

Mr Johnson: You said that has increased by $110 billion, due to debt interest, I would assume.

Dr Frank: No; Deficits of the past two years.

Mr Johnson: Okay; deficits of the past two years. That's good—that's not good, but it's good because that leads up to what I want to ask you.

If the federal government has a responsibility to transfer funds to the province, for example, the CAP program, and maybe it's several billion dollars, now whether the federal government encouraged that indebtedness or whether the province encouraged that indebtedness in order to finance programs, it's still going to be added to the cumulative debt of the country.

This is a bit of a political question, I know, but I'm looking for your opinion. Would you think it would be a good idea for the federal government to transfer these dollars to the province? They're going to have to manage it somehow. Otherwise, the province is going to have to manage it somehow. But I like to think that in the larger picture, all the provinces and all the people of Canada are indebted to about the same amount, and when it becomes necessary to pay off this debt, they will all do it equally. I like to think that those dollars that will be transferred from the federal government would cause that to be more equal in the province of Ontario.

I wanted to know if you had an opinion whether it was good or not good for the federal government to transfer these dollars that the province expects. You may say it's good for the province and not good for the federal government, but I just wanted an opinion.

Dr Frank: I think the fair answer to your question goes along these kinds of lines. In 1984-85, the feds picked up a $38-billion deficit; the provinces picked up $7.5 billion. The provincial deficits continued to rise up until 1987-88 and then they fell. The federal government was stuck at about $30 billion and has been stuck at $30 billion really throughout all of the 1980s.

In the case of Ontario, for example, the deficit in 1984-85 was $2.6 billion. It was at 2.6 the next year and 2.5 the next year. So now we're at 1987-88 and the economy is doing really well, but Ontario's still running a $2.5-billion deficit. In 1988-89 it was $1.5 billion, and then you ran a surplus in 1989-90, at the same time, of course, as the feds were still running a $30-billion deficit.

Regardless of your political persuasion, what this is saying is that your revenues are not keeping up with your expenses. You don't have to be an economist to see that. You also know that you've got to borrow that money every year somehow to finance this.

The government in Ottawa happened to be a Conservative government, and when it came in it was right after a recession, with a big deficit in hand. What it tried to do was move gradually out of it at the federal level. I've looked carefully at the fiscal measures that were in the budgets coming from Wilson in the first four years of their term and the measures that came in the latter four years. Essentially, the lesson that I learn from that, and this is when I'm coming to your point, is that the federal government could not address the issue and solve it itself because the spending growth was occurring in health, education and welfare, in the large envelopes at the provincial level.

After trying to deal with this in small increments, if you like, in the first four years, in the second four years they said, "We will do it differently." They will download it. That term has now become a bit more popular. It will go from the feds to the provinces. They will say: "Okay, you're the ones who control health, education and welfare spending and you manage those programs. Those are yours under the Constitution of Canada. You take care of that responsibility." So they restrained CAP, the Canada assistance plan, equalization and so on, as you're quite familiar with.

To go to your question of whether it is good or bad, let me ask you this: When the Ontario government says to the hospitals that they shall have a zero increase in their revenues or when it says to the municipalities that they shall have a zero increase in revenues, because they are trying in turn to go from the province to the municipalities and say, "You are the people who control the spending and administering the system," is it good or is it bad? I think, with respect, it's the wrong sort of question. It's almost as if what's happening here is that you've got to move this issue to the grass roots, in a way, so that people increasingly see that we as a society are collectively asking for $55 billion a year more service than we are currently paying. We have to borrow that money from somebody.

The implications of borrowing it from ourselves at home are different than the implications of borrowing it from foreigners. That's why I emphasize that now we have a 40% provincial debt held offshore and 20% of the federal debt held offshore. That means that every year we have to earn more money to pay the foreigners in order to encourage them to continue to buy our debt, because if they won't then we have to raise interest rates even more to attract them. So to position the question of good-bad, right-wrong seems to me, as I've looked at it over the past decade, to put it in a game that we really can't properly play.

I was on a hospital board in Ottawa, for example, and I know what goes on. I know the pain that the hospitals had to go through to balance their budgets. But pushing it down to us as a board I thought was about the only way there would be any of trying to match revenues and expenditures to what the general public wants to pay. I can tell you we could have spent any amount the provincial government would have given us, and the provincial government would have spent any amount the federal government would have given us, so you see the issue.

Mr Johnson: Just in conclusion, is the debt shared equally by the people in the country?

Dr Frank: The debt of the federal government and of the provinces is held by the people in Canada, absolutely, but the issue you see is, who makes the decisions about the spending and the taxation that goes with it? Is it the federal people in Ottawa, is it you people here in Ontario or is it, you know, Jimmy Frank sitting on a hospital board? I think that's the locus of decision-making that will have to be in place in the 1990s.

I can tell you unequivocally that it's going to be a very difficult decade, because the deficits will not turn around easily at the provincial level. They did not before, and we have structural changes, as Brian has indicated, that are at least as significant this recession as the last one.

The Chair: We've run out of time there, Mr Johnson.

Mr Sterling: In that there isn't a Liberal here, could I just ask another question?

Ms Swarbrick: Yes, can we split the Liberal time then?

The Chair: You've just split it. It's quarter to.

Mr Sterling: Are you anxious to go?

Ms Swarbrick: No.

Mr Sterling: Could I just ask one other question? Because you had a—

Interjections.

Mr Sterling: Do you want to go first and I'll go second?

The Chair: Norm, they'll be out in the hallway, or do you want this on the record?

Ms Swarbrick: That'd be great.

Mr Ward: Once you start—

The Chair: The thing is, I had my time booked for 5:30. I've got somebody waiting for me and I never realized we went this long.

Mr Sterling: I think you should pass on the chair.

The Chair: You can meet him out in the hallway there over a glass of water. By the way, Norm's got his way. We're going to be in room 151 between 2 and 4 tomorrow. You can thank Remo for allowing us to go in there, and all the work that's Norm's done. It's 9:30 in the morning also.

Ms Swarbrick: At 9:30 we're in here.

The Chair: At 9:30 in the morning we're in here. I just want to get these fellows before they run off. I'd like to thank you for appearing before the committee. As I told them, they might have been the last but the best.

This committee is adjourned until 9:30 tomorrow.

The committee adjourned at 1749.

CONTENTS

Monday 11 January 1993

Pre-budget consultations	F-293
Toronto Dominion Bank	F-293
Peter L. Drake, director, economic research
Teresa M. Chandler, managing economist
Informetrica Ltd	F-299
Michael C. McCracken, president
Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce	F-305
Tim Whitehead, general manager and regional economist
DRI/McGraw-Hill	F-311
George Vasic, principal
Robert Fairholm, managing economist
Conference Board of Canada	F-317
Dr James G. Frank, vice-president and chief economist
Dr Brian Hollohan, associate director, forecasting and analysis

STANDING COMMITTEE ON FINANCE AND ECONOMIC AFFAIRS

- Chair / Président: Hansen, Ron (Lincoln ND)
- Acting Chair / Président suppléant: Johnson, Paul R. (Prince Edward-Lennox-South Hastings/Prince Edward-Lennox-Hastings-Sud ND)
- Vice-Chair / Vice-Président: Sutherland, Kimble (Oxford ND)
- Caplan, Elinor (Oriole L)
- *Carr, Gary (Oakville South/-Sud PC)
- Christopherson, David (Hamilton Centre ND)
- Jamison, Norm (Norfolk ND)
- *Kwinter, Monte (Wilson Heights L)
- *Phillips, Gerry (Scarborough-Agincourt L)
- *Sterling, Norman W. (Carleton PC)
- *Ward, Brad (Brantford ND)
- Ward, Margery (Don Mills ND)
- Wiseman, Jim (Durham West/-Ouest ND)

*In attendance / présents

Substitutions present / Membres remplaçants présents:

Conway, Sean G. (Renfrew North/-Nord L) for Mrs Caplan
Coppen, Shirley, (Niagara South/-Sud ND) for Mr Sutherland
Harrington, Margaret H. (Niagara Falls ND) for Mr Wiseman
Johnson, Paul R. (Prince Edward-Lennox-South Hastings/Prince Edward-Lennox-Hastings-Sud ND) for Mr Christopherson
Mammoliti, George (Yorkview ND) for Mr Jamison
Swarbrick, Anne (Scarborough West/-Ouest ND) for Ms Ward

Also taking part / Autres participants et participantes:

Harris, Michael D. (Nipissing PC)

Clerk / Greffière: Grannum, Tonia

Staff / Personnel: Campbell, Elaine, research officer, Legislative Research Service

F-15

F-15

ISSN 1180-4386

Legislative Assembly of Ontario

Second Intersession, 35th Parliament

Assemblée législative de l'Ontario

Deuxième intersession, 35^e législature

Official Report of Debates (Hansard)

Tuesday 12 January 1993

Journal des débats (Hansard)

Mardi 12 janvier 1993

Standing committee on finance and economic affairs

Pre-budget consultations

Comité permanent des finances
et des affaires économiques

Consultations prébudgétaires

Chair: Ron Hansen
Clerk: Todd Decker

Président : Ron Hansen
Greffier : Todd Decker

Published by the Legislative Assembly of Ontario
Editor of Debates: Don Cameron

Publié par l'Assemblée législative de l'Ontario
Éditeur des débats : Don Cameron

Table of Contents

Table of Contents for proceedings reported in this issue appears on the outside back cover, together with a list of committee members and others taking part.

Index inquiries

Reference to a cumulative index of previous issues may be obtained by calling the Hansard Reporting Service indexing staff at 416-325-7410 or 325-7411.

Subscriptions

Subscription information may be obtained from: Sessional Subscription Service, Publications Ontario, Ministry of Government Services, 50 Grosvenor Street, Toronto, Ontario, M7A 1N8. Phone 416-326-5310, 326-5311 or toll-free 1-800-668-9938.

Table des matières

La table des matières des séances rapportées dans ce numéro se trouve sur la couverture à l'arrière de ce fascicule, ainsi qu'une liste des membres du comité et d'autres personnes ayant participé.

Renseignements sur l'index

Il existe un index cumulatif des numéros précédents. Les renseignements qu'il contient sont à votre disposition par téléphone auprès des employés de l'index du Journal des débats au 416-325-7410 ou 325-7411.

Abonnements

Pour les abonnements, veuillez prendre contact avec le Service d'abonnement parlementaire, Publications Ontario, ministère des Services gouvernementaux, 50 rue Grosvenor, Toronto (Ontario) M7A 1N8. Par téléphone : 416-326-5310, 326-5311 ou, sans frais : 1-800-668-9938.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY OF ONTARIO

STANDING COMMITTEE ON FINANCE AND ECONOMIC AFFAIRS

Tuesday 12 January 1993

The committee met at 0942 in committee room 1.

PRE-BUDGET CONSULTATIONS

The Chair (Mr Ron Hansen): Good morning. We are going to have the hearings on the pre-budget consultations of the standing committee on finance and economic affairs. I would like to introduce our head table to our guests.

Mrs Beth Grahame: My name is Beth Grahame and I am the Hansard reporter with this committee.

Clerk of the Committee (Ms Tonia Grannum): I'm Tonia Grannum. I'm the committee clerk for this committee.

Ms Elaine Campbell: I'm Elaine Campbell from legislative research.

NOMURA CANADA, INC

The Chair: Good morning, Leo. Welcome to the committee. You're from Nomura Canada, Inc, vice-president and senior economist. You may begin. We've got until 10:15.

Dr Leo J. de Bever: What I propose to do is make a fairly brief set of comments and mainly talk to some graphs that are in the pre-filed evidence I've given you and then leave it up to you to give me a hard time.

The graph I'd like to start with is the one on the first page of the summary. It essentially recapitulates the situation thus far, which basically has shown a fairly shallow recession but also a very slow recovery compared to 1982-83.

I think there are a couple of reasons for that. One is that this time around, fiscal policy really wasn't a factor in terms of softening the blow, or not nearly as much as in 1982, and the reason for that is that the deficits that were run up during the last business cycle did not leave enough room to do much in the way of stimulating the economy.

The other factor that's clearly obvious, both in Canada and in the United States, is that during the last boom, because it lasted so long, labour costs got out of hand. So when it came time to cut costs when the recession hit, given the inflexibility of wages, employment got hit, which created a lot of confidence problems, a lot of unemployment and made the whole economy much more lethargic than it would have been otherwise.

The final factor is that both Canada and the US are involved in some sectors that have gotten a lot more international competition, and as a result we've gotten a number of sectors, raw-materials-related, but also sectors like autos, pulp and paper and steel, that just aren't growing the way they used to, because they're becoming relatively less important in the overall economy.

On the hopeful side, on the next page I show the cyclical behaviour of GDP per capita for Canada and the United States. It indicates that Canada tends to follow the US into recovery. It looks like the US is finally on something approximating a sustained recovery, and therefore I expect that Canada will follow suit. All the indications are that way. If I had been here a month ago, I would have been less convinced of that, but the year-end economic statistics look very hopeful and it's now a question of getting follow-through. I don't think we'll see 50,000 or 60,000 jobs being created every month, but I think even the employment picture will look a lot more respectable than it has over the last year.

Ontario, being the province most closely tied in with the US, probably will benefit from this US resurgence more than some of the other provinces, and that's to make up for the fact that we got hit much more than the other provinces. In fact, if you look at the bottom of page 3, it shows the relative performance of Canada and Ontario. During the 1986-88 period, we clearly outperformed Canada on a growth profile. In 1990 and 1991, we got hit much more than Canada in general, but also much more than the original estimates indicated. I suspect that by 1993-94 we will start to outperform Canada again.

At the bottom of page 2, I have an outlook for inflation. What you're going to see is producer price inflation, which is mostly goods exposed to the foreign sector. Those prices are going to rise fairly dramatically compared to last year. You're going to see inflation rates of 4% or 5% there. That does not mean that general inflation's going to pick up to that point.

There is going to be some rebound in CPI inflation. The main reason for that is that certain products have essentially been sold below cost during the recession, because people were clearing inventory and because they drastically needed to cover whatever part of their fixed costs they could. As the economy recovers, that is going to stop and you will find that prices are going to rise a bit. But inflation is not going to be a big issue.

Page 4 shows you the conundrum we face, and I've mentioned this before this committee before. If you look at the bottom graph, which shows you the share of wages to net domestic income, this looks like a workers' paradise. Clearly, I don't think the man on the street would agree with that, and the reason for that is the top picture. Profitability is so low that any prospects for employment growth are fairly limited. This is the problem we face.

Maybe you saw the article in the Globe and Mail yesterday talking about the pursuit of productivity being the reason for the 10% unemployment decade. I think that is putting the problem in the wrong perspective. You can look at productivity two ways. Productivity means you can produce more goods with the same number of people or you can produce the same number of goods with fewer people, and depending on what perspective you take, you end up with a different conclusion.

I fought this argument in 1982, and this is what is so amazing: how quickly we forget. I was called very naïve at the time for suggesting that producing more goods with the same number of people was the correct interpretation of the numbers. This time around I think you have the same problem, that people just refuse to believe that. In fact, I think you are going to get that result. You are going to get more hiring and a higher productivity, meaning a higher standard of living, once certain things get fixed. The main thing that needs to get fixed is profitability. No one is going to take on extra workers if there isn't any money to pay for them. The fact that profitability has sunk to such a low level is our main problem. In fact, you can see the close link between profits and employment on page 5.

Mr Norman W. Sterling (Carleton): Sorry. Can I just ask, on your profitability chart, what does the 8 mean, 8% of what?

Dr de Bever: That is the economy's profit margin, if you wish. The denominator is net domestic non-farm private income. What I'm trying to get rid of is some of the problems that confuse the picture, such as farming and taxes.

Mr Sterling: Is it 8% of investment?

Dr de Bever: It's 8% of net domestic income, effectively. A normal number for that is somewhere around 16. Over the long haul, that is what you would like to see for a decent profit performance. As you can see, it has dropped from that 16% to 8, so profits right now are roughly half the normal level, and that is a big part of our problem.

People on this committee are from different parts of the ideological spectrum, and I respect that, but you have to realize that at the end of the day no one is going to take on employees as charity cases. They have to be able to make money for whatever company employs them, and the situation right now is that there effectively are no profits: 8% is way too low to cover normal capital expenses.

0950

You can see on page 5 how the profitability and the employment growth tend to follow each other with a lag. You can see that with the exception of 1986, where we had some peculiar situations in the oil and gas industry, profits and employment tend to follow each other fairly quickly. That's positive because, as you can see, profits are heading up, in the sense that compared to a year ago profits look a lot better, and that would suggest that in 1993 employment ought to be heading up. But the main point there is that profits have to go up an awful lot before you have the kind of employment effect that will give you a drastic reduction in the unemployment rate.

Part of the reason that profits are not going up—it's not just wages. We talk about wage costs being high, but a lot of companies are still suffering from fairly high interest costs as well. On page 6, I show you what Canadian and US interest rates are going to do. Given our inflation performance, I would have expected interest rates to drop a lot further than they have and I think there is where we see the residue from some of the developments last year on the constitutional front and the internal divisions, the worry about Quebec separating, and, forward-looking, the worries about any problems we might have after the federal election, because people are starting to worry about stability at the federal government level.

Long rates have that same problem. The spreads with the United States are extremely wide. This morning they are 130 basis points. When you look at the fact that we should have lower inflation than the United States, or, at the very minimum, only the same level of inflation, these spreads should be a lot tighter. I think there's a great deal of worry there that, financially, things in Canada are just not what they should be.

I should emphasize that Ontario is becoming a fairly big part of that picture. I am amazed at how the developments surrounding Ontario Hydro are getting international attention, how I get questions on things that a year or two ago no one would have asked me. People are worried that the deficits are not cyclical. I try to tell them that they are, and in doing so I often feel like a devil's advocate. I'm telling them, "Yes, there's a problem, but once the economy recovers, a large part of that deficit will disappear."

The Japanese and the European investors are very sceptical that that will in fact happen. They're hedging their bets. It's becoming very difficult to borrow money in Canadian dollars. Ontario just borrowed, but it borrowed in US dollars, because not only are foreigners worried about our fiscal policy but they worry that if we run into trouble we will devalue the currency and make them take the hit on the Canadian-dollar bonds they bought.

I'm trying to tell them also, on page 7, that the exchange rate outlook is for stability rather than further deterioration. I am basing that on the fact that our currency is fairly cyclical and that during recoveries it tends to be fairly good or behave fairly well. It is also true that the current level is probably more than fairly valued, meaning that at this level manufacturers should have no problem competing internationally. If they tell you otherwise, I think they are not doing their job.

The thing that really bothers investors abroad is what I show you on page 8, and that is the deteriorating trend in the current account balance, because ultimately your ability to pay back the money you borrow depends on your ability to earn income internationally, and that picture is not pretty. It shows that since 1985 there's been a continuous deterioration.

On the bottom of page 9, I show you how that breaks down. We run a surplus on merchandise trade, not quite as large a surplus as we used to, and that's in large part because the prices we get for some of our key exports are not what they used to be.

The bothersome aspect is that on services we run a structural deficit. A travel deficit is particularly worrisome, and it's related to the fact that we have a larger retired population having a tendency to spend a lot of time abroad. I think as the population ages that problem is only going to get worse.

The bottom line, which is services plus net investment income, shows another aspect of the problem; that is, because we've been borrowing to finance our current account over the last five or seven years, the interest payments keep on getting bigger and bigger, and that's hurting us. Every year we're going to have to earn more money on merchandise and service trade to make up for the fact that we're spending more money abroad on travel and on investment income servicing.

On page 10, another aspect of this whole discussion is illustrated. There is a lot of argument about the causes of this recession and the reason for its depth. One of the arguments usually trotted out is that free trade had a lot to do with it. I frankly don't think that is a tenable position. In fact, our surplus with the United States has maintained itself fairly well. Where we're having trouble is with non-US exports—and the US is having the same problem—in that we're not able to compete in some of the market that traditionally used to be ours and where we're now getting competition from emerging countries.

On page 11, I switch to Ontario. The graph on that page shows you the ratio of employment to population of working age. In other words, if you look at an economy from a basic availability of labour resources, you have to start with the proposition that it's the workers, with the knowledge they have and the equipment they work with, who generate the output. This is the ratio that shows you what proportion of those potential workers we employ. It doesn't mean we can employ 100%. Presumably not everybody between the ages of 15 and 75 is going to be in the workforce, either because they have worked long and often are retired or because they are in university or in high school or whatever.

The two graphs we show here, Ontario and Canada minus Ontario, indicate one reason why Ontario on average does better than the rest of Canada: We have more people producing goods and services proportional to the population we have. It also indicates that, contrary to the last recession, when the rest of Canada got hit harder in terms of losing jobs relative to population, this time around it's been Ontario that's been hit pretty hard.

The third aspect shows, though—and this is something where memories are short—that yes, times have been tough, but they are in part a consequence of the fact that they were incredibly good during the period 1986-89, and in terms of the economy being able to produce jobs, we're just back to where we were in the bottom of the last recession in terms of the ratio of people employed relative to the available population. It's good to keep that in mind, because sometimes we think, "Things are so awful, they've never been so awful, and they're never going to look up again." I don't believe that for one moment, and I want you to keep that in mind.

On page 12, I have the behaviour of employment in various sectors of the US economy. One point I want to leave you with is that employment in Ontario manufacturing is not going to be any higher in the year 2000 than it was in the year 1990, than it was in 1980. It's going to be the same number over that entire period because whatever gain we make in terms of creating more output is going to be eaten up by the fact that in that sector you're not going to need as many workers because productivity is rising. That does not mean that overall employment growth is not going to be rising. Employment is going to be shifting to services, which are much more labour-intensive, and our overall increase in standard of living is going to come from the fact that we are able to spend less resources purchasing goods from manufacturing and that leaves us more money to spend on services, where the shift in demand is occurring.

Manufacturing in Ontario right now is in a fairly weak position in a number of key aspects. I already mentioned pulp and paper. Steel is another one, and I think autos are going to be a liability. You may not think that is going to be an issue, but I would warn you that, long term, it is going to be an issue. Think about it this way: We have 20% of the productive capacity in automobile assembly. It's a declining market in the sense that it is not going to grow as fast as the overall economy. So instead of being a boon to Ontario, which it was in the 1960s and 1970s when it was an expanding sector, it now is becoming a drag on the economy. So we're going to have to find a way to lessen our reliance, I think, on automotive production.

Again, it has nothing to do with free trade. People are saying, "We're going to see a lot of these plants disappear to Mexico." But look at it from a continental point of view. The market is emerging in Mexico. Given some of the advantages in Mexico, why wouldn't you locate the next plant in Mexico rather than in a market that has a lot of excess capacity? I would warn you, though, that this Mexican thing is way overblown. The average productivity level of the average Mexican is just—essentially, he is justifying his wage, at least at current conditions. So I don't believe for one moment that NAFTA is going to make all that much difference to us. In fact, if low wages were the driver for investment, then the Maritimes should have the highest rate of investment in Canada, and it clearly does not; it has the lowest rate. So there must be other factors that make up for it, and I think some of the basic amenities—the infrastructure, the availability of skills and complementary services—are very important there.

1000

I don't want to say much more, except that the last 12 months have taught me two lessons. One is that we don't know as much as we think we do, and I'm referring there to the fact that I think we were all surprised that the final estimates of what happened in 1991 were substantially different from what we thought had happened, and as a result a lot of the forecasts for 1992 were way off base. That's an occupational hazard for a guy like me. I'm not apologizing for that, but it's a fact of life.

The other thing is, and it's equally important, we don't seem to remember some of the things I think we do know with a certain degree of accuracy, and I'm referring there to this whole 1982 story. I was called a lot of names for suggesting that this was not the end of the world in 1982. Maybe you don't remember, but there were forecasts made in 1980 of 40% unemployment for secretaries out there by the year 1990. I was working at the time on something called the Ontario task force on microelectronics and I was called a lot of names by some people in the union movement who argued that microelectronics was going to cause mass unemployment, particularly in areas like secretarial, because everybody was going to be replaced by machines.

That just isn't going to happen. You're going to find an increase in the standard of living, if we are able to get around the fact that you have to create conditions where companies are in a position to hire people. You have to create profitability before you can start thinking about increasing employment, and that's I think the key dilemma you face trying to make our labour markets more flexible.

I'm not arguing that you should give employers a free ride and just make them earn any kind of profits that they would desire. What I'm suggesting is that we should create incentives to negotiate smarter contracts, contracts that do not force the employer against the wall when he's forced with a profit squeeze, that allow unions to retreat with grace or to take somewhat less in income in return for employment security. We just don't have those things in place, and I think that was a large reason the recession was as deep as it was and as many jobs were lost over the last two years.

That's it.

The Chair: Okay. Looking at page 12, from 1980 to 1992, it looks like stress tests I had at the doctor's about a month ago. We'll go on to Mr Phillips with the first question.

Mr Gerry Phillips (Scarborough-Agincourt): As usual, I really value your opinions. One question I'm interested in is, what implications are there for us in terms of borrowing our finances in foreign currencies? What's the upside to that, what are the advantages, and what are some of the things we should worry about? Just the $2.5 billion to $3 billion in borrowing today, I gather if the Canadian dollar strengthens it's good; if it weakens it's going to increase our costs. Are there any, as I said, long-term advantages or disadvantages to us?

The second part of it is whether you had any comment on the implications to the Canadian financial community on what looks to me like shifting the organizations that handle our debt financing to out of Canada and to a more global base.

Dr de Bever: I think both decisions are sort of forced on us, because it is not economically feasible in terms of interest cost to get these kinds of deals done within Canada, and if you're going to go abroad, then you have to have the Goldman Sachs of this world take a bigger role, because the Canadian houses just don't have the clout in London, Tokyo and New York to get these kinds of deals done.

On page 14 of this document I show you what has been happening to borrowing by both the federal and provincial governments, and it is very disconcerting that the proportion of borrowing done by the provinces abroad has risen to over half. It's now more than 60% of the total that they have to borrow. In addition, of course, it's very disconcerting that the total amount being borrowed by the provinces has gone up so much.

The problem with that from a cost point of view is that if you become what they say is a familiar name—and Ontario has become very familiar lately to international investors—the premium for being able to float additional debt goes up. We saw that. Ontario, I think, is borrowing money at 79 basis points over the US Treasury's. BC was able to do it for 48. The reason for that is that after a certain point, from a diversification point of view, people don't want the paper in their portfolios any more because they already have so much of it.

Then it becomes a chicken and egg. Your interest costs go up, making your deficit go up, which then makes your interest costs go up because people worry about your debt. It's a vicious cycle that can only become a virtuous cycle if somehow you manage to cut through that and get yourself lower interest rates and lower deficits. So there are serious implications.

Mr Phillips: Foreign currency, too, I'm interested in.

Dr de Bever: Oh, the foreign currency part. Sorry, I left that out. The cost of that depends on how you do it. I understand that a lot of this debt gets swapped back to Canadian dollars, meaning that the effective rate the government borrows at is not the US Treasury's plus 79 basis points; it's the US Treasury's plus 79 basis points plus whatever the cost is of swapping it back into Canadian dollars. You can do it a number of different ways. I don't know how Ontario did it in this case, but you can insulate yourself from the currency impact at a price. In other words, the price is effectively the differential in interest rates in Canada and the United States over a longer period of time. Some institutions do not swap back all of the coupon payments and all of the principal, because it's expensive; some of them do. It depends how you do it. If you do all the swapping—100%—back to Canadian dollars, your cost goes up but you have security; you're insulated from movements in the Canadian dollar because that risk has been assumed by a foreign institution. If you don't do it, if you only swap part of it back, then you have exposure to currency movements. If the Canadian dollar goes down, then your cost of debt goes up. I don't know in this particular case how it was done. I understand that at least part of it was swapped.

Mr Phillips: Have I got another minute or two?

The Chair: You've got another 30 seconds.

Mr Phillips: One of the strengths of Ontario has been its financial community. I think we've thought we are a world-class financial community, and that's something we're going to try to develop. The signal that we have to go outside of Ontario to float something like this is concerning to me on the surface, that we're sending almost a global signal that we can't do it here in Ontario. Should I worry about that, or is it sort of irrelevant?

Dr de Bever: It's a fact of life, given the kind of amounts we're trying to get done. If you're talking about doing $500 million a couple of times a year, I think our institutions could do it, but you have to reach into an awful lot of pockets to get $3 billion done. The only people who have access to those kinds of pockets are the big international houses. In fact, there is a risk that has arisen over the last few years with the rise in provincial and federal deficits combined. The risk is that we become one of the currencies people like to take a shot at, which makes us more vulnerable over time. I think that is as much a risk as the fact that it's not getting done by Canadian institutions.

You shouldn't exaggerate that, because the leads are foreigners but there are Canadian houses that are comanagers. But the facts of life are that a large part of this particular issue was done in the United States and you need access to the US houses to do it. We just can't do it.

The Chair: Okay, we've got to go on to Mr Sterling.

Mr Sterling: I found your brief very interesting, as I did our conversation immediately preceding your brief. Putting those two together and some of the evidence we had yesterday in front of this committee—we had someone tell us that we'd lost about 15% in the last part of the 1980s in terms of productivity vis-à-vis the United States. What would our loss of productivity be vis-à-vis other industrialized countries? You say the United States has difficulty competing offshore. I assume, therefore, that we have lost even more than 15% in the latter part of the 1980s in terms of productivity.

1010

Dr de Bever: It depends in what sectors and against what countries. I would say we probably have lost a lot of competitiveness vis-à-vis the Far East, although there are offsets. We lost productivity relative to Taiwan in electronics, but lately both Canada and the United States have been gaining it back. In my profession you need a lot of hardware to do the kind of analysis you do. The products that were used in the upgrades were all North American; they were Canadian and American.

The products they replaced were Taiwanese. There's a message there: If we set our minds to it, we can create the products at the price and of a higher quality than some other nations can, so it's not something where you can say that it doesn't matter where you are, that you lose competitiveness.

We have lost competitiveness in sectors where we didn't pay attention. Steel is one of them where we lost competitiveness relative to the US and relative to the Far East because we just didn't do anything. We let the devaluation of the dollar in the early 1980s carry us. Profits didn't look too bad so we didn't do much in the way of upgrading our situation, and as a result we did lose competitiveness, measured in the way of unit labour cost.

I would say that our biggest problem is in two areas. One is the emerging nations in the Far East. The other problem really has nothing to do with productivity in terms of being able to produce so many tons of something per worker or per man-hour; it has to do with the fact that there's new supply coming on. You look at Inco, Falconbridge: People in the metals markets are having to compete much harder than they used to with supply from the former Soviet Union because, instead of funnelling their supply into their defence industry, they're now selling it internationally. So it's a different source of losing competitiveness.

Mr Sterling: One of the things that I think you said in your brief to us today, and what I've gathered, is that the low productivity in the latter part of the 1980s and the relatively high rise in wages and the loss of employment during this recession have resulted basically from those people who have fairly good-paying jobs really being too greedy. Is that a blunt statement of the fact?

Dr de Bever: That's basically it. The way I usually put it is that if all of us had taken 5% less in terms of earnings, we probably would have 3% or 4% more jobs than we have now; it's that easy. You would have the same wage bill but it would be distributed over more people, so on average more of us would have jobs at a somewhat lower rate, but we probably would make up for it in terms of not having the stress level that a lot of us work with because of fears that we might be next.

It's that kind of psychology. All of us are out for number one. You're not going to change that. But you have to create an environment where you induce people to be not quite as greedy, or at least leave themselves a way out when times turn bad and it becomes obvious that this greed, whatever you call it, was just not justified. That's what we're lacking.

Mr Sterling: I guess what you're saying, therefore, is that the labour policies of the governments of Ontario and Canada should be changed. We've just come through a very tumultuous year in terms of strengthening the power of organized labour, those who already have. So I would assume, from what you're saying, that the government has gone completely in the opposite direction in strengthening the hand of organized labour, those who already have, to get more. It would have been more logical in terms of what appears to be going to weaken their hand.

Dr de Bever: It all depends on what kinds of unions you're dealing with. It used to be that a good union leader was the guy who got you the biggest raise. I would maintain right now that he is probably one of the dumbest guys around. The smart union leader in the 1990s is the guy who gets you the most flexible union contract, the one that leaves you the flexibility to take when there is money for the taking but allows you a graceful retreat when times are bad. I think that's where the problem is.

Unions are only bad from the standpoint of the employer if the union fails to keep pace with what is happening in industries and is not willing to cooperate in terms of making employment patterns more flexible and shifting resources around so that the aggregate pie keeps on growing. I think that's where a lot of unions have made mistakes. Look at Algoma: Algoma never should have happened, because it's clearly an example of old-style union bargaining.

What you have to have in the future is much more flexibility, because it's going to be done one way or the other. The way I see it being done now in sectors where there isn't that flexibility is that people become unemployed and end up taking jobs elsewhere at a much lower level than they were earning before. The overall friction would have been a lot less if they had been smarter and started to throttle back when there was still time to save the corporations they were working for before.

Ms Margaret H. Harrington (Niagara Falls): I really appreciate your brief. Certainly I think it's worth a couple of weeks of a university course.

You made some interesting statements. I just want to follow up on a few of them. I did appreciate your saying that labour should be more flexible and treated with grace, a different attitude, the things you were just mentioning to Mr Sterling about cooperation, a different psychology and working together, because we can't have that unsustainable type of growth, I would agree with you, that we had during the 1980s. We need stability and partnership going ahead.

Dr de Bever: Right, but that has to have real content; it can't be just lipservice. That's where I often find things a little shallow. I would be a lot more comfortable if a lot more union leaders had a better understanding of the dynamics that drive their industries. I realize that sometimes the public persona is different from what they really understand and what's going on, but I think that's what a large part of the problem is.

Ms Harrington: They need the knowledge, and therefore they can then be partners with the managers, I would think, in looking ahead for the future of that company.

Dr de Bever: You have to have that. I think you get bad unions when you have bad management, and good unions I think can work with good management. That may seem like a platitude, but ultimately, if you compare Canadian and US unions in that regard, US unions sometimes tend to be a little bit more pragmatic than Canadian unions. There's a bit more ideology when I listen to the language that's being used here, and I think that's part of the reason that Canadian unemployment rates tend to be more cyclical than US unemployment rates.

Ms Harrington: You talked about the future and that things would not be healthy in the steel industry, that there would be less reliance on auto, and you talked about more service-type industry in the future. How can we help? What advice would you give to us as a government as to how to stimulate that, and can you explain what you mean or give some examples of services?

Dr de Bever: You see, this is the problem. Many of the services that are going to be produced over the next 10 years are just concepts now. I find that particularly in business services, where a lot of them have to do with communications, software and things of that sort. It's very hard to visualize what's happening there. You see companies developing to provide new services with, say, half a dozen people instead of the large industrial organizations we're used to.

The fact is that when you look at the service industry, it has been growing and it keeps on growing over time. Even though it's hard to visualize what the incremental services are going to be, my intuitive sense is that they're going to be revolving around monitoring business processes to make them more efficient; in other words, software to do industrial monitoring, to do financial monitoring, to do more automated banking, those kinds of things that facilitate other transactions. And they're going to be related to what is often called human capital formation, education types of activity. I think one of the growth industries in the 1990s is going to be education in all its forms, not just public education but also industrial education. That's where the service industry is going to be growing, because, as a number of people have already pointed out, knowledge is what's going to produce the products of tomorrow, whether they be goods or services. That's the direction we're heading in.

The trouble a lot of people have visualizing that is I think part of why they fear the future so much. You can relate to a ton of steel, it has a feel to it, whereas services are ephemeral; you can have trouble visualizing. People talk about restaurants, flipping hamburgers. That is not the service industry. There are a lot of good jobs in the service industry. In fact, right now there are probably more people involved in producing software than there are in producing cars. Those kinds of statistics are starting to amaze people, but that's the reality. That's the way our economy is shifting.

The Chair: We have to come to a close here, Leo. I think a lot of the remarks you have made are consistent with some of the other presenters we've had, so either you're reading some of their briefs or this is your research in this particular area.

Mr Gary Carr (Oakville South): Or they're all right.

The Chair: Well, I hope they're all right. It's a pleasure to have you here again this year, Leo, and maybe we'll see you again next year. Thanks for coming.

Dr de Bever: Good to be here. Thanks.

1020

BANK OF NOVA SCOTIA

The Chair: Our next presenters are the Bank of Nova Scotia. Would you come forward and identify yourselves for the purposes of Hansard. Welcome to the committee. You've got nothing but good news.

Mr Aron Gampel: Of course.

The Chair: I'm at the Royal Bank. I had the manager call the other day: He wants my charge card, to snip it up after Christmas. I've got to be good.

Mr Carr: Tell him about your big pay raise.

The Chair: Oh, yes.

Mr Gampel: My name is Aron Gampel, vice-president of economics, Scotiabank. I've brought along my colleague, David Rosenberg, senior economist at Scotiabank. I'd like to read into the record our submission to this committee.

Ontario economic prospects: Lower interest rates and currency depreciation are helping to stabilize the Ontario economy. However, a vigorous expansion is unlikely any time soon. Provincial output should rise by just over 2% in 1993 following an estimated 1% gain last year. This meagre two-year advance recoups less than half of the recession's damage.

Scotiabank's forecast for the province is much less optimistic than the projections contained in the Ontario Economic Outlook prepared by Treasurer Laughren last October. In our view, provincial growth will continue to lag the national average, as it has over the past four years. Additional forecast detail is provided in our Global Economic Outlook included with this submission.

Ontario will continue to struggle with widespread industry rationalization, which has reduced employment by 5.5% since early 1990. The bulk of these job losses has been permanent, reflecting the massive restructuring dominating this recession, and will take time to replace. Moreover, the shift to part-time hirings is likely to continue.

Employment conditions in the hard-hit manufacturing and construction sectors should improve. However, job creation is likely to be fairly limited in the public sector and a number of other service industries that dominate provincial employment. With businesses focusing on improving productivity and containing costs, a revival in output will be accomplished with only limited job gains. On balance, Ontario's unemployment rate will likely remain stuck in double-digit territory, only moderately below the 11.1% rate reported in December.

A slow-motion recovery and the prospect of further setbacks will keep the household sector cautious and financially conservative. There may be temporary spurts in spending, but a solid and sustained rebound is unlikely until record household debt burdens are brought down. This process is being frustrated by the ongoing assault on income from layoffs, wage compression, higher taxes and the rising cost of government services. The pervasive weakness in housing prices and a soft equity market performance are adding to the cautious tone in spending.

As a result, the consumer will contribute only modestly to the recovery under way. While sales should outpace inflation, as they did in 1992 for the first time in three years, competitive pressures on retail margins will remain intense.

However, there will be some good news for local merchants as cross-border shopping recedes from last year's high-water mark. The 10-cent US drop in the Canadian dollar since late 1991 has begun to reverse a five-year runup in buying excursions south of the border. More aggressive pricing, Sunday shopping, tougher border rules and the startup of numerous discount wholesalers also are helping to bolster domestic receipts.

Ontario producers will continue to benefit from the better sales environment in the United States. Domestic competitiveness has been boosted by significant exchange rate depreciation. Firms have moved to restore profitability by cutting costs and increasing productivity. Businesses also are benefiting from recent budget initiatives by the Ontario and federal governments to reduce the tax rate for manufacturers and provide for more favourable accelerated depreciation allowances.

Motor vehicle output should rise by over 4% in 1993 following a similar gain last year. Production of popular light trucks and vans, now accounting for one third of all North American vehicle sales, will lead the way and help lift domestic motor vehicle production above 2 million units for the first time on record. These vehicles make up over 40% of domestic assembly capacity.

Ontario housing starts are expected to climb by more than 10% to 63,000 units in 1993. Builders will receive support from low mortgage rates, strong international immigration and a firm supply-demand balance in single-family homes. Extending the RRSP tax holiday for house purchases should also help. Nevertheless, multiple-unit activity will continue to be undermined by the highest vacancy rate in two decades. The ongoing construction of government-assisted units in Ontario will underpin starts but also will aggravate the existing supply overhang.

While we expect Ontario to lead the country in housing construction this year, provincial starts will be 40% below the peak levels of the late 1980s. Weak confidence is offsetting much of the stimulus from reduced financing costs. Declining real estate prices have improved affordability for first-time buyers but have reduced the ability of existing home owners to trade up using accumulated home equity. Uncertain jobs prospects also are an impediment to a strong revival in sales.

Non-residential construction is confronted with a massive supply overhang. Vacancy rates have soared to record levels and are still climbing. The need to absorb an enormous number of empty offices, shopping centres and industrial plants left over from the building boom of the late 1980s will constrain activity through mid-decade.

The supply glut is acute in commercial real estate. Close to half of the 58 million square feet of vacant office space nationwide is situated in Toronto. Nearly 70% of the nine million square feet of new supply added to the downtown core from 1989 through 1991 has yet to be absorbed.

More than half of Canada's 140 million square feet of empty manufacturing facilities is in the Toronto region. Industrial land values and leasing rates in this area are down by 50% over the past three years. Industrial construction has continued to slide, with sagging permit values pointing to further slippage in 1993.

1030

Demographics remain favourable to growth, with provincial population increasing by almost 2% annually. Ontario is the destination of more than half of new arrivals, an inflow of roughly 100,000 last year. There also is evidence that the outflow of Ontario residents to other provinces which began in 1989 is diminishing. However, the challenge is to create jobs at a pace that will accommodate our expanding population.

With Canada likely to experience a low-inflation, slow-motion recovery in 1993, interest rates should continue to decline. However, the flexibility of monetary policy to provide durable relief has been undermined by the need to borrow $30 billion annually in overseas markets to fund a chronic current account deficit. This imbalance is dominated by interest payments on government debt. Sudden shifts in international investor sentiment have triggered recurring bouts of exchange rate and interest rate turbulence in recent months, repeatedly putting roadblocks in the way of recovery.

Budget implications: Lingering economic strains will continue to put enormous pressure on provincial finances. Despite widespread tax increases, the Treasurer already has indicated that revenues in fiscal year 1993-94 could fall more than $4 billion short of last year's projections. The shortfall could be even larger if Mr Laughren's optimistic growth projections fail to materialize. Deficits in the $10- to $15-billion range are unsustainable and put a heavy mortgage on future growth prospects in this province.

Ontario is falling into the same debt trap that snared Ottawa during the 1980s. According to last year's optimistic budget assumptions, sustained economic growth fails to bring spending into line with revenues for the foreseeable future. Deficits of more than $5 billion through mid-decade will push outstanding debt above $80 billion, twice the level prevailing at the start of the decade. Debt service costs, which absorb 12 cents of every revenue dollar, will increasingly dominate provincial spending even under a strong growth scenario.

Provincial finances will stay under intense pressure even if business activity accelerates more sharply than anticipated because spending has moved massively out of line with revenue-generating capacity. The government now spends $1.22 for every tax dollar raised, the highest of any province. Despite the lipservice paid to spending cuts, program expenditures continue to outpace inflation by a considerable margin.

Cuts in transfer payments from Ottawa have aggravated the fiscal imbalance and will probably continue to be a fact of life for provincial policymakers. However, excessive spending, not inadequate revenue growth, is the real problem. Federal transfer payments to Ontario have risen at a solid 6% annual rate since 1984.

The November 1992 Ontario Fiscal Outlook highlights the enormous requirements to upgrade an aging infrastructure, protect the environment and maintain public services. However, the government is in a fiscal straitjacket. Soaring debt service and social welfare costs are already forcing retrenchment in health care and education. The need for cut-backs in these areas has been amplified by the Treasurer's decision to insulate other priorities from recession damage. Expenditures on pay equity, non-profit housing, the employee wage protection program, the Jobs Ontario Training fund and legal aid are to rise by almost $700 million this year, absorbing most of the net gain from all revenue measures contained in last May's budget.

Ontario's fiscal challenge: Meaningful progress in reducing Ontario's deficit requires a multi-year freeze of total program spending. Attempts to pay for new programs and offset a softer revenue trend with tax increases are self-defeating, particularly in an increasingly challenging international environment. Recent tax relief for manufacturers at the federal and provincial levels is a welcome development. However, the shift in the tax burden to the household sector undercuts the potential for a rebound in sales activity.

Ontario cannot borrow its way back to prosperity. Ottawa's debt trap is a stark reminder of the need for a cautious borrowing strategy. Credit rating agencies already have flashed warning signals, downgrading Ontario's debt to double A from triple A. Sustaining or improving the province's rating requires meaningful restraint, not initiatives that obscure the underlying problem or move spending off-budget.

The cost of servicing a record debt load is already siphoning off the funds needed to improve competitiveness, shield business from adverse developments and meet pressing new environmental and infrastructural requirements. The average Ontario household now carries a net federal-provincial debt totalling $60,000; that is, $45,000 federal and $15,000 provincial. At an interest rate of 8.5%, households would have to pay more than $400 in taxes per month to service this liability even with no repayment of principal. This interest burden is slated to continue rising through mid-decade, notwithstanding optimistic official projections.

To prevent deteriorating finances from dominating the policy agenda through the 1990s, the government must move forcibly to streamline existing programs. Many programs will have to go through a major downsizing to make room for new requirements. Aging road and sewer networks are in urgent need of upgrading. Massive requirements are looming for environmental protection.

To get the economy back on track, the government must focus on improving competitiveness. At the most fundamental level, new initiatives that conflict with this goal should be shelved. Health care and education will absorb over one half of government spending for the foreseeable future. Debt service costs are growing rapidly. With about two thirds of spending already locked in, the decision to divert the remainder of expenditures to social services has worrisome, longer-term implications for productivity growth.

The government has little option but to bring spending commitments in line with available revenues. Fiscal reform is never easy, particularly in a weak economic environment, but there is simply no alternative. Borrowing allows temporary breathing room but only at the cost of much more painful adjustments later this decade.

1040

The Chair: Thank you. I think there's a lot of meat in this brief that you've had. Mr Carr has questions, to start off with the Conservatives.

Mr Carr: I really appreciate the brief. If the Treasurer could do nothing but read page 3 of your brief, I think he would get it in a nutshell. I don't know how you can say it any clearer.

Looking at the facts, the one that really intrigued me was down at the bottom where we look at the average household debt, and putting in the interest rates, they will have to pay more than $400 per month just to service this liability. As a married person with three children, it's a daunting thought to think of what we are leaving the children.

Having said that, looking at the provincial debt where it stands right now—and the Treasurer is coming in this afternoon—what would be your recommendations to the Treasurer with regard to our debt that now is probably in the double digits, 11, 12, 13 or whatever it is? What do you say to him about our deficit? What should he be doing with it?

Mr Gampel: In our view, one must start off with what the economy is expected to do over the next year. What we would like to see the government do is to put in place a series of programs, obviously, that will help the economy grow at a faster pace. As I read into the record, our forecast is that the economy will likely remain subpar through 1993 and far below the government's projections, which are close to 4% for provincial output.

A lot of the problems are not Ontario-specific. We are locked into a slow growth environment globally. At a time when North America is picking up some steam, economic conditions around the world are slowing sharply. Japan and Germany are now locked into very serious recessions which are dragging those regions into significant downturns.

What Mr Laughren can do, obviously, is to put in place a budget that will reinforce confidence among business people, households and investors. That's a daunting challenge at this particular time. Holding the line on spending, putting in a very, I think, longer-term view towards reducing the deficit significantly through major spending cutbacks is obviously a major cure for what ails this province. I think there is nothing magic that can be done. It requires significant cutbacks in spending to get the deficit down, because revenues alone are insufficient to do the job.

Mr Carr: I think we're winning the battle with the Treasurer very slowly. I remember when they came in and said they were going to spend $700 million to spend our way out of the recession. I remember watching the other side clap and cheer. In this quarter alone, we'll cut out more than that because of the fiscal pressures. I honestly, truly believe, as you know, the Premier made the decision to hold the deficit, and I don't think it's because he woke up and became a fiscal conservative. I think what happened was he was getting a lot of pressure, realizing that we are borrowing offshore. I also believe one of the reasons he made the trip to Japan was to alleviate some of the fears, not because he wanted a holiday there.

We've heard many economists come in here and talk about how our real concern is that our debt is owed to foreigners. That's a major problem because we don't only owe ourselves provincially; we owe foreigners. Would you like to comment—I think you were here for the other presentation—on what that means for us in Ontario to owe so much to the Japanese, the Americans, the West Germans and so on?

Mr Gampel: When we are borrowing so much at a time when domestic savings are obviously at a premium, we are increasingly tapping offshore markets. There is obviously a risk to that, because confidence is a fleeting factor that can change overnight, and certainly the weakness in the Canadian dollar has tended to reinforce the view that Canada may not be the best place to put money at this time.

There is a market out there for higher-quality government securities. Ontario will be able to float issues. The problem will be that we will have to do it at a higher cost to the province and we may have to do it in foreign currencies in order to encourage continued access to foreign funds. Essentially, what it means is that we will be able to borrow, but it's going to be at a higher cost. It's not so much that there is a buyer strike out there, it's just that they're demanding an extra premium. There may be a case that can be made that portfolios will become sated to the point that even a higher interest rate may not be sufficient to guarantee that we can float our issues, but we have not reached that point as of yet. Certainly, at a time when private sector credit demands are still quite weak, governments can go in and float issues. However, it is going to cost us more to do so.

Mr Sterling: When I was a member of cabinet in the early 1980s and was involved in the 1982-83 recession, when we were coming out of that recession there was a question as to whether or not the government of Ontario should really constrain expenditures in order to eliminate a deficit which was very, very low in terms of today's deficit figures. I think it was around $1 billion to $2 billion. The banks at that point in time said to us, "Look, don't be too stringent in terms of coming out of this recession" etc.

We're in a different time now. A lot of people who have been in front of this committee say we're taking on the federal problem, that the province of Ontario seems to be a mirror of the federal problem before. Prime Minister Mulroney came in in 1984, and from 1984 to 1992, he's increased his spending by 3% per year in operational matters and has not gone above inflation, while Ontario's increased its expenditures by around 10%. That's happened by various and nefarious means, but that's a fact. Yet it doesn't appear that Mulroney has control of the federal financial situation. It seems a conundrum or a problem where he's no further ahead now than he was in 1984.

What seems to be the lesson is that some government has to take some very, very dramatic action in order to deal with this. Quite frankly, I don't really believe this Treasurer or this government are going to do it, but I think perhaps the next government will do it, be it Liberals or Conservatives or whoever.

What kind of action can a Treasurer take to address this situation? As I say, I think the federal situation indicates that a slow, gradual approach is not going to work. There's got to be some kind of shock or there's got to be something that's very, very dramatic. Have you any suggestions at all as to what options a government has?

Mr Gampel: Again, as we've mentioned in our submission, obviously we have to go through all program spending and either put freezes in real terms or dramatically scale back spending in order to free up funds that can be used to revitalize industries, to help with infrastructural improvements, as opposed to running up very large deficits which in turn have been a major factor in now distorting our current account balance.

This is one of the problems we face, that right now, at a time when we have low inflation, our interest rates are very high. Lower interest rates would obviously go a long way towards improving economic conditions, improving affordability for home owners, for small businesses. One of the problems, of course, is that the massive runup in federal and provincial deficits and debt over the past decade has come to the point that our interest payments are essentially pushing these deficits out of control. Because of that, we now have a chronic current account deficit that requires us to borrow annually something in the order of $30 billion. That massive borrowing has put Canada into the big league of foreign borrowers—we are now the number two net debtor in the world—so we must now continue to offer very high real interest rates in order to attract funds into this country.

1050

I don't think there are any magic answers other than, at a time when economies are growing slowly and are not spinning off high revenues, even with massive tax hikes, and with the increase in the cost of government services, a major attack on spending has to be implemented in order to get the deficits down, to reduce the growing interest burden, to improve government fiscal finances, which in turn would improve our credit rating and help to alleviate the interest rate pressures which continue to exist. In short, cutbacks, streamlining of all programs, has to be the order, the rule rather than the exception.

Ms Anne Swarbrick (Scarborough West): I appreciate why Mr Carr was feeling particularly positive about your presentation, because I confess that of all the banks and all the traditional economists who've made presentations to us so far yesterday and today, yours is the first where I clearly feel some very definite politics behind the presentation. I'd like to make reference to a few parts.

For instance: "Despite widespread tax increases, the Treasurer already has indicated that revenues...could fall more than $4 billion." No reference there, nor in the small reference later, to the fact that the federal government took $4.5 billion out of our revenues last year alone, no reference to the fact that we in fact lowered business taxes.

You later say: "Spending has moved massively out of line with revenue-generating capacity. Despite the lipservice paid to spending cuts, program expenditures continue to outpace inflation by a considerable margin. Excessive spending—not inadequate revenue growth—is the real problem."

You make no reference to the fact that this government very much scrutinized expenditures last year, to the point that we managed to cut the growth in government expenditures in this province by $3 billion when we had only been in office for one and one half years. That's the largest cut in expenditure growth in this province in almost 40 years, and no credit given for that to a government of a year and a half of experience here.

You make no reference to the fact that the greatest spending problem isn't the spending problem by this government. It's the great increase in social assistance costs, and we haven't created that problem. That's the problem created by the reality that we're dealing with out there, the incredible recession that's gone deeper than any of you had expected it to and caused greater job loss than anybody had expected, for a longer period of time.

You give us no credit, no reference at all to the phenomenal—and yesterday there were a number of presenters who made very positive reference to the phenomenal turnaround that our government has been able to make in the cost of health care in this province, costs that under past governments had been double-digit increases each year for at least the last 10 years. Ours is now down to 1.6% in annual increase, I believe.

So I guess my questions to you are, number one, could you please get rid of the politics behind your presentation and deal just with the facts and the problems that we're all facing?

My real problem to you is that you say, in answer to my colleague's questions from the other side, that you believe we should be introducing major spending cuts. First, could you try to be specific? It's very nice for people to come here with very generalized suggestions that we undergo spending cuts. Well, we've put in place one heck of a lot of spending cuts. I'd like to hear you be specific about which ones you think the Ontario public in fact could swallow.

Second, if it is non-profit housing, as Mr Carr suggests that you talk about, then I would like you to comment on what the impact of that would be. Because as we heard yesterday, the starts in non-profit housing have been where the increases have been in the housing starts in this province last year. It seems to me that what we've done there has been very positive in terms of helping to stimulate the economy, to start the minor bits of recovery that have already been starting.

My other specific questions would be, what are your comments in terms of some of the prescriptions that other people sitting in your chairs yesterday and today have talked about, the needs to put more money into infrastructure, the needs to put more money into training? What are your comments in terms of those kinds of prescriptions for improving our economy?

Mr Gampel: Let me just address one issue. On page 3 of my submission, we allude to the fact of cuts in transfer payments from Ottawa, which have been a factor, obviously.

Ms Swarbrick: I know you allude to it.

Mr Gampel: Well, it's in the record. Again, federal transfer payments to Ontario have risen at more than a 6% annual rate since 1984. That's a very healthy rate.

Ms Swarbrick: That kind of comment of course makes no reference to what the needs have been and what the demands have been, so I'd really appreciate it if you'd get to the heart of my questions. What exact spending cuts would you prescribe? What are your comments about infrastructure and training and those kinds of investments?

Mr Gampel: When we look at what the budgetary situation is and living within the government's means, we still have, even with the significant expenditure cuts—I guess what I could do is forward to you our budget analysis after the spring budget; I did not bring it along today, but I can. In that, we went through some of the significant restraints you had mentioned. I would think expenditures are still out of line, because they're still growing faster than inflation. The only way in a soft-growth environment that we can get the deficit down—

Ms Swarbrick: Which expenditures? Social assistance, right?

Mr Gampel: That's one area that is growing very fast. Interest payments on the public debt as well—

Ms Swarbrick: Those two.

Mr Gampel: —which continues to rise at a very, very healthy rate. I would say our best type of advice here is to set the stage as to what the economy is doing from a national and international perspective.

For economists at the Bank of Nova Scotia to provide you with detailed spending areas is not what I think my job should be at this particular date. What we would see is government working with business and the consumer in trying to revitalize economic activity and putting in place an environment that is friendlier to economic growth. In that case, we need to get interest rates down; we need to get government spending down to try to get the deficit under control and reduce the debt burden and inexorable rise in interest payments and taxes which that entails. One of the problems we face here is that the tax burden has risen so much that it is deflecting businesses and spending outside of this country. I think that is an issue that has to be addressed.

Again, as I mentioned in this brief and as I mentioned already, it is exceedingly difficult to make the choices as to what program, which line item has to be cut. What has to be done is obviously right across the board. Expenditures have to be brought down. If it has to be, for example, as you mentioned, social assisted housing, we're putting in more multiple-unit starts at a time when we have tremendous overcapacity in that particular sector. It is just adding to the glut and helping to drive down prices in the area.

Ms Swarbrick: Thank goodness they're helping to drive down prices.

Mr Gampel: I think the easiest way to do it is to cut spending across all sectors, whether it's in social spending, in government compensation—it could be right across the board. I think that's the easiest way of cutting back, whether it's health, education, welfare, any industrial policies. Everything has to be cut at this particular time to try to get the economy into better balance.

The Chair: Mr Ward, I'm going to have to pass you. You're time is up. I'll put your name down for the next presenters and go on to Mr Kwinter.

Mr Monte Kwinter (Wilson Heights): Mr Gampel, I just wanted to draw your attention to a statement you made on the first page and a statement you made on the second page.

The one on the first page says, "Scotiabank's forecast for the province is much less optimistic than the projections contained in the Ontario Economic Outlook." By that, I assume you feel that their projections as to the economic growth are not going to be as buoyant as they think, and as a result of that their revenues are not going to be as buoyant as they think, because revenues are directly tied to the ability to tax the increased growth.

Then on the second page at the bottom of the second column you say, "The shortfall could be even larger if Mr Laughren's optimistic growth projections fail to materialize." So you've already, in your minds anyway, made the decision that they're not going to materialize, that they're optimistic, and you feel it's going to be a more subdued growth. That means it isn't a matter of whether his projections are going to materialize, that they're not going to materialize; which means that the deficit which is now, they admit, going to be at least $10 billion and could be $12 billion or $13 billion and maybe even higher—what is going to be the direct impact of that happening? It isn't whether it's going to happen; it's going to happen. I'm asking if you feel that way.

Mr Gampel: Again, these are forecasts, so to be as definitive as you are might be difficult. Our best guess is that the economy will not grow as strongly as Mr Laughren has indicated, and therefore we would expect the budget deficit would likely come in over the projections that have been indicated.

At the bottom of page 2, we indicate that deficits in the $10-billion to $15-billion range are unsustainable and obviously are going to continue to put a heavy mortgage on our future growth prospects. I think that what we're left with is a continued budgetary imbalance that is massive by historical standards and will continue to aggravate our growing and chronic debt burden.

1100

What it means, of course, is that the Canadian dollar will remain vulnerable to periodic turbulence and interest rates probably cannot come down as much as we'd like to see them come down relative to a more subdued growth and inflation pace. Other than accounting changes, ie, moving various items off budget, which could give a one-time more optimistic view, I think we have to look at the total picture. It would be hard pressed in a slow growth environment, unless we have major expenditure cuts and tax increases, to see the deficits come down in the environment that we paint of relatively subdued activity.

A faster growth scenario would obviously benefit revenues. It would also mitigate some of the expenditures that are highly cyclical. But the bottom line is that it is hard pressed, in looking at total deficits, whether they are on budget or off budget, to see any significant improvement from current levels.

Mr Kwinter: If I could ask one more question, and I'm not asking this to be self-serving on your part, your projections are relatively sobering and relatively small-c conservative compared to some of the others we've heard. I'm just curious to know, historically, how have you guys done?

Mr Gampel: That is sort of a difficult question to ask economists. Before everyone sort of hurts themselves laughing, I think there are numerous ratings that are in various trade papers. The Conference Board of Canada does regular summaries of banks and investment houses on their forecasting records. If you go back, as we do on numerous occasions, and look over the past maybe five years, I think Scotiabank ranks very high in its forecasting accuracy. We have been consistently on the side of a much deeper economic downturn, and more importantly, a much slower snapback in economic activity from the recession lows. On that basis, we continue to be at the low end of the forecasting spectrum right now, and we will remain so until we see more consistent evidence that the economies in Canada and the United States are turning up at a faster pace.

Mr Sean G. Conway (Renfrew North): Don't be bashful. I think you've made an interesting and helpful presentation. I am not normally a member of the committee, but I was looking at some of the material yesterday and from what I can judge, people who have been here in previous years who have been spectacularly wrong returned this year even more aggressively than last time, so don't feel the need to be shy or self-deprecating on that account.

Many questions present themselves, but there is one very specific question, one sort of general question. I was home over Christmas and I was reading in the papers—I think we should get specific. Now I'm the Treasurer of Ontario and you're my adviser in this current environment. I read in the paper early in this year, "Ontario judges to receive 6.7% increase," over I forget what term. Ontario provincial judges are among the best paid people in the province. You're my adviser on the basis of this kind of data that you presented.

Should I endorse that kind of expenditure increase in that particular category, for example? Would that be a place to say, "Good people undoubtedly underpaid for what they do," but 6.7% in this kind of climate, with this kind of red ink and given the leadership position here—not on?

Mr Gampel: I would say that wage settlements significantly in excess of what the running rate of inflation is, for a government, are just unacceptable at this particular time. I think it's awfully difficult to constrain wages, whether it's because of pay equity or productivity gains or productivity levels. The bottom line is that given the seriousness of the budgetary situation in this province, wage restraint has to be the order of the day. These are very tough times, and therefore all measures which can reduce government expenditures at this time probably should be taken.

Mr Conway: But on the basis of what you submit here today, surely that's got to be the easiest decision I'm going to make as Treasurer.

Mr Gampel: Certainly there are many areas that restraint—

Mr Conway: Just forget all the rest. I'm talking about a specific example.

Mr Gampel: That is an example. Wages, because they comprise so much of government expenditures, obviously are a key area of restraint.

Mr Conway: Finally, can you help me? Yesterday, I left this committee and, incredibly, went home and watched the Panetta confirmation hearings in the Senate, and I just thought: "God, this debate is very similar. In this country, whether it was the Trudeau or Peterson Liberals or the Davis Tories or the godless New Democrats, they've given us this mountain of debt." But then you go to the United States and you see the Reaganite crowd. They were as bad as David Stockman said they would be 10 years ago. So now they've got this mountain of debt. Thanks to the Conservative right, we've got the same mess in both jurisdictions to some real extent.

There's good, old Ross Perot in Dallas saying now that this entire establishment is completely and congenitally incapable of doing the things you, sir, submit that we're going to have to do. I don't believe this is a matter of economics; I think it's really a matter of psychology and how we deal with some sense of public commitment on all sides to be responsible and disciplined and do the right thing. What advice do you have for us as politicians as to how we create a climate where individual citizens see that they have some responsibility to do something personal and particular, whether it's giving up twice-a-week garbage collection in Rosedale or whether it is the judges? I see the federal judges are going to take Mazankowski to court because they don't really think a minimum salary of $155,000 is enough.

We spend a lot of time talking about welfare abuse, by the way, at the other end, and I was ranting about that yesterday. How do we create an environment and a psychology where everyone, particularly the middle-class, opinion-making elite, who work in legislatures, banks and universities, who've had one hell of a lot to do with driving up some of these big-ticket items, is going to understand that we can't pay for it, and that means something to them personally, like, "Judge, you're a great person, but you're just going to have to live with zero per cent," or to university professor X, "You know, you're a great person doing wonderful work, but an average salary of 80 grand is enough for the moment." How do we do that?

Mr Gampel: Until governments essentially just take the bull by the horns and unilaterally do it—I think as long as people feel they are getting some benefit from services that are provided and cannot really bear the true cost for those goods, well, then, they will continue to utilize them, and not in an economic sense. Right now, though, the tax burden that has risen so dramatically is probably rifling home what has to be done. With the marginal rates in Ontario back above 50%, with the gigantic increases in the cost of government services, with user fees or higher costs for water, for hydro, for licences, the message is being driven home.

Obviously, though, it's up to governments to essentially now buckle down and take the situation in hand. I don't think there is a general view out there that this is a problem related to any specific government or a problem that's related to any specific province or country. This is a problem that is facing the North American countries and is not going to go away. I don't know if we have to educate any more. I think people are getting educated every time they have to do their tax form and every time they have to go to the store.

Mr Conway: The latest public opinion research indicates—

The Chair: Mr Conway, I'm sorry. We're over right now.

Mr Conway: Just a final question: The latest public opinion research indicates that the public wants less taxes and more of the higher-cost services. What do we have to do to break that psychologically?

The Chair: Mr Conway, I'm sorry, we're over time. I was very patient. It was a good question you had and I ran over. Gentlemen, I'd like to thank you for appearing before this committee. The last question Mr Conway had was a real good one. I liked your answer too.

1110

ROYAL BANK OF CANADA

The Chair: The next group we have is the Royal Bank of Canada. Would you come forward, please, and introduce yourselves for the purposes of Hansard. I'd like to welcome you to the committee.

Mr Mark E. Chandler: Good morning. My name is Mark Chandler. I'm the assistant chief economist, Royal Bank economics. I will be giving you the presentation this morning that deals with the global outlook and the national outlook and the implications for our financial markets. I'll be followed up by Benoît Durocher. Benoît, do you want to introduce yourself?

Mr Benoît Durocher: As Mark said, my name is Benoît Durocher and I'm regional economist for the bank. As such, I'm responsible for the forecasting of economic conditions, growth and all the variables for all 10 Canadian provinces.

The Chair: Okay, carry on.

Mr Chandler: I'll get started right away then. I hope to keep my comments brief on the national outlook and then we'll turn right away to what we see for Ontario.

I'll start by saying that this is the third year in a row I've been before the committee and I'm certainly more optimistic than I have been in past years, although in some sense this reflects the depth of the problems in the past.

Last year, we called for a very poor 1992, with output growth of just 1.7%. In the event, growth was not too far off that figure, I'm sorry to say. We also warned that revenue growth would be lower than projected for the province and we recommended that discretionary expenditure growth should reflect this reality.

Some of the factors we cited at that time for this weak growth included weak growth elsewhere in the world and a high level of real interest rates. It included some adjustments to recent policies including freer trade, deregulation and privatization, adjustments to the GST and environmental legislation. We also had high debt levels at both the household and business level as well as at the government level. We also had a situation of low commodity prices, and internationally as well as in Canada a focus on price stability. Adjustments to all those factors suggested that we were going to have some structural things in place that would detract from any normal, cyclical acceleration in growth that might be forthcoming.

This year, many of the same factors are in play that might hold back a typically strong cyclical rebound. Nevertheless, we do have some factors in our favour that will yield moderate but not spectacular growth. Here are three factors that make us more optimistic this year:

The first is that the Canadian dollar has, for several years in the past, been trading at above its competitive value based on a long-run cost basis. It is now roughly in line with our cost structure after falling more than 10% in the past year. Interest rates are about 25 basis points below where they were a year ago.

As well, Canadians are beginning to adjust to an era of low inflation. As a result, we see some downward pressure on interest rates, particularly long-term interest rates, despite the expected acceleration in growth. Our forecast calls for a further reduction of some 50 to 75 basis points in long-term interest rates this year, while prime rates are expected to average at the current level of 7% throughout the year.

Finally, while economic activity is expected to languish in Germany and Japan, growth in the OECD countries overall will indeed pick up. The OECD is expecting growth of 2% in the first half of this year and 2.5% in the second half of this year. Of direct importance to Canada is the expected performance of the US economy. Here we see growth accelerating to 3.2% this year and 3.5% next year. This will afford Canada and Ontario some much-needed room to improve their external trade. Indeed, we see exports adding about 0.5% to growth for the nation as a whole this year.

These positive factors are expected to offset the drag on growth from some of the structural changes the nation is undergoing, structural changes that have had a particularly devastating impact on Ontario. On balance, we see the growth for the nation as a whole at 3.5% this year and 4.1% next year. As I said, we expect the prime rate to hold at its current level of about 7% throughout the end of this year and for the Canadian dollar to weaken initially before recovering to 79.5 cents by the end of this year.

I will now turn the discussion over to Benoît Durocher, our regional economist, to discuss the implications for growth and the fiscal arrangements in Ontario. Before I do so, I'll just explain some of the documents you have in front of you in your package. We have our latest Econoscope, which covers some of the issues involving Canada's international competitiveness, and some looseleaf papers, including Ontario's economic outlook, Canada's economic outlook and the US economic outlook. Those will have all the figures you will need.

Mr Durocher: I'd just like to start by picking up on a few of the elements Mark mentioned as they pertain to Ontario's economic environment in the coming years. Three of these elements we feel are very important in shaping the way Ontario will perform in the next few years.

The first one is a low-inflation environment. We're starting to think in terms of low inflation, whereas prior to that we always thought in terms of higher inflation. Now we've come to relatively low inflation or quasi-price stability which we feel will stay for the next few years given the stated monetary policy at the federal level, the Canada level.

Another factor that will shape Ontario's performance during the next few years is intensifying world trade, which should continue and intensify even more over the next few years. I'm not talking here only about NAFTA and the FTA, which of course make headline news every day, but also about the GATT negotiations. What GATT reflects is a worldwide will to increase or facilitate trade flows across countries or across national borders.

The third factor that will shape Ontario's performance or future and has already started to do so, along with the two previous factors as well, is indebtedness. I'm not talking only at government levels but at the firm level or business level and the household level as well.

Here are some examples of why Ontario has been shaken and will take a little while before it shakes off the detrimental effects of these three elements to its economy.

On inflation, for instance, we've seen very tangible effects of the reduction from a high-inflation environment to a low-inflation environment, particularly in the real estate sector where asset prices or asset values have fallen very quickly and have led to structural changes in that segment of the Ontario economy. It has done the same elsewhere in Canada, but for Ontario it's been particularly acute.

Intensifying world trade: What that did is reveal very quickly some of the shortcomings of Ontario's economy or some of the competitiveness or productivity problems we've been fueling or hiding, if you will, since the 1980s. Unit labour costs in manufacturing particularly have risen spectacularly in Canada and are now only starting to come down under the effect of a very hard or very austere monetary or anti-inflation policy.

By the way, this restructuring in manufacturing is very vivid in Ontario, where now the total number of jobs in manufacturing represents below 18% of total employment in the province. Just 15 to 17 years earlier, from 1975 to about 1981, manufacturing employment was around 24% to 25% of total employment in Ontario. So we see that there is a profound structural change in that very important segment of the Ontario economy.

The third factor is debt. Ontarians have gathered huge amounts of debt, as I said, at the household, business and government levels in the 1980s without that debt being supported by real tangible assets. In the 1980s, that led to a frenzy in consumption. What it has done in the late 1980s and early 1990s is lead to a restructuring in retailing, where we see that consumption has really slowed down. It's starting to pick up again, but it's slowed down.

Restoring wealth creation in this environment, which would be the main thrust of this forecast or this presentation before you, will not be easy, but in our view it should be the overriding concern or objective of public policy in Ontario and indeed in Canada.

1120

With this changing environment in mind, I'd like to give you a more detailed or sectoral view of the Ontario economy for the next few years. I'd also ask you, although this is not an apology, to bear in mind that these new economic conditions or the emergence of this new economy does not make life any easier for a forecaster, which is already a perilous profession. So instead of focusing on numbers as such, I'd like you rather to focus on the thrust or on the reasons of why we see Ontario, in a nutshell, growing a little slower than the Canadian economy as a whole.

For 1992, many people ask, "Was the recession over in 1992?" It sure felt like a recession. Employment still dropped. We've seen it particularly acutely in manufacturing. Employment dropped from 1.1% to 1.2% in 1992. That's a fairly sharp drop. So people were still asking, "Is the recession over in Ontario?"

There have been positive points in 1992 which should carry on into 1993 and 1994, for instance exports, which is a large part of the Ontario economy, particularly to the United States. Exports to September had increased by 12% in value. That was mainly in crude materials. To September the increase was 18%, but that was due to the devaluation of the Canadian dollar, since many of the commodities that were exported, or the base metals and all that, were denominated in US dollars. With the devaluation of the Canadian dollar, it of course increased the value of exports in Canadian dollars.

The residential construction industry: After three or four years of consecutive decline, residential construction finally showed some growth. In Ontario, as we said prior, the declining house prices or real estate prices made house construction, new home construction, more attractive, accompanied by a decline in interest rates and a sense that consumers are being more confident about the future of the economy that really buoyed residential construction in Ontario. Although the increase was not spectacular, it's still a step in the right direction.

Retail sales: Retail sales, again, dropped by over 3% in 1991. We had the impact of the GST, which Mark alluded to. We had the restructuring in manufacturing and the whole of the change from a high-inflation to a low-inflation environment. That led retail sales to drop in 1991. In 1992 they seem to have picked up. To October they were up by 1.4%, which is a good thing.

Overall for 1992, we feel real gross domestic product in Ontario averaged slightly above 1% in real terms.

There are restraining factors to this growth. We are not seeing the same kind or the same type of growth we've seen in the previous recoveries, particularly in Ontario, because of the changing environment we alluded to earlier.

One of these restraining factors obviously is restructuring. Restructuring, or the decline, if you will, of labour to produce output, in the short term could be a restraining factor, but for longer-term growth, productivity increases are essential to maintain or sustain longer-term growth. So even though employment, say, in manufacturing has decreased, we feel unit labour costs in Ontario have been decreasing as well or reflect an increase in productivity.

Another thing that has happened in Canada throughout 1992 is the surge or the rise in investment in machinery and equipment. To us, that is not of course a restraining factor, but it goes hand in hand with productivity increases. As we invest in our productive capacity in the most efficient technologies or the most efficient processes available, then this bodes well for future growth, but it takes time before this productivity is indeed instilled in the economy.

Consumer debt: We tend to think that consumer debt is actually declining in all of Canada, in Ontario and Quebec, for instance, but our estimates show that consumer debt, or household debt, is actually increasing as a share of personal disposable income. The rate of increase has slowed down, but due probably to higher taxes, the ratio of debt to personal disposable income is still increasing, but slowing down, which is the good news. The deflation of asset values is also a problem, since the ratio of debt to net worth will be affected by that, obviously.

In non-residential construction, particularly in the industrial and commercial or office space side, that's another restraining factor. There's enough supply on the market presently to last for at least the next two years without any new major projects being started. So the bulk of non-residential investment is actually taking place in machinery and equipment.

Another restraining factor, of course, would be public finances. With high taxes, a high deficit and high debt, which means higher taxes in the future, that also constitutes a restraining factor. We talked to the effect of higher taxes on slower personal disposable income growth.

Also, overlapping that is the uncertainty of the policy environment. We're not quite sure at this moment that the right policies are in place to foster sound and sustainable growth in Ontario.

Growth factors: I talked at length a little earlier about productivity. Labour productivity is on the rise and we still have to wait and see if wage gains will wipe out the effects of productivity gains, but we feel that the time is ripe for notable productivity increases in Ontario.

With the lower dollar, the higher productivity, with the US recovery, Ontario exports almost 80% of its total merchandise exports to the United States. We feel that the exports sector will be a very positive factor on Ontario's economy for the next few years, and as I said earlier, investment in machinery and equipment bodes well for the longer-term or sustainable growth.

Residential construction, finally, one of the last positive factors we've identified, should also continue in its increase, supported to an extent by socially assisted housing, but still the overriding or the fundamental conditions or criteria—the real estate prices, declining interest rates, a slowly improving employment situation or picture—should boost demand for housing.

Sectorally, how does this translate in Ontario? The transportation equipment, which is central to Ontario, accounts for almost 30% of total manufacturing shipments in Ontario. While the outlook is generally positive, the auto assembly sector is still competitive compared to other firms or other plants elsewhere in the world, but it is coming under increasing fire to improve that competitive edge and we must not lose it if we want the outlook to remain generally positive for the longer run.

The transportation equipment segment has suffered from international competition or from rationalization, from restructuring as well, and there are closures that have been announced, but there have also been investments that have been announced in that sector, particularly in the auto assembly.

In the auto parts segment, the jury's still out on that sector. That segment seems particularly vulnerable to outside competition, so we have to wait and see what will happen with the parts segment. There's been already a lot of rationalization in the auto parts manufacturing sector and we feel that most of that rationalization has already taken place and it should be in better shape now to benefit from the emerging recovery.

Retailing in Ontario: There have been large downsizes. There have been a lot of bankruptcies in retailing due to the consumption frenzy of the 1980s and to the sharp downturn in consumption. Retailing seems to be changing. It changes not only in size but also in the way it gives out retailing services. We see the emergence of warehouse-type stores, which seem to appeal to consumers who are more sensitive to the prices they pay for the goods they buy, and warehouse-type stores seem to be addressing that need particularly. So we might see a shift there from exclusive stores to more warehouse-type stores or more discount-type stores. That is also tangible proof of the emphasis that industries in general will be putting on competitiveness.

Construction I've alluded to already. It should increase because of the lower interest rates, the low house prices and the government supporting subsidized housing. The non-residential side should see a major stop, if you will. It's already seeing it because of the overcapacity in that segment.

As far as utilities go, and particularly Ontario Hydro, it seems the government is taking the right steps to stop the problem from getting even bigger. It's already a problem, but they've cancelled the Manitoba deal, which would have increased the energy overcapacity, energy that's not needed in Ontario right now. They still, to my knowledge, have a moratorium on nuclear power plants and further costly developments in that segment, so that seems to be doing very well.

Overall we see moderate growth compared to previous recoveries in Ontario. If I'm not mistaken, we're seeing 3.5% growth in 1993 and 4% or 3.9% growth in 1994. So it should be slightly under the national average, which is quite unusual for Ontario, but as I was saying, these restructuring elements or this emerging new economy is really hitting Ontario the hardest. So on balance, Ontario will still represent 40% of Canadian GDP by the end of the forecast period.

1130

I avoided mining. I'm sorry about that. Mining in 1992 had I guess a so-so year. If it weren't for the declining value of the Canadian dollar, the value of exports or the value of shipments in mining, it might not have posted an increase, but for 1993 we already know about closures or reductions in Inco and Falconbridge, so in volume terms 1993 should remain around stagnant and should be neutral as a contributor to Ontario growth.

Where does that take us towards public finances? I'll turn my attention to public finances. Where are we now and how did we get there? I was listening earlier on to comments made by someone on the panel here and they were saying that yes, expenditure growth was tremendously high during the latter part of the 1980s. I'd have to agree with that. Public expenditure growth in Ontario in the late 1980s was increasingly generous without concern about the supportive wealth we were generating to support that type of public expenditure growth. We actually based our expenditure growth on the wealth illusion of the 1980s. We thought we were creating wealth. Obviously, I think we didn't create as much wealth as we thought we did.

Of course on the revenue side there were problems of downward pressure because of the recession, and there was also downward pressure on the public revenues or government revenues because of the changing economy. We're in a low-inflation environment now. We have to face that and that wages will not automatically increase by 6% or 7% and automatically increase government revenues by 7% or 8% to 10%. Those times are gone now.

It's the same thing with retail sales tax or sales tax in Ontario. Again, the low-inflation economy will not yield high-revenue growth during the next few years. So we're stuck, it seems, with a high structural deficit for the next coming years. This was correctly alluded to in the government's Ontario Fiscal Outlook. Even if revenues were to increase by 10% it still wouldn't reduce significantly, or it wouldn't wipe out anyway, the high structural deficit, so we're still keeping or we're still adding to total debt.

What does that do when we add to total debt faster than we actually create wealth or faster than the GDP grows? The debt services payments continue to increase, and they increase as a share of total revenue, they increase as a share of GDP. What we're actually doing is that the increasing debt service costs are cutting back on much-needed public policy interventions such as in education, in health and in infrastructure and in this new concern that governments seem to be having which is the environment.

We've looked at environment spending. Environment spending, rather than to increase, has declined from very low levels in 1975-76 to the current levels now: It's under 1% of total expenditures or just about. Debt service is acting like a straitjacket. It forces the government or it constrains the government in its spending on much-needed initiatives.

What are the solutions to this public finances dilemma? Unfortunately, and I think government realizes this, there are no quick fixes. You cannot, first of all, cut back on expenditures savagely without taking a close look at what the impact would be on the economy, just as you can't increase revenues very fiercely without judging or without jeopardizing this recovery we're in right now.

The government will have to analyse, first of all, cuts in the global scheme of things and also revenue increases, maybe think about user-pay mechanisms. We might talk about that a little later on. What we've been doing or what public policy should be doing, in our view, is to focus on wealth creation, because wealth creation is eventually what will support expenditures and what will bring revenue to the provincial coffers.

One of the objectives of fiscal policy is to redistribute wealth, and that's one worthy objective of the tax system in Canada. But the first condition to redistribute wealth is to create wealth, and so far, in our view, public policy has failed to address this concern adequately. In fact we have to borrow to give us the illusion that we are indeed redistributing wealth. Of course we're not; we're borrowing it, so sooner or later we'll have to pay it back.

With this in mind, I'll turn it back to Mark for summing up.

Mr Chandler: Just to summarize, we were appropriately cautious about growth last year and we think we're appropriately more upbeat about growth this year. We also recognize that this acceleration in growth will do little to dramatically improve the labour situation in the province or that it will ease the pressures much on the twin problems of weak revenue growth and strong requirements for social services spending.

In this environment there must be increased focus on improving the efficiency of delivering government services whether through the increased use of technology, a sea change in the delivery of the programs or appropriate pricing and signalling mechanisms. These are essentially microeconomic questions and this goes back to Benoît's point that there are no quick fixes.

The macroeconomic question of whether to spend more to get us out of recession has already essentially, we feel, been answered for us. We simply do not have the kind of room to manoeuvre that would afford us this kind of luxury. Our net external debt as a country is more than troublesome at 38% of GDP. It is an albatross on our future standard of living and prevents us from providing the current level of services to future generations. With that, I'll turn it over.

The Chair: I'm going to start off with Ms Harrington.

Ms Harrington: I like your positive approach and I like your phrase "consumption frenzy of the 1980s." You said Canada is going to be producing more, 3.5% this coming year. I'd like to ask your views on a particular situation, that is, the Hamilton-Niagara region.

Other people have told us we are going to have to rely less, obviously, on steel and auto. In our region we have a very well trained workforce. We're losing our industrial base we've had for a long time. We have a very good location for US distribution. What can you foresee? Other people have told us that the service industry is going to be much greater in the future. What might you predict for the future for our region?

Mr Chandler: I'll start just by answering a little bit from a national perspective of what we see and how that might relate to your region. Clearly, one of the things we're hoping for this year and counting on in terms of the recovery is exports, and particularly exports to the US. The rest of the world will not be performing extremely strong.

